But few visitors lingered at the Schweitzer Hof, although the bright October weather might reasonably have tempted many to prolong their stay, as I did, by the shores of this most lovely of the Swiss lakes. The jagged peaks of Mount Pilatus for days and days stood clear out against a cloudless sky, whilst every seam and furrow, pinewood, and silver torrent, were plainly discernible on the face of its opposite neighbor, the Righi. The lofty chain of the distant Alps, by this time with their snowy garb grown much more ample, was reflected with marvellous precision and beauty on the bosom of the placid inland sea. My enjoyment of the place was so great, that I could do nothing all day but drink in its charms with eyes and heart, and even when night came on, I used to spend many a pleasant hour slowly traversing the old covered bridge with the wooden piles, getting various combinations of form and effect, as the moon lighted up the scene. The visitors' book at the hotel now rarely received any additional names. Here and there only a Mr. and Mrs. Smith and family jotted down the fact that they were returning from North Italy, and were "so sorry that they had not time to spend more than one night at Lucerne during such very pleasant weather"; whilst an occasional Mrs. Jones, and a stray Miss Tomkins or two gave a short history of their holiday trip, "regretting that they had not come here first, that they might have had time to explore the very beautiful scenery of the neighborhood," or made comment in glowing language on the comforts of the house, the civility of its landlord, and the excellence of its cuisine.

I would sometimes amuse myself in the salle-à-manger, by glancing through this budget of dull commonplaces, idiotic suggestions, and questionable English supplied by my fellow-countrymen, interspersed as they were at intervals by the sand-covered entries in that little cramped, queerly twisted hand of the foreigner, which contrasts so quaintly with the large, clearly formed letters, and bold signatures of the Anglo-Saxon. Of course, with so few people travelling, every fresh arrival was easily discerned, and often gave matter for a word or two of gossip from Fritz, the head-waiter, who, like the rest of his class abroad, familiar and garrulous, conceiving that all the English and Americans were naturally intimate with each other, seemed to expect me to take a personal interest in every new-comer.

Returning from a stroll on the old bridge, the evening preceding the day I had fixed for my departure, I entered the salle-à-manger of the hotel for some refreshment. There was no one there, but the book lay open on the table near the ink-stand, as if some entry had just been made. I was about to glance at it, when, my eye fell on the latest Times, which, proving more attractive, prevented my looking to see if any fresh travellers had passed through during the day. Sitting down to the newspaper, I remember closing the book, and resting my elbow on it for a considerable period, whilst I dallied with the large quill pen, still wet from its recent use; for what followed induced me to recall minutely my slightest actions after I entered the hotel that evening. Fritz, the waiter, did not serve my meal; I read till it was very late, and went straight to my room, just as the lights were being extinguished.

Now, I suppose that for the last twelve years of my life, Bertha Mollett had never been farther from my mind than she was when I laid my head on the pillow that night. I had not thought of her for months; my brain teemed with speculations (far enough removed from old associations) which had been aroused by a stirring political article in the Times, and yet, I take it, I had scarcely closed my eyes five minutes, when I dreamed of her; yes, for the very first time, I saw her in my sleep! I knew somehow, instinctively, that it was she, although I could not see her face, for she was sitting with her back towards me, her elbows resting on a table, her head buried in her hands, and her long hair falling in thick masses over her shoulders, entirely hiding the upper part of her figure.

Although, of course, I had never seen her with her hair in this state, and although, as I say, I could not even now distinguish her face, I was yet perfectly conscious of who it was. The apartment where she sat, too, was quite familiar to me. It was as if the old schoolroom had been suddenly transplanted to Lucerne, for I could see, instead of our cricket-field, the moonlit lake and mountains through the open window, the same view, indeed, that there was from the front of the hotel. The furniture, likewise, was changed, and wore a foreign aspect. The floor was carpetless and highly polished; the recess for the bookcase was now much larger, and held, instead of ponderous tomes, a little French bed, with light muslin curtains festooned above it. It appeared to be occupied, and I remember striving in vain to see who was lying there. Everything was perfectly familiar and yet so strange, possessing all that curious combination of the real and unreal which marks such scenes in dreamland; but when at last the sitting figure rose, and turned towards me, it was as if the living woman herself were there!

There was nothing unreal about her! So vivid was the apparition that no doubt could have remained as to her identity. Her face, grown much older, certainly, but as lovely as ever, was, in its ashy paleness, the very picture of despair and misery; her eyes welling over with tears, looked at me piteously, as if appealing for help, whilst stretching one hand towards me, and pointing with the other to the bed, she seemed on the point of speaking; but the next moment she sank back on the chair, and I awoke with a start, and a sensation such as I had never experienced before.

I need hardly say I slept but little more that night. I lay ruminating till daylight upon the strangeness of my dream; strange, under any circumstances, I thought, but doubly so as being the first in which I had ever seen her, and as having happened here, in a spot where there were no associations that could possibly have induced it. It made a great impression on me, and it was only after I had had my breakfast, and had come into contact a little with the outer world, that I began to recover my usual equanimity; yet it so unhinged me that I could not make up my mind to leave Lucerne as I had intended that day. I felt irresistibly chained to the place.

After dinner that evening, when the full moon had risen clear of the mountains, but yet not so high as to prevent her bright rays from stealing partially beneath the roof of the old bridge, I lighted my cigar, and strolled away to my favorite lounge. Here I revelled, as usual, in the quiet and beauty of the hour; not a breath of wind, and scarcely a footstep broke the silence, for your Swiss is early to bed, and there were but few passengers at that time crossing the broad embouchure of the lake, where it seems to repose in its greatest calm ere it rushes forward to its narrow channel, to lose its identity and name in the sparkling river Reuss.

I was leaning over the balustrade, about midway across the bridge, and in one of the broadest floods of moonlight, when the sound of the railway whistle announced the arrival of the last train from Zurich. Then I heard through the still air the omnibus drive away from the station down into the rough-paved streets, but, as the bridge formed a short cut for foot-passengers to the better part of the town, where the Schweitzer Hof stands, it was not unusual for a few returning travellers to take this way. Now I heard echoing on the old wooden planking, hurrying footsteps coming towards me from the direction of the station. By degrees, I fancied that these sounds became mingled with voices, in anxious and earnest converse. As they drew nearer, I could distinctly hear the broken English of Fritz reiterating the words, "No, sare, no, sare; I tell you he was not dead; zay only fear, zay only fear!"

Then there was some question which I could not catch, and with the talk still going on rapidly, the two persons passed into the flood of light where I was standing. Naturally turning to look at them, the foremost face instantly caught my eye; the moon's rays fell straight upon it, and showed me, but very little changed, the stern, hard features of my old Tutor Mollett.

Pondering as I had been over my dream, my mind filled with little else than the thoughts engendered by it, vaguely running over those early days, and all their surroundings, the sudden appearance of Bertha's father scarcely at first surprised me as much as might have been expected; it seemed perfectly natural that he should be at hand. I was more than ever, for the moment, back amongst the old scenes, and it was only in the course of a minute or so, after he had passed, that I recovered myself sufficiently fully to realize the, to me, extraordinary circumstance. Had he dropped from the clouds, I could not then have been more startled. Was it really he, or only a phantom of my own active imagination? I had been unobserved; so to follow and ascertain, to speak to him, and set all doubt at rest, was my involuntary impulse. A few strides brought me to his side, just as he descended the steps at the end of the bridge and emerged into the full light upon the open "Place."

Time had dealt less gently with me than it had with him, and he did not recognize me when I spoke, but was passing on with a mere glance, as he said, "Excuse me, sir, I have not the pleasure of knowing you, and I am in great haste."

"I see it," I replied, "and I would not venture to intrude under such circumstances, were it not that I cannot refrain from making myself known to you. I am not prompted by mere idle curiosity, — look! Mr. Mollett, look again, do you not remember me?"

We were going straight in the direction of the hotel, and, without stopping, he turned his keen eyes eagerly upon me, and after scrutinizing me again and again, he said, "Yes, yes, I seem to know your face, but I cannot at this moment recall who you are, and I am in such anxiety that you really must pardon my forgetting you. My son-in-law is dangerously ill here in this house; I have been summoned from Zurich, and every moment is of importance if I wish to find him alive; I may even as it is be too late."

With this, reaching the entrance to the Schweitzer Hof, where the landlord was waiting to receive him, Mollett passed rapidly up the staircase with the host without deigning to bestow another word or look upon me.

Thus left alone in the hall with Fritz (for of course I did not attempt to follow), I turned to him with a look of bewildered inquiry. Now it so happened that I had not seen him the whole of this day, and therefore had not been favored with his usual gossip, otherwise I might possibly have been prepared for the sudden apparition of my old tutor, and so perhaps have gained a clew as I now did to the mystery of my dream. I say, perhaps; for I will not be tempted to assert that it was anything more than a coincidence, however difficult it may be to think so.

"Ah! sare!" instantly began my garrulous friend, "I have not had time to-day. Yes, yes, you know him, — I zought you would, you all know each ozer! and zare has been such sad vork! before he come! ze poor lady, too, so distress, — his daughter, — did you see ze book? No! Ah! Bien, I will show you! Madame de Pombéras, French name? Yes, but English writing, — no mistake in zat!" And he hurried me into the salle-à-manger, seized the book, opened it, and put his finger triumphantly down on the last entry, made, as I instantly recognized, in the once familiar handwriting of Bertha Mollett! It ran simply, "Monsieur and Madame Binos de Pombéras, en route de Milan à Paris, Octobre 18me."

As I was gazing at it half bewildered, Fritz continued, "Zay arrive last night, ven you vas out, monsieur very ill, go straight to bed, — madame take some supper at zis table, and while she wait, I bring her ze book, — she explain, — she have great fear for her husband, — she vant to get to Zurich, but he would not be able, — zen she go to bed, — and quite early zis morning monsieur much vorse, — oblige to have doctor, — he have great fear, — ze heart, — ze heart, — he says, — must not be moved, — zen she send me to Zurich to fetch her fazer who wait zere to meet zem, — and I just bring him back now; — you know him, — so, — perhaps too you know his daughter, — zay all travel togezer sometimes, — zay have been here before, — ze old man look after his money, — ze money of his 'gendre,' vat you call son-in-law."

Here Fritz was called away, leaving me to ponder over the remarkable coincidence, which fate or some mysterious latent force had seemed to bring about. I need not dwell on what followed. Monsieur Binos de Pombéras died that night, and was buried at Lucerne. I studiously avoided coming in contact with either Bertha or her father, who almost immediately after the funeral left for England, and nearly a year elapsed before I ventured to present myself at the old familiar house.

I at first by no means met with a cordial reception from Mr. Mollett, who now released from all pecuniary need by the wealth inherited by his widowed daughter, had given up his old vocation, and was living in a style very different from that of former days. He drew but one conclusion, of course, from my reappearance on the scene. His selfish instincts evidently shrank from the idea of parting with his daughter again, not so much from the fear of losing her companionship, as from the possibility that through her making a second marriage, he would no longer be able to keep up his present easy and luxurious mode of life.

It was only by very slow degrees that I could make him see that it was Bertha and not her wealth I coveted; the close and narrow heart of the money-worshipping man refusing to believe in anything like disinterested affection. When, however, he was finally convinced that my own means were ample, and that his worldly position would not be interfered with, by my realizing, at last, the dearest wish of my heart, he placed no obstacle in my way, and I need hardly say, that when due time had elapsed, Bertha had nothing to urge against my suit.

Here, then, are the circumstances which led to my present happiness! Were they purely accidental? Had not the visitors' book, with Bertha's handwriting in it, on which I had been leaning that memorable evening at Lucerne, had not the pen which she had then just been using, and with which I had dallied whilst I read the newspaper, some mysterious influence over me, of which I was unconscious at the time?

Had not the fact of my being under the same roof with her, of having entered the salle-à-manger, the moment after she quitted it, — nay, even having taken, perhaps, the very chair which she had just vacated, something to do with my dream?

And the dream itself, was it not the result of a prevision, — a seeing, as it were, without eyes, and without presence, what was probably actually taking place in an adjacent chamber? And had I not had this dream, and so have been detained at Lucerne another day, should I ever have married the widow of Monsieur Binos de Pombéras?

ENGLISH YATCHING.

IT is popularly believed that Englishmen have a greater natural liking for the sea than the inhabitants of any other country; and it is generally considered a sufficient explanation in accounting for this inherent partiality to refer to the insular position of Great Britain. Yet, on reflection, this accidental feature seems unlikely to be the sole cause of such a striking national characteristic; for we find other countries, although not insular, possessed of large seaboard, whose inhabitants evince no special fondness for salt-water whatever. But, however obscure or apparent the cause, there is no denying that the Anglo-Saxon, whether he be on this side of the Atlantic or the other, manifests an interest in maritime pursuits which has no rivalry among the most enterprising of other nations. To how remote a period pre-eminence on the "vasty deep" could be justly claimed for the Anglo-Saxon, we cannot say; but there has been a very potent tradition current for some time past which no doubt authentically declares that "Britannia rules the waves." This will probably be regarded as a very debatable statement, from a certain point of view, but it is unnecessary to consume time in dispute; it is sufficient for our purpose to say, what is indubitably true, that in general extent and importance our maritime interests are much beyond those of any other nation. In combination with, and rising out of, this superiority afloat, we have a minor demonstration which is generally referred to as the "pastime of yachting," and to this branch of the subject we are about to devote some remarks. It is not incumbent to understand the present vastness of our yachting eminence that we should inquire circumstantially into its earliest promotion; it will be enough to know that half a century ago there were probably not more than fifty British yachts afloat, and they were owned by noblemen or gentlemen of independent means; at this date there are at least two thousand yachts on the different club lists, representing in the aggregate fifty thousand tons, and we find it is not at all necessary to be either a duke, a lord, or an admiral, to become a yacht owner; in fact, some of the best yachtsmen of the period are connected with the commerce of the country. It is unlikely that out of these two thousand vessels more than half would be at any one time in actual commission, and during the winter months not, at the most, more than one twentieth; still, there are the yachts, and they are all commissioned and fairly underway for pleasure at one season or another. When half these yachts are in commission, employment is given to at least three thousand seamen, and this fact is often rather ostentatiously alluded to as representing a nursery for the royal navy. The truth is, yachtsmen are generally made out of fishermen, coast-watermen, and the working hands of pilot vessels and coasters, a class of men who are not at all likely to be attracted by the allurements of the R. N. On the other hand, a regular man-of-war's man would be entirely out of place on board a yacht, for almost any service which a regular long-shore loafer would not perform equally well. We recollect when the America was matched against the Alarm, in 1861, some dispute arose on board the former, and most of the crew left the vessel. This was the morning before the match, and Mr. Decie was compelled to select a scratch crew from whatever material offered. One stalwart fellow presented himself on board, and for weight and strength looked a whole main-halyard purchase in himself. "What have you been used to?" asked the owner. "A man-of-war, sir," proudly answered the candidate, looking down almost contemptuously on the little deck of the America. "And were you an able seaman?" interrogated the owner. "Very nearly, sir," was the vague reply; and what particular degree of seamanship that represented may be guessed when we say that the crew, who amongst them numbered seven or eight navy-trained men, came on a wind with balloon jib and topsails, and when trying to get the fore-topsail in let it blow away, and eventually allowed similar freedom to the jib, and this in a fair whole-sail breeze. A yachtsman is a very smart sailor, and for consummate knowledge and expertness in handling a fore-and-aft-rigged vessel, he is without equal. He is highly combative, fights to the last, and always tries to win; in fact, a good racing crew to a gentleman fond of match-sailing is one of the principal charms of yachting. For a good crew a good skipper is required, or match-sailing will be found very unsatisfactory sport; it would be difficult to advise upon this subject, but it may be accepted as an exceptional truth, that the man is of no use as a racing skipper unless he has thorough control over the men, and he must moreover be capable of inspiring them with respect for himself and trust in his judgment to do what will best suit the vessel under existing circumstances. A great deal has been said to the effect that we require a better class of skipper altogether; but this is entirely a mistake. We never hear of one losing a yacht, and we are quite certain the present class of skipper is as much adapted to his vessel as the master of an Australian clipper is to his ship. The latter is excellent in his way, but all his acquirements in navigation would not avail him in a yacht match; and we are afraid, if scientific attainments are sought after in yacht skippers, we shall lose the thoroughly practical seamen we now meet with in charge of yachts.

It is not at all unlikely that our habit of sojourning at the seaside of late years has had a great deal to do with the growth and prosperity of yachting; it is not too much to say that there would be very few men who would keep yachts if our coasts boasted of no livelier places than they did a few years ago, — such as Hull, Yarmouth, Portsmouth, or Sheerness. This influence of the now prevalent fashion is peculiarly apparent across the Channel. A few years ago Frenchmen never dreamt of seaside visiting; now they have their annual marine resorts as we have, and are even becoming yachtsmen. They have a yacht club and, at least, fifty yachts: most of them are of English build, — old vessels, — and some of them are very extraordinary things indeed. One we saw at Havre last summer was a kind of huge wherry of twenty-five tons, with flush deck painted white; no boom to mainsail, mizzen, foresail, and jib, and no topsail. She was nearly as broad as long, and was doubtless about as uncomfortable a thing as any one could go afloat in. She was carvel built, and looked very old, the lands being well filled with pitch and tar. No one on board knew when she was built, or what she was built for; it was enough for them to know that she was then a French yacht. Our neighbors would consider themselves badly off at a fashionable coast town if, having yachts, they had no regatta; consequently, here again they imitate the English, and, we must confess, they very successfully carry out their arrangements. They invite English yachts to compete, with a certain knowledge, if the invitation be accepted, that an English yacht must carry off the prize; but they regard the result with no jealousy, and only hope the example will rouse the nautical enterprise of the nation to furnish something that can more worthily compete with such an accomplished rival on future occasions. The regattas, although of such recent foundation, we may regard as fairly established annual events. That last season of the Société des Régates du Havre was very successful, both in its arrangements, which gave universal satisfaction, and in the number of yachts that competed. There were eight of our crack English cutters there, — the Fiona, Menai, Condor, Sphinx, Vindex, Niobe, Dione, and Phantom; and they were certainly not bored with a long course; and of schooners there were the Aline, Cambria, Gloriana, Albertine, and Egeria, and Julia yawl, besides many others that did not compete. The mode of starting, timing, and calculating time allowances for differences of tonnage were novel and complicated, but they were carried out with such unerring exactness that the very highest satisfaction was given; and, no doubt, Englishmen will be glad to again participate in matches so pleasantly conducted.

The Dieppe Regatta — the first, we believe, held — was not quite so successful, two causes militating against it: it was held during the regatta week of the Royal Victoria Yacht Club at Ryde, and the course chosen was a little too much, even for such prizes as 3,000 f. and a gold medal. The result was that only one English yacht and one French yacht started, and the former obtained a very easy victory. Still, what the French are doing affords very apparent evidence that they are associating themselves with yachting in a thoroughly practical spirit, and in all probability we shall find them a few years hence as perfect in the nautical sport as they have rapidly become adepts on the turf. Only last summer a French nobleman who owns an English-built schooner of one hundred and twenty tons was able to accept a challenge from the owner of an English yacht, to sail from Havre round Cherbourg breakwater and back. It was very bad weather, and the English yacht, through the rottenness of her gear, came to dreadful grief; but, although the Frenchman won, it by no means proved his superiority, as shortly afterwards the same vessels were matched again, and then the English yacht gained a very hollow victory. The French crews seem very willing and plucky, but they take about twice as much time to do a thing as an English crew does, and we expect they must sail a great many matches before they can emulate the smartness of their rivals. Now we have the Frenchman afloat we want him to do one other thing, the better to stimulate amicable rivalry, and that is, — build his own yachts. Contests then, of an international character, will be regarded with increased interest, and the results will be much more satisfactory to the competitors of both nations.

The Russians have a yacht club at St. Petersburg, and the Swedes have one at Stockholm; but neither seem to do much in the way of match-sailing. The St. Petersburg club numbers about a dozen large schooners of English build, and in 1852 they essayed a regatta at Cronstadt, and from the chronicles we have at hand, the two yacht matches sailed were contested with as much interest and spirit as such matches usually are on the English coast. The English cutter, War-hawk, sixty-six tons, Vice-Commander Bartlett, R. L. Y. C., won the first match, and Claymore, schooner, one hundred and fifty tons, M. A. Campbell, won the second: the prizes were two gold vases, value respectively, £120 and £150. The Crimean war interfered with the continuance of these amenities afloat, and we believe the members of the Imperial yacht club have made no attempt to reinstitute a regatta since 1852, even amongst themselves. Indeed, there are, according to the yacht list of the club, only six yacht owners, beside five members of the Imperial family, and a succession of matches between these would be very dull work. Evidently Russian gentlemen, like most foreigners, discover only discomfort in yachting, and probably are insensible to the charms of keeping a yacht on purpose to be ill in. Nevertheless, we know that many Englishmen have as much natural horror of the sea-saw of the ocean as it is possible for either Russian or Turk to feel, and yet they keep yachts, and are always ill when they are under way. But an Englishman is often a martyr to an uncomfortable fashion, and it is not surprising to find some voluntarily enduring misery for the sake of enjoying the distinction such a characteristic custom as yatching gives.

Notwithstanding that match-sailing gives a certain amount of distinctiveness, vigor, and power of captivity to yachting, it by no means follows that such contests are the sole aim and end of the pastime. On the contrary, yachting is loved and pursued, in some instances, to a fantastic extent, for itself alone; that is, we presume, for the advantage of enjoying the invigorating influences of cruising under a blue sky, and in an uncontaminated atmosphere. The humorist's account of yachting was "living in a chest moored near Margate jetty"; now a yacht, according to the "yacht list," may range in size from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 400 tons, and to live in one of the former tonnage would certainly be living in a very confined space indeed; but a bachelor may find a great deal of comfort in living on board a vessel of 25 tons. Of course there are some owners of large vessels who never live on board, or at least for not more than a day or two at a time, and simply keep yachts because it is the fashion, and for the pleasure of enjoying a few hours' sailing in very fine weather. This can scarcely be called yachting, any more than the mere keeping of hunters by a gentleman could be called fox-hunting. Still, we frequently find that the owner of a yacht, who finds it disagreeable living on board, enters with much zest into yacht matches, and he is generally very fastidious in the matter of his boats, the dress of his crew, and the gilt stripe around his vessel's sides; he is also extremely anxious to get her moored as near as possible to the public promenade or pier, and is sure to have her photographed. Certainly living on board a yacht with half a dozen people is a dreadful trial sometimes, and going on shore is looked upon as a kind of freedom worth making the most of. It is necessarily very close quarters on board, and in such limited space there is no escaping each other; so if matters do not run smoothly, the social aspect must become very awful, and every one labors with the same kind of feeling that a man is suddenly shocked with when in a railway compartment he finds himself sitting opposite an exasperated creditor. This kind of accident ought not to occur in a well-assorted family, but whilst human imperfections endure, small surface troubles will arise in the most ably regulated fraternity. But an ordinary man is not sufficiently a philosopher to eschew living on board his yacht because he dreads the infirmities of his wife's temper, or fears his guests will quarrel over their pet idiosyncrasies, which are sure to become apparent in confinement. An Englishman who keeps a yacht afloat is not quite such a squeamish animal as this, and if he does not live on board, it is probably because he prefers living on shore.

Match-sailing does not appear to have been followed very systematically until the Royal Thames Club took it in hand about the year 1823. On the Solent, from the time the Royal Yacht Squadron was established in the Waterloo year, regattas were occasionally held; but the yachts sailed without classification or time allowance, and it was soon made apparent that the advantage lay all on the side of the large cutters. Consequently owners, who were fond of being in the van, built enormous "one masters" approaching two hundred tons, such as the old Arundel, Menai, Alarm, Lulworth, and Pearl. Experience soon taught the owners of these vessels that racing such big craft was a very expensive game, and for some years match-sailing was indulged in with very faint zest on the Solent. However, it was pursued with an unwonted degree of liveliness on the Thames between vessels of different classes, ranging from seven to twenty-five tons. Of these, by far the most famous were the Mystery of Lord A. Paget and the Phantom of Mr. A. O. Wilkinson. The latter is afloat somewhere, and is still one of the fastest of her tonnage. Then there was an equally famous cutter, the Thought, which has sailed many a good match against the Phantom, and even to this day is famous for her speed. The matches between these vessels were generally sailed from Greenwich to the Nore light-ship and back, and were confined to vessels belonging to the Thames Club; but since 1846 the matches have been thrown open to any vessels belonging to a Royal Yacht Club. This proved to be a most excellent policy, and some very smart vessels straightway went round to the Thames, such as the Heroine, Secret, Cynthia, and Cygnets, of about 30 tons each.

But these crack vessels were altogether eclipsed in 1849 by the renowned Mosquito, an iron vessel of 50 tons, built and owned by Mr. Mare. This yacht proved a veritable flyer, and for speed was, at that time, much superior to any other cutter afloat in fair whole-sail breezes. In 1850 she beat the resuscitated Arrow, then of 84 tons, and the crack cutter of the Solent; but the next year she was very unexpectedly outmatched on the Thames. In June, 1851, the Volante, of 50 tons, appeared, having been built, it was said, in a month; at any rate she appeared without copper, having a blackleaded bottom, and her ballast was only stowed in her hull on the morning of the match. Of course she had at that time no internal fittings; but even as she appeared, she was the most marvellous production the yachting world has ever seen. She was built for light top-sail breezes, and it was not expected she would distinguish herself in heavy weather. Her first appearance was an extraordinary success. She beat the Mosquito in running down from Erith to the Nore, and went away from her still more in beating back. But there was very little wind; the match lasted ten hours. However, they who were dissatisfied must have been convinced of her superiority during the next week, for she then in a fine breeze fairly beat the Mosquito by fifteen seconds, after being kept shaking in the wind twenty minutes whilst her crew were repairing a burst bobstay. There is no doubt these two cutters at that date (1851) represented the very highest excellence in yacht building, and nothing has been produced to surpass them in any marked degree since. It must be remembered that thirty years ago cutters were very different from what they are now; they then had very full bows and high free board forward, and their greatest beam was considerably forward of midships, tapering off towards the quarters. The mast was stepped well forward, and very large mainsails and booms were necessarily carried. The Mosquito and Volante were designed on very opposite principles to this; they had sharp runs fore and aft, no rise forward, very sharp bottoms, small beams, and a large quantity of ballast. Their masts were stepped just forward of their midship sections, and they even carried a greater spread of canvas than the vessels of larger beam. Mr. Chamberlayne was of course very dissatisfied to find the Arrow so easily beaten by these new cutters, and at once had her lengthened by the bow from his own designs, increasing her tonnage from 84 to 102 tons. She then appeared with, as before, a great deal of beam, small displacement, and very little ballast. Her success was decided, and she reigned the most popular cutter for many years, defying the best productions of yacht builders. Her great point was reaching, and to this day, we believe, there is nothing afloat of her tonnage that is so fast when sailing a couple of points off the wind. But in turning close-hauled—the quality par excellence of a sailing-vessel—she was never so good as the sharp-lined and heavily ballasted Mosquito, Volante, and Lulworth, and although she is a fine sea-boat, she is dreadfully slow on a wind if there is much sea disturbance, as the shape of her bow will not allow of her being driven. Of her bad weatherly qualities we had a very striking example, so recently as last summer, during a fine breeze inside the Isle of Wight. In running from Cowes to the Warner light-vessel, she beat the Christabel at least a mile; but when they came on the wind the superiority of the stiff little cutter was at once apparent; she laid right through from the Warner to Cowes, whilst the Arrow had to make a couple of boards to fetch the same point. However, her splendid reaching powers always gave her one advantage over all other cutters after her alteration, until the advent of the Fiona, 78 tons, in 1865, and the Condor, 132 tons, and Oimara, 165 tons in 1866. Still, it was very gratifying to find a cutter of the old school so defiantly holding her own for so many years, and we should not be at all surprised to find her owner bring her out again, remodelled, as great a triumph as ever. The two fastest cutters of less than 100 tons afloat now, in light topsail breezes, are the Vanguard and Fiona; but it is by no means certain that either of these could invariably beat the Mosquito or Volante, with the usual time allowance for excess of tonnage. We thus fail to see that any great progress has been made in the improvement of cutters from the point attained by the two crack vessels of 1851. But although our cutters were so near their present perfection in 1851, schooners at that date had no pretensions to excellence beyond comfort on board and their fine sea-going qualities,—quite enough to recommend them, the stanch lover of cruising will say. But just about that time yacht matches were being revived with such startling vigor and interest, that they attracted the attention of the whole nation, and it was found schooners were so much inferior in weatherly qualities to cutters, that a 50-ton cutter was classed with a 180-ton schooner; even then, unless a reaching wind happened to prevail, the cutter was the most advantageously placed.

Intelligence was probably conveyed across the Atlantic that we were a nation extravagantly fond of yachting and match-sailing, and yet were content with schooners that were extraordinary only for their slowness and indifferent weatherly qualities. There is no doubt that at this date our builders, and especially such a wonderfully shrewd and successful yachtsman as the late Mr. Joseph Weld, were perfectly aware our large yachts were much inferior in model to the then matchless cutters Mosquito and Volante. The Alarm, 193 tons, was probably the best of the large cutters, and the Titania represented what must be considered for that date a new class of schooner.

But we must admit we were far behind in excellence, in these examples of a large class of yacht, of what could have been produced. The Americans witnessed this, and availed themselves of an advantage they had obtained in devoting special attention to windward sailing, by sending over in 1851, with a great flourish of trumpets, the schooner yacht America, and they found us quite unprepared to compete with her. As we have before said, the Titania, of 100 tons, was the best schooner we had, and represented a new school; she was built of iron on the wave-line principle, with a much larger displacement than the America, and her rig was very different. She had two topsails, fore staysail, jib, and flying jib. The America carried no topsails, excepting a very small main-gaff jib header off a wind, and had no head sails beyond a forestaysail laced to a boom. It is true that she set an outer jib when going free, but even then that was seldom done. It will thus be seen that the America had practically but three sails, and they were cut and stood to perfection for windward sailing; the Titania had seven working sails, beside squaresails, and moreover we did not at that date properly understand cutting sails for flatness. Besides having an advantage in sails, it must be allowed the America's lines and sections were superior for speed to the Titania's, and indeed her general superiority was so apparent that no one was surprised at her unequivocal triumph when matched against our schooners. But although we so fully admit she was unequalled in this particular way, we are quite satisfied our two crack cutters were more than equal to her in weatherly qualities in moderate weather. When she sailed her first match, and won the Royal Yacht Squadron Cup, she beat such cutters as the Volante, Wildfire, Arrow, Alarm, and Aurora; and the best of the schooners were the Titania, Constance, Beatrice, and Gypsy Queen. The course was round the Isle of Wight, and the match lasted ten and a half hours. Of course the wind was paltry, and in turning up the back of the island to the westward the Arrow got ashore, but some of the cutters weathered on the America whilst the wind held true; still the latter, by good management and good luck, was the first round the Needles, and then, goose-winging, made off up the Solent, whilst the others were half jammed by a tide outside, with scarcely any wind. The result was, the America very cleverly won the Squadron Cup, and the next week she unmistakably proved her power over our schooners by beating the Titania fifty-one minutes in a twenty miles' run, dead to leeward for the beat back, a fine breeze blowing true in strength and direction. After this achievement she was sold by her owner to Lord de Blaquiere for £4,000, and went up the Mediterranean. The succeeding year she was beaten by the Mosquito and Arrow, after an eight hours' match round the island. Of course plenty of excuses were made for her, but we are quite content to believe the cutters were better than the schooner in turning to windward by short boards. However, we had still no schooner that could vie with her acknowledged supremacy in weatherly qualities, although our builders did their best to model one after the great example. At last the Swedes came to the rescue, and sent over the Sverige, and she certainly promised to beat the America. A match was arranged similar to that sailed by the Titania, and the Sverige beat the Yankee eight minutes in the run before the wind; but the Swede, in gybing for the beat back, carried away her main gaff, and although the spar was fished, her mainsail could not be set properly, and the America eventually won by twenty-five minutes. After this event, we do not recollect hearing anything of the America for many years.

We just now alluded to the endeavors of the builders to produce a schooner that should equal the America. They failed; but an English gentleman, in 1853, was more successful. Mr. Joseph Weld correctly appreciated every excellence of the famous Yankee, and quite unabashed by her prowess, set to work to produce something that would beat her. He altered his large cutter Alarm to a 248 tons schooner, and to this day she is one of the most beautiful and fastest yachts we have. She beat the America in 1861; but the latter then appeared under so many deteriorating alterations, and was so wretchedly sailed, that that victory alone would give the Alarm no prestige. It is a fact that cannot be disguised, that two private gentlemen, from 1852 to 1865, defied all the skill of our best builders with the Alarm schooner and the Arrow cutter; the latter, we have already stated, was successfully altered in 1852. The builders soon grew tired of attempting "Americas." The only two that were at all successes were the Gloriana and Viking,—the latter is now owned by H. R. H. the Duke of Edinburgh,—and gradually worked into a style of their own; seeing it so repeatedly manifested that cutters were superior to schooners, they set about making schooners as much like cutters as possible. Their first prominent success was the Aline, of 216 tons, built by Camper and Nicholson, in 1859; but she was beaten by the Alarm, after a splendid match in half a gale of wind, in 1861.

We do not think they met afterwards; but as neither vessel has been materially altered since that date, there is no reason to suppose the Alarm would not again be victorious in a strong wind. We have, however, seen her beaten this season by both the Cambria, Egeria, and Guinevere; but in very light breezes. Still, it was seen that the Alarm labored under a certain disadvantage without proportionate benefit, by reason of her raking masts, when running, and Mr. Duppas has now had them stepped nearly upright, the same as the Cambria's, Egeria's, and other schooners. How far she will be benefited by this change we are unable yet to say; but there is no doubt that her shortcomings with the wind quite abaft will be quite removed. Since the Aline was built, many other fine and equally fast schooners have been set afloat, such as the Egeria, 161 tons, by Wanhill, of Poole; Pantomime, 140 tons, and Cambria, 199 tons, by Ratsey, of Cowes; Guinevere, 294 tons; and Blue Belle, 160 tons, by Camper and Nicholson, of Gosport. Now these vessels principally depend upon ballast for stiffness, and the American yachts are chiefly dependent on beam for a similar quality. We have not much hesitation in saying the English builders are right for gaining really good weatherly qualities in fair weather or foul; and we have small doubt they have at last got the weather gauge of American builders,—that, however, the coming season will in all probability more satisfactorily afford evidence. In the mean time, we are of opinion that English schooners are now better rigged and canvassed, are better as sea boats, and faster sailers, on or off the wind, than any American yacht. And here we cannot help awarding our builders a word of praise for their unwavering perseverance in pursuit of success; nor must we omit to mention how ably, in many cases, the builder's skill has been assisted by the sagacity of owners. We can now fearlessly challenge the Americans for superiority; and we trust they will send us a formidable champion. We do not believe the Sappho, which came over last autumn, to be the best our transatlantic friends have; and we confidently expect they can send one that will, at least, fairly distinguish herself.

Thus far we have seen that the arrival of a solitary vessel in our waters in 1851 has exercised a wonderfully beneficial influence on English yacht-building, so far as schooners are concerned; and, although our builders have failed as exact imitators, they have been successful out of the multitude of experiments they made. On the other hand, so far as cutters are concerned, the Americans could teach us nothing in 1851; neither can they at the present time. Perhaps we have arrived as near perfection as possible in this line; yet it seems hard to be satisfied until we have seen a cutter display an equal superiority over all others, on all points, in every strength of wind, from half a gale to light topsail breezes. At present, the two fastest cutters under 100 tons—Fiona and Vanguard—can be easily beaten by such vessels as the Menai, 80 tons; Sphinx, 47 tons; or even the old Marina, of 65 tons, if they are obliged to sail with a couple of reefs down. This glaring defect seems to be principally owing to their builder's carrying the narrow-beam, sharp-bottom, and heavy-ballasting principles to just that extreme point—as in the bygone days of shifting ballast—where each becomes a positive evil. Now the Sphinx—one of Hatcher's many successful cutters—has not only a remarkably powerful hull, but is very fast either on or off the wind, and has fairly beaten, receiving a time allowance, the beautiful Fiona in light weather. It therefore seems almost certain that a vessel of double tonnage built on her lines would be more than a match even for such a fleet cutter as the one we have instanced.

We have stated that there is a probability of the rival merits of British and American yachts being again tested during the summer of 1869, a challenge having been sent across the Atlantic by the owner of the Cambria schooner. That challenge has been accepted by Mr. Bennett, the owner of a fine schooner called the Dauntless; but the stipulated Atlantic course, of not less than 3,000 miles, is not one that is very likely to afford a fair test of merit. Mr. Ashbury's great desire seems to be to receive the Royal Yacht Squadron Cup, won by the America in 1851, and now held by the New York Yacht Club as a perpetual challenge cup. The commodore of the club (Mr. Stebbing, owner of the Phantom schooner) is disposed to give Mr. Ashbury an opportunity of doing this in American waters; and when the Cambria makes the attempt we shall heartily wish her success. But this Atlantic course, excepting for the sake of adventure and possible shipwreck, is a very useless thing to attempt. It is true the Americans, who seem very proud of those very tremendous things, were pretty successful in their match from New York to Cowes in December, 1866; but, at the best, it is a very dismal thing to do; and that event, although attended with such even results, did not in any way prove the superiority of one vessel over another. Indeed, probably the worst vessel won by superior navigation, as the one which was the last to arrive at Cowes was the first to sight the Scilly Isles, and must have won but for the stupidity of her navigator. We can only say, if such a match does take place in September between an English and an American yacht, that our hope is a whole-sail steady head wind prevail; should they have a leading wind abaft the beam, as the Vesta, Fleetwing, and Henrietta had in 1866, there is not much doubt the American yacht will win on that one point of sailing; and, as the Dauntless is a third more tonnage than the Cambria, chances will be in her favor should they be troubled with a gale during the passage across.

We do not await the result with any great degree of interest, as we apprehend nothing but chance in the contest, both as regards strength and direction of wind and success in navigation. It is, of course, unlikely the vessels will keep within sight of each other more than a few hours, and after the separation takes place we do not even see what interest those on board can take in the match, unless it be wondering if both vessels are blessed with the same kind of weather. We are quite satisfied to let the Cambria go as the representative of English yacht-building, and anticipate her triumph in American waters, if a sensible course be chosen, such as the America was favored with on this side of the Atlantic in 1851.

English yacht owners have what are called "Channel matches," such as from the Thames, or Isle of Wight, to the French coast; but they, as a rule, are governed by fluking, and it is quite an exception to see the merits of all the vessels engaged in such struggles fairly tested. Yet it is impossible to feel no interest or excitement over these events, as all the vessels are continually under command of the eye; and so far, in spite of the probable variableness of the motive force, even in so circumscribed a radius as half a dozen miles, it is a hand-to-hand fight. Altogether these Channel matches invest the sport with a certain character, and give that bold flavor to yachting which could not be gained by "pot-hunting" up rivers and creeks. But the danger of having a fluking match is not peculiar to Channel courses, and it is nothing unusual to find vessels "out in a calm" on the Solent, or anywhere else on the British coast. Indeed, we frequently hear of matches at regattas having to be sailed over two or three times on account of the wind's treachery. Yet, so far as our experience and knowledge guide us, the most satisfactorily contested matches have been sailed in what Mr. Bennett calls "inland waters." Channel matches were originally promoted for the avowed purpose of giving yacht owners, who did not care for the ordinary sport afforded by regattas, an opportunity of participating in the excitement of matches with a fair chance of success; but such owners have discovered themselves even here at a disadvantage, as it is found a real racing yacht has just as much superiority over one fitted for cruising in a Channel match, as she has over one in a match sailed inside the Isle of Wight. It must be understood that a racing yacht, although fitted up with every comfort and luxury for cruising, is much more heavily sparred, canvassed, and ballasted than one merely intended for racing. Their hulls may be equally good, and the difference only exist in the power of propulsion; still, that is sufficient to give an advantage to the racing yacht, and should she be matched against the snugly rigged cruiser, the latter is only likely to distinguish herself when the racer is obliged to take down some reefs.

There is no doubt that match-sailing gives an impetus to yacht-building, and we may safely attribute our present excellence in this particular line to the lively rivalry that has been maintained for the last thirty years among yacht owners. We know many would not keep yachts at all if it were not for racing them; and we have not yet met with the man who, although never racing his yacht, displayed any lack of interest in the sport. The only wonder seems to be that, seeing such a nationally important and extensive institution as yachting receives its primary force from matches, no encouragement, or very scant, should be awarded it in this respect by the State. Queen's Plates are common enough on the turf, and there now they are of little service and little appreciated in these latter days, when anything is better than a "weight for age" race for betting. A Queen's Cup at a yacht club regatta is a thing coveted and contested with zest, and the fortunate winner is sure to ornament his sideboard with the trophy. What the ultimate fate of all the Queen's Plates won on the turf is, we should not like to say; but we may express a fear that they are often only prized for their weight in silver. We should, therefore, like to see a little more Civil List liberality bestowed where it will be more honorably estimated, and be of greater practical service. It would foster no vice, for as yet yacht racing is pure and simple rivalry; and it has not been found necessary to encumber it with betting to make the sport interesting. Crews know no scheme, object, or motive, but to win; and we trust this natural combativeness will be never impaired by such a disastrous stimulant as betting.

We find by "Hunt's Yacht List" that each owner of a yacht out of the two thousand belongs to one or more yacht clubs, and in some instances to as many as nine or ten. But, in reality, many of these clubs have very little to do with yachting beyond having an annual match, and they bid for and accept members like an insurance society. Some of them are very strong in this respect, as no doubt it is considered a good thing by many to find the means of associating with men who can afford to keep yachts so easy a matter as the annual payment of two or three guineas. The oldest yacht club is the Royal Cork, having been founded in 1720; but the club that really became a centre of yachting, and gave to it a vigor and growth was the Royal Yacht Squadron, founded in 1815, at Cowes.

To belong to this club it was necessary to own a yacht of not less than thirty tons, and thus it was strictly "The Yacht Club," as it was originally designated. The Prince Regent was a member of and patronized the club when yachting, and in 1820 gave it right to be termed the "Royal Yacht Club"; in 1833 its title was altered to the "Royal Yacht Squadron," we believe, at the suggestion of its Commodore, the Earl of Yarborough, who was very fond of leading a squadron of yachts in his fine brigantine, Falcon. He, then the Hon. Charles Pelham, was one of the forty who founded the club, and gave nearly all his time and attention to yachting. He certainly thought it the most important and serviceable recreation an English gentleman could indulge in, and his enthusiasm was imitated by the Marquis of Buckingham, Marquis of Thomond, the Earl of Uxbridge, the Earl of Belmore, the Earl of Craven, Lord Vernon, Lord Ponsonby, Mr. J. Weld, and many other noblemen and gentlemen. He was present at the battle of Navarino in the Falcon, and rendered the admiral some service by the conveyance of despatches. He became quite enthusiastic about carrying despatches, and he was often humored; upon one occasion he was directed to convey a despatch by an admiral, who might have felt himself bored, to the commander of a frigate that was cruising away from the fleet. It simply said, "Give Lord Yarborough a good dinner, and he will give you a better in return." So great was his fondness for command afloat, that it was said he offered to build and man a frigate if the Admiralty would give him a commission: but of course such a thing could not be done. He adhered to his favorite pastime to the last and died on board his yacht, Kestrel, at Vigo. A granite monument was afterwards erected to his memory on Bembridge Down, in the Isle of Wight. The Royal Yacht Squadron was found, perhaps, a little too exclusive to extend its benefits to all yachtsmen who seemed by general consent to make the Isle of Wight their rendezvous, and the Royal Victoria Yacht Club at Ryde, became, in consequence, established in 1845.

These two, out of no less than twenty-six clubs, at different places around the coast, are the most important, and are distinctly "yacht" clubs; the Cowes Club is a kind of House of Peers, and the Ryde may represent the House of Commons, and there is, perhaps, a similar distinction between the visitors to each town. The Royal Thames Yacht Club is regarded as a kind of earthly Paradise by the soi-disant yachtsmen, and can boast of more members and a larger fleet of yachts than any other yacht club. Its liberality in giving prizes is almost the sole incentive to yachting on the Thames, and we now annually find some of the largest yachts afloat sailing matches on the river; but the club is growing into a kind of scorn for these ebb-and-flood drifting matches, and sends commissioners, two or three times a year, so far as the Nore to start matches to the French coast. Indeed, not long since, it even attempted a match to Gibraltar; but the Bay of Biscay was a little too much for its yacht-owning members. However, although the Royal Thames Club is so remote from salt water, the true element is in its combination; and its influence is felt wherever a yachting station has been established.

ANTIQUARIAN LOGIC.

A TRUE STORY.

THE recent discovery of Roman antiquities has been followed by a correspondence, the tone of which occasionally reminds one of the disquisitions of Mr. Jonathan Oldbuck. It would be invidious to particularize, where the correspondence is so recent, and where, doubtless, all that has been called forth by a discovery of considerable interest has been written in perfect good faith. But here and there we notice traces of that quality which seems peculiar to the true antiquary, — the power of establishing the widest possible inferences upon the narrowest possible basis of fact.

It may not seem malapropos, therefore, to relate, at this time, a circumstance which rather more than a century ago set all England laughing, and has been made the foundation of two of the most humorous episodes in modern fiction, — the famous "prætorium" scene in the Antiquary, and the story of "Bill Stumps his mark" in Pickwick. Amusing as both those stories are, they yield in interest to the real event on which they are founded. Mr. Oldbuck had but four letters to saddle with a meaning, and although these four (A. D. L. L.) were very amusingly rendered by him into Agricola dicavi libens libens, his views were not met by rival absurdities. The story also halts a little, for it requires a strong exercise of imagination to conceive that one of the "kale-suppers of Fife" should have been at the pains to carve a representation of "Aiken Drum's lang ladle," with the initials of its description appended. There is a similar inconsistency in the story of the stone which bore the sign-manual of the apocryphal Bill Stumps, to say nothing of the forced aspect of Mr. Pickwick's attack of archaeological enthusiasm, which nothing in the recorded conduct of that famous man would have led us to expect.

To turn, however, to the true story, on which these humorous episodes are founded.

Rather more than a century ago, some laborers at work in a marshy heath in Northumberland discovered a fragment of stone which bore marks of squaring, and on which also could be traced a few symbols which seemed to the laborers to represent letters.

They carried this stone to the squire of the parish, who had it cleaned; a process which led to the detection of several more letters, forming with the others an inscription of some sort. But the letters were so badly drawn, and so disfigured by time and ill-usage, that it was not possible to make out very clearly what they were; and as for making any meaning out of their collective force, we shall see presently that that required the exercise of far more learning and ingenuity than were to be looked for from a simple country squire. The inscription appeared to run much in this wise: —

K · E · E · P · O · N · T

H · I · S · S · I · D · E

But the letters, as we have said, were severally indistinct, so that some latitude was permissible in their interpretation.

The squire presently called in the aid of the rector, and together these worthies coned the worn old stone. What theories they formed respecting it, what disputes, perchance, they had over it, history sayeth not; all that is known is, that they were unable to form any satisfactory hypothesis; but feeling certain that the stone was a valuable relic of antiquity, they looked about them for proper authorities to whom they might refer the interpretation of the inscription.

It was at length decided that the parson should take a copy of the inscription, and forward it to the Antiquarian Society, with the request that the members of that learned body would favor the world with their opinion on the relic. Nothing loath, the Society proceeded to debate with their customary accumen upon all the circumstances connected with the stone and its discovery; and not satisfied with this, several members sent in written papers which were duly read before the Society, published in its Proceedings, and copied into most of the public journals of the day.

The first theory was put forward by a writer whom we will call Mr. A. His lucubrations are too valuable to bear mutilation, so we shall give them in his own words.

"On the first examination of this stone," he says, "I was not able to form any satisfactory conjecture concerning the inscription; but as the identity of the place where it was found ought to be materially considered, I wrote to a gentleman of the district for information, if there were any vestiges of antiquity, such as camps, fortifications, or the like in the vicinage. In answer to which inquiry, I was informed that there was nothing of this kind which he knew of, except the ruins of a priory about a mile distant." One might have supposed that A. would have been disheartened at this circumstance, since an inscription having relation to the priory could hardly be expected to have turned up at so considerable a distance from the building itself—or rather its ruins. But so far from being disheartened, A. was perfectly satisfied. "This is indeed sufficient for our purpose," he wrote, "and clears up the matter at once. Clemens (K·L·E·) pontifex (P·O·N·T·) hic jacet (H·I·) sanctus (S·) servus (S·) dei (I·D·E·). The second letter of the inscription is clearly an L, and the I·D·E· a transposition of D·E·I, from the ignorance of the sculptor; the meaning altogether being, that the stone was erected to the memory of one Clement, a dignified brother in the convent. (Literally, Clement the priest here lies, a holy servant of God.) Nothing can be more plain and easy than this."

It may be worth while to dwell a few moments on this interpretation of the inscription, because it embodies one of the most marked peculiarities of antiquarian logic. We notice, first, that a "dignified brother in a convent" could never have been called "pontifex" by his fellow-friars, unless they were remarkably ignorant; and even then, it would be difficult to explain why they should have gone out of their way to adopt a mode of expression which must have been wholly unfamiliar to them. But the coincidence that three letters, which can be taken to stand for the name Clement, should be followed by four which form the natural abbreviation of the title "pontifex" is too much for our antiquary. And when he finds the name and title of the departed brother followed by the usual symbols for hic jacet, confidence gives place to absolute certainty. Otherwise, the difficulty in the last three letters would have proved too serious even for a professed archaeologist. That a sculptor, however ignorant, having to engrave the letters D·E·I, should have begun with the last letter, seems to ordinary minds inconceivable; but to an antiquary who has already formed his theory, the mistake appears the most natural thing in the world. After this, the prava latinitas of the inscription is scarcely worth mentioning as a difficulty.

But A.'s solution was not satisfactory to all his brethren, however plain and easy it appeared to himself. Let us see what B. had to say on the subject. Again we quote the ipseissima verba of the ingenious archaeologist, "I was never so much astonished in my life," says B., "as at the perusal of Mr. A.'s solution of the inscription in question.

What a forced construction! What a preposterous idea! I will grant him that K is often found on monuments of antiquity in place of C; but how, in the name of wonder, could he imagine the two following letters to be L·E, which are plainly Æ? But the cream of the jest I·D·E·, a transposition of D·E·I." B. is very ready, it will be noticed, to point the finger of scorn at the theory of his brother antiquary; he is equally ready to put forward his own solution of the difficulty.

Let us see whether it is as plain and easy as A.'s. We must premise, however, that he had the advantage over A. in having actually visited the spot where the stone had been discovered, and the ruins of the supposed priory. "On a personal survey," he writes, "I have discovered that the stone was found near an old Roman military road. Here, indeed, we have a light thrown upon the subject which will clear up all manner of difficulty. First, K is often found in inscriptions for C, and here standing for Cælius, — Æ, ædilis, an officer whose business it was to see the roads kept in proper order; P·O·N·T·, pontem, H·I· Hadriani (the same person who built the wall to prevent the incursions of the Picts, — thence called Hadrian's Wall); I·S·S·I·, jussu, the first u and the former part of the latter u being obliterated; D·E·, demolisit. (In all, Cælius ædilis, Hadriani jussu, pontem demolisit, — Cælius the ædile, by the order of Hadrian, demolished the bridge.") Nor does B. fail to assign a reason for the demolition of the bridge, a fact which at first sight might seem surprising. The morasses had been drained, it appears, and thus "the bridge was rendered unnecessary." As for the priory, that had no existence except in the brain of A., for the ruins belong to the old bridge, says B.

It is possible that, had B.'s interpretation come first, A. would have found as much to laugh at in it as B. found in A.'s. He was in all probability preparing to demolish the new theory, and to rehabilitate his own, when a third hypothesis was set up by C., who scoffed at the two former views as "the most ridiculous that ever entered the head of an antiquary." C. remarks that, in inscriptions such as this one, each letter must be taken to represent a word. Just as Mr. Oldbuck found a word for each letter of the inscription A·D·L·L., so C. boldly constructs a complete sentence from the fourteen letters of the Northumberland stone. "I have taken," he says, "the most obvious and generally received meaning of the initials, and find the solution to stand thus: "Cæsar ex edicto per orbem nuntiatur templum hic instauratum sacrum sibi ipsi dicatum est"; that is, "Through the edict of Cæsar, it is announced over the world that the temple here erected is consecrated to himself." Here we find Cæsar, — after having, like Hercules, finished the greatest of his labors, — after having extended his conquests over the Britons, usually called fierce and indomitable, — erecting a temple on the limits of his ambition, and, flushed with victory, assuming the honors of a god! "This," he adds, "is the most easy and natural construction, and perfectly consonant with the precise terms in which their inscriptions were generally couched. We need no other proof to convince us of the certainty of the fact; but, as a corroborating testimony, if we look into Horace, we shall find a passage, evidently referring to this very circumstance: —

'The rank of God Augustus shall obtain,
With wild Britannia added to his reign.'"

C. does not explain how it is that history has omitted to record the fact that Augustus had "extended his conquests over the Britons, usually called fierce and indomitable," or had indeed ever set foot in Britain. Apparently oblivious of this somewhat important omission, he dwells enthusiastically on the historical value of the antique relic dug up in Northumberland. "What," he asks, "would a Camden or a Holinshed have given to have traced the footsteps of Augustus Cæsar so far as the northernmost parts of the Brigantes (one of the divisions of the country under the Romans), or to have seen him introducing the Roman temple into Britain!" For C., like B., had been at the pains to visit the northern shire, in order to examine the now celebrated ruins, and he had come to the conclusion that both A. and B. had been mistaken as to the character of the stones. "They bear a much greater resemblance to the remains of an old temple," he says, "especially one which has the uncouth figure of a sword upon it."

C's labors were not unappreciated by the learned body to which he had sent them; for we find that he was at once elected as a member of the Antiquarian Society, and without a single dissentient voice!

And now there seemed nothing to prevent D., E., F., and all the other letters of the alphabet, from having their own account to give of the interesting relic. An inscription which had been so satisfactorily interpreted in three different ways might fairly be held to admit of other meanings; and as each new inquirer met with increased attention, there is every reason for believing that the world would have profited by an extended series of labors on the subject of the relic, but for an unforeseen and disastrous catastrophe.

It had not occurred either to B. or C. to make any inquiries respecting the treasure-trove in the neighborhood of the place where the stone was found; whether they feared that others might step in and reap the reward due to their own labors, or from whatever cause, certain it is that they carried on their investigations with the most profound secrecy, until the time had come to divulge a theory — totus, teres, atque rotundus — to the outer world. But the results of their labors were too remarkable to remain unnoticed, even so far north as Northumberland; and thus it came to pass that in the course of time the news of the great discoveries which were being made reached the place where the stone had been found. An aged schoolmaster, amongst others, read in the papers of the day, or heard from some of his neighbors, about all the great things which had been done by the Society of Antiquaries. It is clear from the sequel that he must have been a man lost to all sense of the dignity of science. Had he but held his tongue, the world might still have admired the learning and the acumen with which our forefathers had dealt with an interesting relic of antiquity. But this hard-hearted and unfeeling old man would not hold his tongue; and it unfortunately happened that he was but too well acquainted with the real history of the stone. He remembered, he said, a kind-hearted cottager who had lived near the morass in which the stone was found. This cottager, anxious to warn all whom it might concern of the dangerous condition of the road in the neighborhood of the morass, had been at the pains to carve upon a stone the injunction, "Keep on this side." But, like Bill Stubbs, the cottager was not an adept in the art of chiselling inscriptions, and accordingly the result of his labors was of a dubious character; and being valued rather according to its merits than according to the good-will of the carver, had been presently flung into the morass. Thence it had been dug out, under the influence of some malign star, to bring confusion and ridicule upon the learned antiquaries of England.

AN EXPERIENCE.

IN TWO CHAPTERS. — CHAPTER I.

It was on a warm, early June afternoon that I was called into the consulting-room to see her.

It was out of the usual hours for seeing patients, and I remember that I resented the interruption, and the irregularity; for I was busy in the anatomical department of the hospital, deep in the study of an extraordinarily interesting specimen of — but you won't care for these details.

However, when I read the note of introduction she had brought with her, I was reconciled to the disturbance; the rather, because it seemed that just such a case as we had long been lying in wait for now presented itself.

I was then young; an enthusiast in my profession, full of faith in science and in one whom I will call Dr. Fearnwell, under whom I had chiefly studied; without any consciousness of other kind of faith.

I was ambitious; up to this time, iron-nerved and hard-headed; possibly I should add hard-hearted. Yet I don't know that I was specially callous, careless, or cruel. It was more because such culture as I had had was exclusively of the head, that I knew nothing about having a heart, than that I did not care to have one.

I believed myself to have, and I gloried in having, unusual power of brain. As many men I knew, boasted of the many hours they could run, row, or ride, I boasted of the many hours I could read hard and work hard. I had never spared myself, and, up to this time of which I write, had never had any warning that it might be wise to do so.

I dimly suspect, however, that this warning was on its way, that even without the shock of which I am going to tell, some crash would have come.

I remember that when I was interrupted to read the note which the porter brought me, the perspiration was streaming from my forehead. And yet the afternoon, though warm, was not sultry. And I had been employed in a way that called for extreme delicacy and accuracy of investigation and observation, not for physical force.

"Won't you wash your hands, sir, first? It's a woman and a child," was the suggestion of the good-hearted porter.

Though with some muttered expletives against the folly of such "fiddle-faddle," I took the man's hint, and also buttoned my coat over my shirt-front, and pushed my wristbands up out of sight.

The venetian-blinds were down in the consulting-room, for the afternoon sun poured against its windows. Thus, until my eyes a little accustomed themselves to the dimness of the room, I could not well distinguish its occupants.

After a few moments I saw the palest woman, of the most corpse-like pallor, I ever, before or since, beheld. She was seated near a table, with a female child of some two or three years old upon her knees.

She did not rise when I went in. Possibly — probably — she could not. A woman with a face like that could hardly stand up and hold so large a child. She wore a widow's cap, its border brought so close round her face as hardly to show an indication of hair. Her eyebrows were dark, at once decided and delicate; her eyelashes were peculiarly long and full, still darker than the brows, and almost startlingly conspicuous on the dead white of a fair-skinned face. Not even on her lips was there now any tinge of other color.

The child upon her knees was a little miracle of exquisite loveliness. But I noticed little of this then.

At the first moment of being in this woman's presence, I felt some slight embarrassment. I had expected to see "a common person." I felt that about this woman there was something, in all senses, uncommon.

My embarrassment was not lessened by the steady earnestness with which she fixed her deep dark eyes on mine, nor by the first words she spoke, slowly moving those white lips:—

"You are very young; surely it is not to you the letter I brought was addressed! You are very young."

The voice was the fit voice to come from such a corpse-like face. It was not her ordinary voice, any more than was her ordinary (or could have been any living woman's ordinary) complexion.

I was still young enough to be annoyed at looking "very young." I was impatient of my own embarrassment under her searching study of my face. I answered, rather roughly:—

"My time is valuable; let me know what I can do for you,—unless, indeed, you think me 'too young' to do anything."

"It may be the better that you are so young," she said. There had been no relaxation in her study of me, and her voice now was a little more like a natural voice,—like her natural voice, as I afterwards learned to know it only too well; soft and sweet, a slow and measured, but intense music. "Being so young, you must remember something of your mother's love. It is not likely your mother loved you as I love this child of mine; still, no doubt, she loved you; and you, remembering her love, may have some pity left in you for all mothers. This child of mine is all I have, my only hold on hope in this world, or in another. Life does not seem long enough to love her in; without her, one day's life would seem impossible."

Striving against the awe that would steal over me, looking into that solemn face, fixed by those deep, still eyes, hearing that solemn voice, I said, with brusque impatience,—

"I have told you my time is valuable. If you wish me to do anything, at once tell me what."

"Have you not read the letter I brought?"

"I have; but that explains nothing."

"My child is lame."

"That much I know."

"I am ready to answer any questions about what you do not know."

Then I questioned her as to the nature, extent, and what she thought probable cause of her child's lameness. She answered always in few, fit words. I examined the child, she watching me with those deep, still eyes of hers. My heightened color, my increasing animation, my eager looks, seemed to stir her a little.

My interest was thoroughly roused. This was exactly such a case as we desired to experiment upon,—a case in which to try a new operation, on the success of which, under fair conditions, I was ready to stake all I cared for in life. She, with that monstrous egotism of maternity, mistook me so far as that she took my interest to be concentrated on this one sufferer.

"Can she be cured?" was asked so hungrily by the whole face that there was no need for the lips to form the words.

"Yes, yes, yes!" I answered, with joyous triumphant confidence. "She can be cured! She shall be! She shall walk as well as the best of us."

Before I knew what was happening,—not that there was any quickness of movement, but that I was utterly unprepared for any such demonstration,—the woman was on her knees at my feet. With one hand she held the child; with the other she had taken my hand, on which she pressed her lips.

There was a speechless rapture over her face and the most exquisite soft flush upon it, as she did this.

A queer feeling came over me, as I awkwardly withdrew my hand,—my hand that for a long time afterwards tingled with consciousness of the touch of the woman's lips.

She rose, with no awkwardness, no haste; re-seated herself, bent over, and kissed her child.

The child had been always watching us, its soft, serious, unchildlike eyes fixed sometimes on me, and sometimes on its mother. I had never before, and have never since, seen anything like that child's eyes. They—but why voluntarily recall them, when the effort of my life for so long, was to keep them from always floating before me.

Suddenly the woman's face resumed its deadly pallor.

"Will it be very painful?" she asked.

"That is as you will."

"What do you mean?"

I explained. It was my advice that she should let her child be put to sleep with the then newly discovered agent, chloroform.

"Is there danger in it?"

"None,—if the stuff is carefully administered, as, I need not say, it shall be to your child. You can understand how difficult it is to keep a child still enough under pain to give an operator a fair chance."

"It would be difficult with any other child, perhaps: with mine it is not difficult. She is so docile, so patient; she would keep still, and bear uncomplainingly anything I asked her to bear. She has already undergone great agony from a fruitless attempt at cure. But, of course, if, indeed, there is no danger, I would wish"—here she paused—"O, the weak folly of words! to save my darling pain."

"Do you judge your child to have a good constitution? The extreme debility you speak of is preternatural."

She answered me eagerly, assuring me that her child, except for this lameness, which she considered to be, not the result of constitutional disease, but of an accident, had always had perfect health. She added,—

"You are too young for me to tell my story to, or I might, by the circumstances of her birth, account to you for her extreme docility."

I then questioned her as to what had been done in attempt to cure the child, and I blamed her for not having at first come to us.

With perfect simplicity she gave me the incredible answer that she had never, till a few weeks since, heard of "us." Then, when she had replied to all my questions, seeming to win confidence in me because of my confidence in cure, she spoke to me, with quiet intensity, of the child's peculiar preciousness to her.

To this I listened, or seemed to listen, patiently.

I was conscious that she was speaking to me; I was also conscious of her child's eyes watching me; but while she spoke and the child watched, I was arranging for the operation, the when, the how, all the details. There were difficulties in my way, obstacles to be surmounted. I was not at all sure of winning Dr. Fearnwell's consent that this child should be the first subject upon which the new operation should be tried. Dr. Fearnwell had said, I remembered, "We must first try this on some coarsely born child, some child of robust peasant parents; some child, too, who, should its life be sacrificed, would be, poor little wretch! no loss, and no great loser."

I had more faith in Dr. Fearnwell always, than Dr. Fearnwell had in himself. I had, also, more faith in science than the more experienced man had. Besides this, Dr. Fearnwell was of extreme sensitiveness and tender-heartedness; his hand could be firmer than any, and his courage cooler, but he required first to be convinced of the unquestionable beneficence of the torture he inflicted.

Dr. Fearnwell's seeing this child beforehand would be a risk (when I looked at it with Dr. Fearnwell's eyes, I recognized its extreme fragility), but his hearing the mother speak of it, and of its extreme preciousness to her, would be fatal. He would warn, and question, and caution, till the woman's courage would fail; he would think it better that the widow should keep her lame child, than run the risk of losing it to cure its lameness. He was quite capable of telling her that this lameness would not kill, and that the attempt to cure it might; and then how could one expect a poor, weak, selfish woman to decide?

Once interested in the woman, Dr. Fearnwell would think nothing of the glory to science, and the gain to the human race, of successful operation, compared with the loss to this woman if she should lose her child.

This "weakness" (so I thought it) of Dr. Fearnwell's filled me with something as like contempt as it was possible for me to feel towards one who was my hero. Against it, I determined as far as possible to protect him. Though I had no consciousness that the child's eyes touched me, I knew how they would appeal to Dr. Fearnwell.

While the mother talked, therefore, I was scheming and contriving. I received the sounds of her words on my ear, and they conveyed corresponding ideas to my brain; for afterwards I knew things she then, and only then, told me. But at the time I heard without hearing, in the same way that we often see without seeing, things that vividly reproduce themselves afterwards.

"When can it be done?"

That question brought her speaking and my thinking to a pause.

"Do you stay here long?"

"Not longer than is needful for my child. I am poor. It is dear living in a strange place. But anything that is needful for my child is possible."

"If it can be done at all, it shall be done within the week."

"If it can be done at all!" You said it could be done; you said it should be done."

The way in which this was said, the look in the eyes with which it was said, revealed something of the stormy possibilities of this woman's nature.

"I spoke with indiscreet haste when I said it could and should be done. There are many difficulties."

I then explained the nature of those difficulties in the manner I thought most politic, and most calculated to induce her to connive with me in overcoming them. I dwelt much on the morbid oversensitiveness which would paralyze the hand of the good doctor, were she to speak to him as she had spoken to me about the extreme preciousness of her child.

She studied my face with a new intensity; then she said, —

"He need know nothing about me. I need not see him till all is arranged. The child can, for him, be anybody's child."

"Exactly what I would desire. I am glad to find you so sensible. Bring the child here to-morrow morning, at ten."

White to the lips again, she faltered, —

"You don't mean that it will be done to-morrow?"

"No, no, no. No such luck as that," I answered, impatiently. "There are preliminaries to be gone through. The child will have to be examined by a council of surgeons. All that is nothing to you. Bring her to me, here, at ten to-morrow. That is all I ask of you. This is my name," — giving her a card. "You, know from the superscription of the note you brought me, that my name is Bertram Dowlass. You may trust me to do the best I can for you."

She rose to take leave.

The quiet intensity of her gratitude, and her implicit, patient belief in me did not touch me. I let these things pass me by; there was no contact.

"I have no claim whatever on your gratitude," was my most true answer to what she said. "It is not the cure of your child that I care about, but the proof that human skill, aided by science, can cure thousands."

She smiled slightly, in gentle deprecation of my self-injustice, — perhaps, too, in incredulity of my indifference towards her child.

That was the end of our first interview.

All the rest of that day I worked with divided attention, and with a strange unsettled feeling. This was a new experience, and it made me uneasy. Ordinarily I was my own master. I now put on the screw as I had never had to do before, and with little result beyond a painful sense of strain and effort.

It was natural that I should be under some excitement. I would not own to myself that my excitement was more than natural; nor would I, for an instant, listen to any internal suggestion that it had any other cause than that to which I chose to attribute it.

At the appointed time next morning, she brought the child.

There was no quailing yet, as I had feared there might be. She was still intent upon the cure, still full of confidence in me.

When she gave the small soft creature into my hold, and it put one of its little arms round my neck, voluntarily, confidingly, I experienced a sensation I had never before known.

It turned out as I had expected. I had a hard battle to fight; my patience and temper were pretty well tried.

Dr. Fearnwell took the small being upon his knee, stroked its hair, looked into its eyes, felt its arms, and declared that this was not a safe case for operation; that the child was too delicate.

I and one or two others, equally bent on testing the new discovery, at last overruled his judgment, and carried our point, — not till I was conscious of the perspiration standing in great beads on my forehead. I do not know that I exactly lied about the little thing, but I deliberately allowed Dr. Fearnwell to suppose that the child's position was such that it had far better die than live a cripple, — possibly had better die than live at all; that it was a child whose existence in the world was an inconvenience rather than anything else, and a constant memorial of what was best forgotten.

I was flushed with triumph when I returned to Mrs. Rosscar, — so she called herself, — bearing the child in my arms.

"With the sweat of my brow, I have earned the healing of your child," I said to her, as I wiped my forehead.

She was standing up close to the door; her arms eagerly received the burden of mine; her tongue made me no answer, but her face replied to me.

"On Monday at eleven," I told her. "This is Thursday. In the intervening days keep your child as quiet as you can: give her as much fresh air and as much nourishing food as you can. Dr. Fearnwell sent you this" — slipping five sovereigns into her hand — "to help to pay your expenses. He will help you as much as you may find necessary. He is rich and kind. You need have no scruples."

The money was my own; it would have been more, but that I was short of funds just then. Her face had flushed.

"I take the money for my child's sake. I thank him for my child's sake," she said, proudly.

I was now waiting for her to go.

The door of the room was open; she stood facing the opening, and the light from the great stair-window fell full upon her.

For the first time I noted her great beauty.

She was still young, I dare say, but hers was not the beauty that depends upon the first freshness of youth. It was the beauty of perfectly harmonious proportion. Her form was at least as perfect as her countenance. She had the most statuesque grace I ever saw in living woman, as she stood there holding her child, — holding it with no more effort than a Hebe shows in holding the cup of nectar.

Her deep, still eyes were fastened upon me. A curious shock went through me, even before she spoke.

Her face had now again that extreme pallor, such as I had never seen on any other living face.

"On Monday, at eleven," she repeated. Her marble pale lips seemed stiffening to marble rigidity. They seemed to form the words with difficulty. "You would not deceive me? There is not more danger than you tell me? Forgive me; but, now it is settled, my heart seems turning to ice. You would not deceive me? I know something of the callousness, the cruelty, of men; but this would be too cruel. In all this world I have, as I have told you, nothing but this," hugging the child, as she spoke, closer to that breast whose superb lines were not to be wholly hidden by the heavy muffling weeds she wore. "I have nothing but this to hope for, to work for, to live for. This is all I have saved from the past, all that is left to me in the future."

Her delicate, dark brows gathered themselves threateningly over her intense eyes, as she added, in a soft, deep voice, —

"There would be one thing left for me to do if I lost my child, — one thing, and only one. To curse the hand — whether it were the hand of God or of man — that took her from me."

I answered her coldly, as far as I could, carelessly. I steeled myself against the tragic truth of her words; but I was conscious of a creeping of my flesh.

"Madam," I said, "you are at liberty to change your mind. All arrangements that have been made can be unmade. I would, however, advise you to avoid agitating the child."

This drew her eyes from mine to the small face on her breast. She had not raised her voice, had not indulged in any gesture; had not betrayed, except in the blanching of her face and the intense passion of her eyes, her agitation; the child was too young to understand her words. And yet, as we both looked at it now, its lips had parted, its face had flushed, its eyes and mouth and chin were quivering with emotion.

Perhaps the little creature was distressed by the vibrations of its mother's strongly pulsating heart, against which it was held so closely.

She bent over it, held her face against its face, murmured soothing sounds. I was holding the door open. She now passed out without another word, and began to descend the stairs.

I stood looking after her; my eyes were caught by the glorious great knot of bright hair, which, all pulled back from her face, escaped from her bonnet behind. A slanting beam from the window had touched and fired it as she passed down the stairs.

Half-way down she stopped, turned, and looked back and up at me. When the mother looked, her child looked too. They remained so for perhaps half a minute.

How often afterwards, in dreams of the night, in waking visions of the dark, and worse, far worse, in the broad daylight and peopling the sunshine, looking up from the grass, or from the water, looking forth from the trees, or from the flowers, hovering between her and other faces, did I meet those haunting eyes; the two pairs of eyes, so like in their difference, gazing at me with varying expressions of appeal, reproach, agony, or — worst of all — resignation!

"Good evening, Mrs. Rosscar."

I turned back into the room, but could not hinder myself, a few moments after, from looking out to see if she were still there. She was gone.

During the Friday and Saturday intervening between that day and the Monday, I hardly thought of the mother and child. I thought constantly, and with feverish eagerness, of the operation, and of the triumph of its success; but I did not realize the quivering agony of body and spirit — the child's body (even if all sensation were deadened for the moments of operation, there must be keen suffering afterwards), the mother's spirit — implied even in success. As to failure, I did not admit its possibility.

On the Sunday I was restless. I felt it needful to do something. I could not apply to book study, and from the more practical part of study the day shut me off. I got on board one of the river steamers, not designing anything but to get out in the country, and have a good walk. But the first person my eye fell on, when I looked round the crowded deck, was Mrs. Rosscar, her child, of course, in her arms.

For a moment I felt afraid lest this might mean that my patient was escaping me.

"Where are you going?" I asked her, abruptly.

"I do not know," she answered, with her quiet voice and rare smile. "You recommended me to give the child all the air I could. I thought of landing at one of the pleasant green places, and sitting about in the fields for a few hours, and then taking the evening boat back again. I thought, at some farmhouse or small inn, I could get some food for her,—at all events, milk and eggs and bread and butter."

I was standing on the deck in front of her. I said, what suddenly occurred to me,—

"You are much too beautiful and too young to go about alone in this way, among such people."

"I dare say I am beautiful, and I know I am not old; but my beauty is not of the sort to draw on me the impertinence of common people. I am not young in my soul. I know how to protect myself."

"If you don't mind my company, I'll manage for you. You are not strong enough to slave about with that weight always in your arms. You can do it, I know; but you should not overtax your strength to-day; your nerves should be in good order to-morrow."

She blanched, suddenly, to that absolute pallor again.

"Will they let me be in the room? Will they let her lie in my lap?" she asked.

I shook my head.

"In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred this would not answer, though it might in yours; it is difficult to make exceptions."

She gave a patient sigh, sat some time with her eyes fixed on the gliding shore, then said, looking at me again,—

"Will it take long?"

"O no, no, a very short time,—a few moments."

"And she will feel no pain?"

"None."

She said, as if to herself, her eyes subsiding from my face to settle on the shore again,—

"After all, God is sometimes merciful. I almost feel as if I could love him. When these little feet"—touching them with a tender hand—"walk, I will try with all my soul to love him."

I don't know what possessed me this day. I laid aside all my habitual shyness. I hardly thought of exposing myself to the ridicule of my colleagues, should I encounter any of them. But thinking of this chance, I glanced at Mrs. Rosscar's dress, trying to discover how she would strike a stranger, and to what rank she would be supposed to belong.

Of the dress I could make nothing; it was all deep and long-worn mourning. As far as I could tell, nothing of her station could be learned from her dress.

She was standing. She had moved to the side of the vessel, a little way apart from me. She was pointing out something to the child. From the poise of her head, down all the lines of her form, to the firmly planted, beautiful foot, from which, by times, the wind swept back the drapery, there was something regal about her. The child was daintily dressed in white; it looked all soft swan's-down and delicate embroideries. It might, I thought, have been a queen's child.

I went to her side, and proposed that we should land at the first stopping-place, and take a row-boat. She agreed. She would have agreed to anything I proposed; she had a feeling that the child's life was in my hand. So we were soon gliding along the shady bank of the river,—she and I and the child,—sometimes among the water-lilies and close to the swans, sometimes almost touched by drooping boughs, sometimes for a moment held entangled by the sedges. All very silent.

Mrs. Rosscar was one of those women who have a talent for silence, and, more than that, who seem hardly to need speech. To-day she was content to watch the child. The child sat on her knees, with musing eyes and tranquil face, watching the gliding water.

Now and then the child smiled up into the mother's face; now and then the mother bent over and kissed the child; there seemed no need, between them, for any other kind of speech. That child's smile was of the most wonderful, sad sweetness. It was the loveliest and tenderest expression. I did not then, you must understand, consciously note all the things I speak of as I go along; they returned upon me afterwards. I had time enough, in time to come, to remember the past. Time enough, Heaven knows!

Early in the afternoon, we stopped at a comparatively unfrequented place, and dined.

Mrs. Rosscar's quiet, undemonstrative, and yet pleased and grateful, acceptance of all my services, her acquiescence in all I proposed, did not seem to me strange. The day was altogether a dream-day. I was in the sort of mood in which to find myself the hero of a fairy-tale's adventures would hardly have surprised me; a most unwonted mood for me.

I have thought about it since, and wondered if she acted as she did from inexperience, or from indifference. Was she ignorant, or was she careless, as to what might be concluded about her? I believe the fact was that she thought neither of herself, nor of me, but merely of "a good day" for the child.

She laid aside her bonnet, and her cap with it, before she sat down to table, showing that wealth of brown hair, and, what much more interested me, that head fit to be the head of a goddess. "And yet," I thought, "she seems a very ordinary woman; she seems, even more foolishly than most women, absorbed and satisfied by the possession of a child."

In laying aside her bonnet and cap, she had laid aside, also, her shapeless cloak; her close-fitting black dress displayed the lines of shoulders, bust, and waist, fit to be those of that same goddess.

She was a splendid woman. The well-formed white soft hands made me conclude that she was also, by conventional rank, a lady.

We returned as we had come; only that the sunset mirrored in the river, the swans, the sedges, the rippling run of the water, the capricious warm breathings of the soft wind seemed, yet more than the morning brightness, things of a dream. We reached the widow's lodging at about the child's bedtime.

She did not ask me to go in, but I went in.

She told the child to thank me for "a happy, happy time," which the little thing did with a prettiness pathetic to think of afterwards, adding, of her own accord, —

"And for showing me the lilies and the pretty swans."

The mother hung on her words with rapture, and then, raising her face to mine, said, —

"If you make my child able to walk in the warm sunny grass, on her own little feet, I will learn to believe in a loving God, that I may call his choicest blessings down upon you. I will entreat him to prosper you in all your doings, to gladden your whole life, to let the love of women and of little children sweeten all your days."

I pressed, in parting, the hand she held out to me. After I had left her, her last words went echoing through my brain.

When I got home I tried to apply myself to hard study, — quite vainly. But I do not think that she, alone, was responsible for this. I believe that, just at the time when I first met her, my brain was on the point of giving in, and of resenting the strain of some years.

This phase, at all events, of my collapse, had a strange deliciousness about it. Soft thoughts and sweet fancies thronged upon me. I gave myself up to them, weary of the effort of self-mastery.

Again and again, as I fell asleep, I was gliding softly down a sunny river. I seemed to hear the dip and splash of oars, to feel the movement of the boat under the impulse given by them, and then the words, "May the love of women and of little children sweeten all your days!" sounded in my ears with such distinctness, and seemed to come from a voice so near, that I awoke with a start, and a feeling that I should see the speaker standing beside my bed, and that I had felt her breath upon my brow.

Then, like a fool as I was, I lay thinking of the woman who had spoken those words. "What a rich, low voice she has; what sweet deep eyes she has; what a shapely foot she has; what a splendid form it is; what a soft, white, steady hand she has!"

"Yes," I then said to myself, trying to deceive myself. "She would make a first-rate hospital nurse; strong, calm, gentle, wise."

Next day, a day of intense excitement to me, the operation was performed. It was successfully performed. Everything that happened at about this time, after that Sunday on the river, seems wrapped in a dream-haze.

But I have a distinct recollection that Dr. Fearnwell said to me, "Dowlass, you are over-doing it; I don't like the look of your eyes; take a holiday." But whether this was before the operation, or after it, I don't know. I know that I made him some jesting answer, and laughed at his grave concern.

I know that late in that day, when I first saw Mrs. Rosscar after the operation, her expression of her passionate joy and gratitude made me half delirious with an uncomprehended feeling, — and that part of it was fear.

The child, after the operation, was placed in one of the wards of the hospital. The mother left it neither night nor day. I had prevailed in getting this exception to rule allowed; and for this her gratitude was almost as great as for our other success.

Through the day after the operation, and the day following that, I often stole a few moments to go and look at the little patient sufferer, and at the joy-illuminated, radiant face of the mother. The more radiant the mother's face was, and the more entirely all seemed well, the more I felt afraid.

When, on the third day, the child sank — died in its sleep — I knew it was of that I had been afraid.

I cannot even now account for the child's death. It should have lived and grown strong; there was no inflammation; the success of the operation was perfect.

Perhaps it was a child born not to live. Perhaps the constant presence of its mother made it keep up too strong a strain of self-control for its strength. It must have suffered, but it did not moan, or cry, or give any sign of suffering, except what was to be read on the often-damp brow and in the over-dilated eyes. "Eyes!" Yes. It is always "eyes." Eyes are always haunting me. Often the child's eyes, as they looked up at me, when I bent over it. I have fancied since that it would have spoken to me then, complained of pain, but for the mother being always close and within hearing. I have fancied since that it looked at me with that intent look, hoping that I should understand.

A poor sickly tree — I think a sycamore — grew outside one of the windows of the ward in which the child lay. It was swaying and swinging in the evening wind and evening sunlight, and its shadow was waving to and fro on the child's bed when I went into the ward on the afternoon of that third day.

The child liked to watch the shadow and had begged not to have the blind pulled down.

"Had I best wake her?" Mrs. Rosscar asked me, the moment I approached the bed. She was looking strained to-day, and anxious. "It is rather long since she took nourishment. And last time she was awake, I thought she seemed more weak and faint than she has seemed since Monday."

"When was she last awake?"

Mrs. Rosscar looked at her watch.

"Half an hour and three minutes ago; but she took nothing then, for she smiled at me, and then dozed off, just as I was going to give her her arrow-root and wine. It is an hour and a half since she had anything."

"By all means wake her," I said. It struck me that her little face looked pinched and cold. "The sleep of exhaustion will do her no good," I added.

Mrs. Rosscar bent her face over the child's face. I stood by, with my heart striking sledge-hammer blows against me.

"Mamma wants her darling to wake up and take some wine," she said, with her cheek lying against the child's cheek.

No movement or murmur of reply.

Lifting her head, and looking into my face, she said, in what then seemed to me an awful voice, —

"She is very cold!"

I pushed the mother aside, I bent over the child, I felt for its pulse, watched for its breath. In vain.

I ordered flannels to be heated, and the little body to be wrapped in them and rubbed with them. I tried every means I knew of for restoring animation.

In vain.

While the mother was preparing food for it, the child, having smiled at her, had fallen into a doze. That doze was the doze of death.

When we desisted from our efforts to wake it, and left the poor tortured little body in peace, Mrs. Rosscar, who had been kneeling by the bed, rose. She stood motionless and speechless for moments that seemed to me no portion of time, but an experience of eternity.

I resolved that I would not meet her eyes; but she was the stronger willed, and our eyes did meet. I shrank; I shivered; I looked, I know, abject, craven, self-convicted. I felt I was the murderer she thought me.

Slowly, with her eyes on mine which watched her with a horrible fascination, she lifted her grand arms, and clasped her hands above her head.

The uplifted arms, the awful eyes, the indefinite horror of that pause before speech were enough for me.

As her lips opened, to give utterance to the first words of her curse, I, lifting my own arms, as if to ward off from my head an imminent blow (they told me afterwards of these things), and struggling for power to articulate some deprecation,—I, meeting her eyes with unspeakable horror in my own, staggered a moment, then fell, as if she had struck me down.

BOYS.

PHYSIOLOGISTS, we believe, have discovered, or at any rate have demonstrated, that there are facts to justify the poet in holding the gray barbarian lower than the Christian child. The Caucasian brain, they say, even in its earliest stage of development, is shown by its convolutions to be as highly organized a structure as the brain of the adult negro, and by the time the period of childhood is reached it is on a level with that of the Mongol. It may be that this line of investigation, when pushed a little further, will throw some light upon a question which has from time immemorial puzzled parents and guardians, perplexed legislators and magistrates, and generally troubled society. Why should that section of man's life commonly known as boyhood be distinguished by that bitter hostility to civilization and order which is only too frequently shown to be its leading characteristic? Why should it be impossible to take up a newspaper without finding that two boys, aged nine and ten respectively, have been endeavoring to upset an excursion-train by placing obstacles of some sort on the rails, or flinging stones at it from a bridge, like Masters Hall and Hustin a week or two ago, or attempting to set fire to a dwelling-house, or blowing up a letter-box, or burning down a bobbin-mill, like those amiable youths at Barnsley the other day, or beating a little girl to death for wearing green ribbons, like those others at Manchester, or engaged in some other enterprise which had for its object the destruction of life or property, or both? Why should it be that, when agitators in London or Paris want to get up a little disturbance and intimidate or annoy society, they can always get any number of boys to overset kiosks, or pull down railings, or smash lamps and windows, and perform other services the mere performance of which is obviously a sufficient reward for the labor? If there be anything in the theory we have mentioned, it offers an explanation of this mystery. If the civilized man in arriving at maturity does really pass through stages corresponding with the various degrees of moral development to be found in the human family, and if in babyhood he is to be considered the analogue of the negro, then, assuredly, in boyhood he is the representative of the Red Indian. This fact—which, by the way, that acute philosopher Sam Weller seems to have had an inkling when he charged a boy with behaving "with as much politeness as a wild Indian"—cannot of course be considered as fairly established until a boy and a Choctaw have been placed side by side and dissected by some competent anatomist; but in the mean time we have abundance of collateral evidence tending to support it. Of all human beings the boy and the red man are the only two to whom cruelty per se is a pleasure.

With some others the infliction of pain may be to some extent an element in the pleasure derived from a sport, but with the boy and the red man it is a sport in itself. All experienced travellers are agreed as regards the one, and as to the other, I quote the words of Mr. Lecky in his History of Morals, "few persons who have watched the habits of boys would question that to take pleasure in giving at least some degree of pain is sufficiently common." Nevertheless, in the one case, as in the other, society has always indulged in a deceptive sentimentalism. We hear people talk of the fine free, generous nature of boys, just as we hear them talk of the noble red man of the forest, the noble savage, the gentleman of nature, &c., when they really mean a greasy, whooping, screeching, tomhawking savage. In the second place, the boy and the red man are the only two varieties of the human animal that evince an implacable enmity to civilization, and upon whose natures it fails to exercise any influence for good. The difference in this respect is merely one of opportunity and circumstance. The Indian has comparatively few chances of declaring his sentiments. The utmost he can do is to massacre a family of settlers now and then, or, just at present, tear up a piece of Pacific Railway, and scalp a few station-masters and stokers. The boy, on the other hand, has a much wider range of opportunities, but he is unable to make use of them in the same complete and satisfactory manner. Society is rather too strong for him, and the expression of his feelings, though varied in kind, is limited in degree.

In studying any animal we must, of course, take that variety which on the whole appears to be most typical and least affected by disturbing influences. It would be idle to expect sound deductions as to the nature of the ox from an examination of a stalled shorthorn, or of the dog from an inquiry into the habits of a puppet-show "Toby." So for purposes of boy-study we must not select a specimen cowed, subdued, stiffened, and made unnaturally gentlemanlike under the system of a Dr. Blimber, but rather go to some breed less widely removed from the natural animal, such as, for instance, that which the penny-a-liner, with his usual flowery infelicity, insists upon calling the "street Arab"—the most monstrous, perhaps, even of his misnomers, for if there is a being in every respect the opposite of the grave, decorous, reverential Arab, it is the boy of the streets. No one who has observed him with any degree of attention can doubt that warfare against society is what he lives for, or that, if he had only the power, any member of society, say a policeman, would fare just as badly in his hands as a stray Salt Lake emigrant in those of a war party of Arapahoes. The policeman, to be sure, is an extreme case, for, besides the natural hatred due to him as an adult and a member of society, he is odious to the street-boy from the nature of his duties. He is hated not only as a man but as a policeman, for it is always his unfortunate function to stand between the boy and his dearest pleasures. Whenever there is a fire, or a fight, or an upset, or run-over, or any other opportunity for the contemplation of suffering or loss to the sons of men, just as the boy is at the very height of his enjoyment the policeman is sure to appear, drive him back, and interpose a form aggravatingly bulky and opaque between him and the sight which was affording him unmixed gratification. This conduct is especially irritating at a fire, for it may be observed that boys always take a peculiar interest in a fire. They have somehow got into a way of regarding it as something specially got up for their entertainment, and indeed of all ordinary disasters there is none so well calculated to afford them thorough satisfaction. There is, at the very least, the destruction of property to be witnessed, which is always delightful. If it should luckily happen to be in a dwelling-house, there is the additional pleasure derived from the terror and confusion of the inmates, and the chance of the sublime treat of seeing them carried out more or less scorched and wrapped up in blankets, not to speak of the possibility of some one being entirely roasted. From this Paradise of delights, at the policeman's bidding, the boy has to "stand back," and sometimes so far that he can only hear the distant sobs of the laboring engine; and at the supreme moment, when the roof falls in, he is left to his own imagination to estimate the amount of damage done and the probabilities of life lost.

Consequently, there are few spectacles so soothing to the boy-mind as that of a policeman in difficulty, and for this reason boys may be always observed to muster strong in the neighborhood of police-stations for the sake of seeing the force involved in taking charge of troublesome cases of intoxication. An elderly lady, on her way to the station, while suffering under that form of inebriety which makes the patient lie down and kick, every dozen yards, and between halts bite and scratch the officer, is a sight particularly refreshing to the boy, presenting as it does, two beings with whom he is at feud, under humiliating and uncomfortable circumstances. For if the boy hates the policeman he hates lovely woman too, and it must be confessed that in this case also he has some reason for the antipathy, because unquestionably lovely woman hates him. The affection of mother and son apart, — which is purely a matter of instinct, a mere animal attachment, — no woman ever yet was fond of boys. There is a natural antagonism between them. Women are conservative by temperament; boys are naturally revolutionary. Women are lovers of order; disorder in all its forms is what boys love. All the feelings that are strongest in women — reverence, pity, tenderness, sympathy with suffering — are in boys "conspicuous by their absence." Naturally, therefore, there is no love lost on either side. Lovely woman in distress excites in the boy's mind emotions the very opposite of those with which the late Mr. T. P. Cooke used to boast himself inspired; and she on her part is at no pains to conceal the fact that she considers him an imp, an aggravating toad, and a young monkey. She loses no opportunity of impressing upon him that he is an inferior being, and possibly the natural misanthropy of boys is occasionally intensified by the depressing theories as to their own physical constitution imbibed while still under female domination. From woman's lips they learn that

"Snipe and snails and puppy-dogs' tails, — That's what little boys are made of";

while, with a perhaps pardonable partiality to her own sex, she declares that

"Sugar and spice and all that's nice, — That's what little girls are made of."

Mellere luto finxit precordia Titan."

It may be that some of the unsatisfactory qualities of boys are in part due to the despair and the envy which such a gloomy account of their comparative anatomy would naturally produce. If we cannot accept the view literally, it must be admitted there is something in it figuratively. In all other animals the difference between the sexes at an early age is trifling; in man it is very striking. To take a familiar illustration from the streets, — since that excellent piece of legislation sometimes called "the Bass Relief Act" has been in operation, a vast number of barrel-organs have been altered, and instead of grinding the Trovatore where it was not wanted, they now supply reels, jigs, and horn-pipes to neighborhoods where such things are thoroughly enjoyed. It is scarcely possible to look into a back street in London now without seeing an organ-grinder at work, and several couples of little girls dancing, often gracefully, always prettily and happily. But no reader of this or any other journal ever saw any boys joining in that innocent amusement; though it must be allowed they do sometimes cut in and perform evolutions in the nature of a war-dance round the organist, to whom they address certain traditional scraps of gibberish supposed to be injurious expressions of an intensely irritating character, out of some foreign language, no matter what, but intelligible and galling to him as an alien.

And here it may be observed that the boy has this immense advantage, that he is above all creatures entirely ἀναιδής, — no one English word hits off the quality precisely, — that, as he respects nothing, so he is totally free from the weakness of self-respect, and knows not what it is to feel himself contemptible or ridiculous. Hence, in giving annoyance; he is never checked by any sense of degradation. He would coat himself from head to foot with mud an inch thick if he thought there was a chance of running against a well-dressed fellow-creature and escaping unthrashed. This, joined with an almost diabolical ingenuity in devising modes of aggravation, makes him nearly as accomplished a tormentor as his congener, the Red Indian. We once saw the Strand thrown into terror, confusion, and distress by the unaided wit of two boys. It was one of those foggy, damp December evenings, when the lamps look like blurred moons, and objects twenty yards off are all but undistinguishable, and the pavement is as slippery as if all the clowns of all the theatres had been practising the making of butter-slides for the coming pantomimes. These playful youths had got a suit of old clothes and some straw, out of which they had made up an image sufficiently like a man to pass muster in that uncertain light. With this, counterfeiting the action of affectionate sons taking home a beloved but intoxicated father, they would suddenly appear in front of some passing omnibus, and then, affecting to lose all presence of mind, allow their helpless parent to fall almost under the feet of the horses. The scene may be imagined. Terror of the passengers, horror of the driver, horses down through having been sharply turned aside or pulled up on the greasy pavement, general agitation, which culminated when at length an omnibus with more way on than usual actually passed over the body, the wretched driver of course suffering the mental agonies of a homicide until relieved by seeing the straw intestines of his victim.

The greatest misery to the greatest number is, in fact, the aim of the boy's philosophy, and it is worth noticing how, even when apparently tamed and civilized, and ostensibly earning an honest livelihood, he contrives to make his vocation conducive to that great end. Hence his partiality for callings which enable him to persecute society under the pretence of seeking custom, such as that of the shoeblack importunate to "Clean your boots, Sir," when you have no need of him; or the evening-paper vender, breaking in upon your meditations with his shrill recommendation of the last horrible murder. Even when civilization has done its utmost to expel nature by modifying the boy into the "young gentleman," nature will sometimes break out. Illustrations only too familiar are to be found in the boy with the mechanical turn, and the boy with the chemical turn; young imps so-called because they have been discovered destroying the furniture, or making a stench with some bottled nastiness, and have been in consequence set up with a tool-chest or a "youth's laboratory" by an addle-headed old uncle, who has some confused notion that it was in this way the genius of Watt or of Faraday first showed itself. It is unnecessary to dilate upon the sufferings of the household where this occurs, but fortunately they are very seldom of long duration. Sooner or later the young philosopher disables himself with his tools, or is "hoist with his own petard" while in pursuit of his grand arcanum, that explosive compound which shall combine the greatest possible amount of smell, smoke, and noise.

But these are merely varieties of the boy, and as such they have as little connection with our subject as that highly artificial specimen who is prematurely particular about his boots, generally dressy, and partial to ladies' society, and who is to the boy pure and simple very much what the town Indian, with a civilization consisting of trousers and fire-water, is to the original red man of the prairie.

They may be interesting from a Darwinian point of view, as exhibiting the original boy-nature coming out, here and there, under domestication, but, as we said before, they are useless for the study of boy in the abstract, and it is to this neglected branch of natural history that we wish to see attention directed; the more so because there seems to be a disposition in some quarters to deal rashly with the subject. It is growing more and more common to treat as an assault in law that wholesome corporal punishment which used to be not only a schoolmaster's privilege, but even his duty, and some there are who would actually make castigation under any circumstances penal. Is it wise, we would ask in the face of the facts we have mentioned, to throw away in this heedless manner checks and safeguards that have been established by the wisdom of our ancestors for the restraint of dangerous instincts and the protection of society?

A CAPTURE IN CANADA.

I AM not Mr. Pollaky of Paddington Green, neither am I Inspector Webb, nor Detective Bull of the City force; my status in society is that of a banker's clerk. I hold an appointment in a Midland Counties firm, which I entered upon five-and-twenty years ago. I had reached what is termed the "ripe middle age," when some months since the even current of my life was interrupted by the following event.

The establishment with which I have been so long associated is well known, and has gained a reputation by the quiet, respectable character of its business transactions. It does not indulge in speculative ventures, and hence has escaped many of the misfortunes and missed no little of the agitation which some banking firms have had to encounter. Occasionally we have been startled by the presentation of a bad note, a forged check, and other cunningly devised schemes of well-practised swindlers to impose on our simplicity and credulity, which circumstances have forced us into the excitement of judicial investigations. Thus from time to time, I was brought in contact with some of the most celebrated detectives of the day. I still remember the feelings of admiration with which I witnessed the skill and sagacity of such men as John Forrester, Leadbeater, the Bow Street officer, Inspector Whicher, and other police officers, in tracking and detecting a swindler. At that period I little dreamt that my quiet life would be disturbed by an eventful episode, such as I am about to relate.

On the morning of the 28th September, 186-. I was at my post as usual, when a message from the bank manager summoned me to his presence. I saw at a glance, on entering the room, that something had happened. My chief informed me that a customer of the bank, whom, for obvious reasons, I will call Mr. Hooker, had absconded. I was aware, not only that he was under an engagement to liquidate a considerable claim we had against him, but that he had recently fixed a day for the fulfilment of his promise, assuring us that he should be in the immediate receipt of a large sum of money, which would enable him to pay his debt, and leave a balance to his credit in our hands. The statement of his expected funds was no fiction,—he duly received them,—but instead of appropriating his newly acquired wealth to the honest discharge of our claim, he clandestinely left his home, and before the intelligence of his departure had reached us, he was half-way to Canada. The manager's indignation at the fraudulent conduct of an individual whom he had believed to be an honorable man, and had trusted as such, did not surprise me. Neither was I astonished when he told me that he would do all in his power to punish the absconding debtor, if means could be adopted to discover and arrest him in his flight.

It was a matter for anxious deliberation. Ultimately, acting on an impulse I could not control, I proffered my services to go in pursuit of the defaulter. They were accepted. The same evening, in company with one of our directors, I left by the mail train for Liverpool, reaching that place some little time after midnight. The object of this journey was to endeavor to ascertain, through the Liverpool detectives, when and by what ship Mr. Hooker had sailed, as well as his destination, in order that we might arrive at a conclusion as to the propriety of my crossing the Atlantic in pursuit.

Early the following morning we were at the head-quarters of the detective police. We related the nature of our mission, and the services of one of their most efficient officers were placed at our disposal. He was evidently well known at all the shipping offices. In something less than an hour he furnished us with every information we could obtain in Liverpool. He ascertained that Hooker had sailed for Quebec seven days previously in the Canadian mail-packet ship Belgian, and had booked through to Montreal; and he added the still more important facts that the delinquent had with him his wife, his sister-in-law, and two children, and, further, that he was in possession of a roll of bank-notes at the time he secured the berths.

Had he gone alone, I doubt whether I should have had the courage to proceed farther; but the fact of his being encumbered with the ladies, the children, and a large quantity of baggage, was a set-off against his seven days' start, and considerably altered my views. With such a drag on his movements, I felt there was a hope of success, and at once accepted the responsibility of following him. A berth was secured on board the China, of the Cunard line, and on Saturday, the 30th of September, 4.30 P. M., I found myself afloat, and the docks of Liverpool becoming fainter and fainter. Fortunately the weather was extremely fine; and as we steamed down the Mersey the scene and the event was one of unusual interest to me.

The interior of a first-class mail-packet just starting on her voyage and its animated appearance have often been described. I need only say there were over two hundred passengers on board, and that my immediate companions were a French gentleman, a Spaniard and his wife, a Scotch physician (who was in a state of complete prostration three fourths of the voyage), a shipbuilder from St. John's, New Brunswick, and his two daughters, the chaplain of the ship and his wife, and Mr. Tucker, an intelligent man from Philadelphia, who, during the voyage, gave me much valuable information, and introduced me to some Canadian merchants on board. These gentlemen subsequently rendered me great assistance in the prosecution of the object I had in view.

One of the most agreeable interludes of our voyage occurred during our detention at Queenstown for the mail-bags. A delay of the mail-train enabled us to pay a visit to the lovely Cove of Cork. We landed at the pleasant quay, ascended Lookout Hill, and partook of the hospitality of the Queen's Hotel. The jaunting-cars, nigger minstrels, mendicants, men-of-wars' men, yachtmen, hawkers, occupied the foreground, whilst the Cove itself was studded with vessels, amongst which some of our iron-clads and gunboats were conspicuous. The view was bounded by the islands of Spike and Haulbowline and the famous lighthouse that marks the entrance to the harbor.

It was about 4.30 A. M. on the following day week when I was aroused from sleep by the report of a cannon close to our saloon. The first idea that I had on awakening was, that we had struck upon a rock, but my neighbor informed me it was a salute we were firing on entering Halifax harbor. We had made one of the quickest passages on record; for before five o'clock A. M. on Monday, the 9th of October, we arrived at Halifax, being only seven days and twelve hours from the time of our departure from Queenstown. I proceeded to Boston, where I remained one day. I left that city for Montreal. I reached the St. Lawrence Hall Hotel in that place at ten A. M. on Thursday the 12th of October. I confess that the three hundred miles of night travelling, following so closely on the voyage out, caused me great bodily fatigue, and I suffered much from mental depression.

As I sat alone that morning, some three thousand miles away from home and as far distant from any friend, I began seriously to reflect whether I had not undertaken a task of too great magnitude; I was weak enough to regret having left the shores of England upon what now appeared so Quixotic an undertaking. It was too late for regret, and I immediately dispelled my doubts by action. My first step was to collect my credentials and call upon the solicitors whose advice was to guide my future proceedings. Messrs. Roberts & Roe are one of the most eminent firms of avocats in Montreal. On making the acquaintance of the senior partner, I felt that I stood in the presence of a gentleman of no ordinary ability, — one, whose verdict would go far to decide whether my mission would be stamped with "success" or indorsed with "failure." I related to him as briefly as possible the circumstances which brought me to him; I handed him the power of attorney, and, being desirous of securing his unlimited confidence, I also exhibited to him my letter of credit and introduction to the eminent Canadian house, Messrs. Gillespies', Moffatt, & Co. When I had finished my recital, Mr. Roberts took a few moments for reflection. I watched him narrowly, and I fancied I read distinctly in his countenance that his honest conviction was adverse to my cause. I found that such was the fact; for, addressing me very deliberately, he said, "I fear your case is hopeless, and that your journey will be a fruitless one." He explained to me the law of Canada in reference to such cases, and pointed out, that even if I found Hooker, which was in his opinion doubtful, I could only treat him as a debtor; I could not touch either his person or his goods; that I might bring an action against him for a common debt, with the consolatory thought that after I had spent some weeks in litigation and obtained judgment, Mr. Hooker would run across to the United States and snap his fingers at me and my judgment. Mr. Roberts was kind enough to say he could not but admire the spirit which had been evinced by our bank in taking such prompt and energetic action in the matter, and expressed a wish that other large mercantile firms in England would adopt a similar line of conduct, which would prevent Canada, and more particularly Montreal (from its proximity to the United States), becoming the resort of so many swindlers from the mother country.

Naturally I felt for the moment cast down by the revelation of the "hopelessness of my case," and for an instant I contemplated relinquishing all further proceedings; but happily, in a few minutes, this feeling vanished, and I became as it were fortified with unusual strength and energy. I was enabled calmly to reflect upon the formidable difficulty I had to encounter, and instead of abandoning my mission, I resolved to prosecute it to the utmost. I told the legal adviser that my first step must be to discover the fugitive, and next to give him into "pretty safe" custody, until I could come to a satisfactory settlement with him, — disregarding for the time all the terrors of the Canadian law on the question of false imprisonment. At this period I was introduced to the junior partner of the firm, who subsequently undertook the management of the affair, and by his advice I shut myself up in my hotel, in case Hooker should see me and abscond whilst the avocat undertook to send during the day to all the hotels to examine the books of arrivals. After a wretched time of inactivity I again sought my solicitors to ascertain the result of the search. It was altogether unsuccessful. I subsequently found that had the official to whom the duty had been intrusted exercised an ordinary amount of vigilance, he would have been able to have furnished me with most welcome intelligence. His search, however, had been a very superficial one, and I was consequently compelled to return to my hotel sadly disappointed, and wearied both in body and mind.

The following morning I was introduced to the Chief of the Montreal detective police, Mr. O'Leary, a remarkably acute and intelligent Irishman. He regretted that for a day or two he could not give me much personal assistance, as he was engaged in several important criminal cases at the assizes, which were then being held in Montreal. I briefly put him in possession of the facts of my mission, and he consoled me with the assurance that, if Hooker were there or in the neighborhood, he should have no difficulty in finding him. As I was deprived of the detective's active assistance, I resolved to take a line of action of my own. I suggested to Mr. Roe that we should make inquiries at the offices of the Canadian Mail Steam-Packet Company, in one of whose ships (the Belgian) Hooker and his family had sailed from England. Mr. Roe acceded to my suggestion, and accompanied me at once to the office, where I was introduced by him to Mr. Allan, the principal partner in the firm. My object was to ascertain whether, from the official list of the passengers by the Belgian, they could furnish me with any information as to the arrival of the fugitive either in Quebec or Montreal. Mr. Allan at once communicated with the officials at Quebec, where the passengers had landed.

I was employed during Friday in visiting my solicitors and the detective officers, as well as in making inquiries at banks, post-office, and smaller hotels, but without acquiring the least information likely to prove serviceable.

At an early hour the next morning I started out with a conviction that if Hooker were in Canada I should obtain some clew to his whereabouts before night. This presentiment did not mislead me, for before three o'clock I effected his "capture" and had him closeted in my solicitor's office in Little St. James's Street, with O'Leary and a brother-detective in close attendance.

I will record the events as they occurred that day, which was one of much anxiety and excitement.

When I reached Mr. Allan's office, I was informed by the head clerk that a letter had been received from their establishment at Quebec in reply to their inquiries, containing some important and satisfactory information.

It is true they had lost all traces of the fugitive on his landing at Quebec, and consequently could not have rendered any assistance but for a singular coincidence which occurred a few days previously at Toronto. The purser of the Belgian had occasion to visit the City of the Lakes, and whilst there he saw and had recognized Hooker as one of the passengers. The latter believed himself to be perfectly safe, and, not having the slightest idea that any one was in pursuit of him, he invited the purser to take some refreshment, and then voluntarily entered into conversation about himself and family, mentioning, among other things, that his wife, sister-in-law, and children were at the Montreal Hotel in Montreal, where he intended shortly to join them. The purser returned to Quebec, and, fortunately for me, was at the office when the letter of inquiry from Montreal was opened. He immediately communicated the above facts to Mr. Allan.

I hastened with the welcome intelligence to my solicitors. It was difficult to decide upon the best course to adopt. If any direct inquiry were made, Mrs. Hooker would probably communicate with her husband and prevent his return; after a short consultation we decided to leave the matter in the hands of O'Leary, the detective. I went for him at once, and fortunately found him at the chief office of police. As I have previously stated, he was a sharp-witted Irishman, of gentlemanly bearing. After deliberately reading the letter which had been intrusted to me by Mr. Allan's clerk, he took my hand in his own, and, grasping it warmly he said in his native accent, "My dear sirr-h—it's all right—lave it to me."

On our way to Montreal House he informed me that he knew, and had the greatest confidence in, the landlord, from whom he could obtain every information without exciting any suspicion. We entered the house by the public bar, and of course were at once the object of that curiosity which is invariably manifested when a detective office appears in company with a stranger in a public place of that description. The character of O'Leary was too well known for any one to venture upon a remark beyond an inquiry as to the state of his health, and what he would drink? One cadaverous-looking Yankee put the latter question to me, but as I was a stranger to him I politely declined to take anything.

I soon discovered that I had committed rather a grave sin, for the Yankee appeared much irritated at my refusal, and advised me if I were going to New York, never to decline such an offer if it were made to me in that city, or, said he, "I guess it will be the worse for you." On turning to O'Leary, I found him carelessly glancing at the names in the arrival-book of the hotel. Suddenly he closed the book, took it in his hand, and gave me a sign to follow him into an inner office. When the door was closed he opened the book, and putting his finger on Hooker's signature, inquired if that was the man. I replied in the affirmative. The landlord was then admitted into our council, and a cautiously whispered conference took place. The landlord informed us that Hooker's wife and children were up stairs in the apartment above us, and that he had stowed large quantities of baggage in an adjoining room. At that moment Mrs. Hooker was expecting her husband by the first train from Toronto, after which they intended leaving, but where they intended to go he had no idea. O'Leary advised me to change my quarters from the St. Lawrence Hall Hotel to Montreal House, and keep a watchful eye on the movements of the family, so as to be ready to confront the husband on his arrival. I hastened to the hotel, removed all traces of my address and railway tickets from my luggage, and entered my name on the arrival-book of the Montreal Hotel as Mr. V. Robinson, from Boston. I lounged about the place with a view to picking up any stray piece of information I could. I heard amongst other things that Hooker had lodged his money in the Merchants' Bank. I thought this sufficient importance to communicate to my solicitor at once. On my return I was somewhat startled by the announcement that Hooker, who had just arrived, was then sitting down to dinner in the public room. There was evidently no time to be lost, as he had ordered his bill, and would leave in half an hour. I knew my only chance consisted in playing a bold game. With the "hopelessness of my case" ringing in my ears, I had not the courage to confront him myself; and yet in half an hour he would be gone. It was just a question of finding O'Leary and bringing him on to the scene of action in those thirty minutes. There was no vehicle at hand. I ran hastily to the head office of the police, and found to my dismay that O'Leary was not there, nor was there any one who knew where he could be found.

I retained the services of the chief officer present, secured a cab, and went at full gallop to O'Leary's private residence, where we were fortunate enough to find him. He immediately entered the cab, and we returned to Montreal House, whilst I related to him all that had occurred since I last saw him. As I told him we should probably find our man quietly taking dinner, his face lighted up with pleasure, and he exclaimed, "It's one of the most beautiful little affairs I have been engaged in for some time past!" I feared that his zeal might get the better of his discretion. I again explained to him the full nature of the case, — that I could not legally give him into custody, and my only chance of recovering any portion of the money with which he had absconded from England was to frighten him into some concession before he could procure legal advice; O'Leary appeared delighted with the prospect of his game, — and requesting me to "leave it entirely in his hands," assured me that in case he were obstinate he would terrify him out of his life. Ere we reached the hotel I was wrought up to a high pitch of excitement; the time for decisive action had arrived. Preceded by the landlord, and in company with the two detectives, I ascended the principal staircase at the top of which was the entrance to the dining-saloon.

The door was open, thus affording us a view of some twenty of the guests, and, among them, of the man in search of whom I had crossed the Atlantic. He was sitting with his back to us, his wife and sister-in-law being on each side of him. He appeared in high spirits, and was chatting with the various guests at table, little dreaming who was standing at the open door, prepared to denounce him, if necessary, as a fugitive swindler from England. I pointed him out to O'Leary, who calmly remarked, "That's enough"; and then as a second thought struck him, he added, with a spice of his Irish humor, — "But we'll let him finish his dinner first, for he seems to be enjoying it so much." In accordance with so odd a request, we allowed him a few minutes' grace; he was then touched on the shoulder by the head waiter, and informed that a gentleman was waiting to see him. Still unsuspecting, he arose from his seat and came towards us with a smiling countenance. O'Leary met him, and with a slight inclination of the head, said, "Mr. Hooker, from England, I believe?" "Yes," was the apparently firm reply. I thought I could discover an anxious nervous twitching in his face, betraying an undercurrent of guilty consciousness, and a fear that he had not escaped pursuit, as perhaps only a few minutes previously he was flattering himself he had.

I was standing a little in the rear of O'Leary, and thus was partially hidden from observation. Stepping on one side and extending his hand towards me, O'Leary said, "Allow me, Mr. Hooker, to introduce you to a gentleman from England, with whom, I believe, you are well acquainted!"

Making an effort to appear calm and unconscious of danger, the swindler deliberately disowned all knowledge of me. Looking at me, and then turning to O'Leary, he replied, "I do not know the gentleman. He is a perfect stranger to me."

I was unprepared for such a barefaced disavowal from a man with whom I had so often and so lately transacted business. For a moment I felt staggered by this fresh evidence of guilt. At length I stepped forward, and said, "Mr. Hooker you know the — Bank, and you know me as the cashier of that establishment; and you know, too, perfectly well, the nature of the business which has brought me to Canada in search of you."

These words, uttered with all the menace and determination I could throw into them, had a marked and striking effect on the conscience-stricken man to whom they were addressed. His courage instantly forsook him. He trembled as if stricken with ague. Uttering all sorts of miserable excuses for his conduct, he requested that we would retire to a private room with a view to an explanation and settlement. I readily acceded to this, and now felt somewhat hopeful of bringing the business to a satisfactory conclusion. I soon discovered that in this I was fated to be disappointed; for, shortly after we were closeted, he again assumed a bold appearance, and seemed disposed to justify his conduct rather than make any reparation for what he had done. His principal anxiety appeared to be to avoid exposure before the inmates of the hotel; this afforded me an opportunity for suggesting a movement I was anxious to effect, viz., an adjournment to the office of my legal advisers. Taking his arm in mine, and requesting the detectives to follow closely, we left the hotel. After we reached Mr. Roe's office, nearly two hours were expended in vain attempts to induce the delinquent to accede to some equitable terms of settlement.

He at first appeared very penitent, and, in the midst of his tears, declared that it was his intention, as far as lay in his power, to act honorably to every one; he begged, again and again, to be allowed to return to his wife, who, being ignorant of the state of affairs, would be suffering great anxiety from his prolonged absence. He seemed so sincere in his protestations that Mr. Roe suggested that I should accede to his request. This was a moment of great difficulty to me. I did not wish to be unnecessarily severe, neither did I wish to act in opposition to the advice given me by Mr. Roe. Still, I felt sure I should be losing some of the vantage ground I had gained through the day, if I released him whilst matters were in their present position. At last I said, "I have a duty to perform, and I cannot shrink one step therefrom. You absconded from England, and, having incurred expense in finding you, I cannot, and will not, release you until you have given me some material guaranty that the funds which you have deposited in the Merchants' Bank, in this city, shall not be touched until you have made a satisfactory settlement with me."

My determination had the effect of again making him change his tactics. He upbraided me for bringing two detectives to his hotel, threatened vengeance against me for having been given into their custody, and asked me, indignantly, what I required.

An idea flashed across my mind. I confess it was a piece of strategy, and, conceived as it was in a minute, I could hardly hope that my prisoner would fall into the trap I wished to lay for him.

I replied, "You are anxious to get back to your family, and I am equally anxious to terminate this painful interview. I will release you on the following conditions: you shall draw a check for the funds (with the exception of a few pounds for your immediate use) which you have placed in the Merchants' Bank, payable to your order and my order jointly, and deposit the same with my solicitor. As a man of business," I continued, carelessly, "you are aware that I shall not be able to touch this money without your indorsement to the check."

I confess I did not draw his particular attention to the fact that he would be equally helpless without my signature. Neither could he have given one moment's consideration to this feature in the transaction, or he certainly would not have so readily acceded to my terms. He appeared lost to every idea but that of his present escape; he immediately drew up the check, which he signed, and handed to Mr. Roe.

I was now as anxious to get rid of him as I had been a few hours previously to effect his capture. It was necessary to have the check "initialed" at the bank, which would place such an embargo on his funds as would prevent the possibility of his tampering with them by other means. It was Saturday afternoon, and a half-holiday. Hurrying away as quickly as we could, we proceeded to the Merchants' Bank. It was closed. After some little delay, we gained admission by the private door. The clerks were leaving, and informed us that no further business could be transacted until Monday. Monday would be too late; the full nature of my compromise with Hooker would be laid before him by a legal authority, and, perhaps, was at that moment being divulged to him. Steps might be taken to remove his funds from my grasp. He, too, would be told of the "hopelessness of my case," and would, doubtless, set me at defiance. I felt that if we failed now, I should never recover one shilling of the money; that I should have to return to England beaten and disappointed, with a heavy bill of costs to add to the amount of which my firm had already been swindled.

With desperation I urged my solicitor forward, and we soon found ourselves in the interior of an inner office, where one of the chief tellers and a junior still remained. Fortunately for me and those whom I represented, the principal was a friend of my solicitor. The cashier had his hat on, the junior was in the act of placing the last huge ledger in the iron safe, when he was stopped by Mr. Roe. "One minute," he exclaimed to his friend the cashier; "I will not detain you long, but in that ledger you will find an account opened, within the last few days, by a Mr. Hooker from England. He has just given me a check for nearly the whole amount, payable to the joint order of himself and this gentleman," pointing to me. We do not require the cash, but simply to have the check accepted by the bank."

The cashier, anxious to oblige his friend, opened the ledger, turned to the account, attached his initials to the check, and returned it to us. The thanks we tendered him were neither few nor cold; and, as we hastily left the bank, Mr. Roe warmly congratulated me on the success of my plot. I was too overpowered to say much myself. Begging him to take especial care of the check, and under no circumstances to part with it without my authority, I left him, promising to see him on Monday morning. I wandered down Notre Dame Street in a state of complete abstraction and bewilderment. I was overjoyed at the result of the day's proceedings, the exciting events of which had passed so rapidly in succession, that I could scarcely realize the agreeable change which during the last few hours had taken place in the aspect of my Canadian adventure. Of one circumstance I have a vivid recollection. I sat down to dinner that evening with a heart full of thankfulness; and, for the first time since I landed in America, I really and truly enjoyed the viands which were placed before me.

Although I had virtually brought Mr. Hooker to a strait which would compel him to accede to my own terms of settlement, still he evinced, at times, more obstinacy than ever; and it was not until that day week that I finally closed with him.

It was early on the morning of Saturday, the 21st of October, that I sought an interview with Mr. South, the solicitor who had been consulted by Hooker. Fortunately for me he was a highly respectable man. He had, on one or two occasions, intimated his contempt for his client; also, that he was heartily sick of the transaction. I told him that I had fully made up my mind to leave Montreal that night by the mail-train for Quebec, and to take passage in the North American, which would sail from the latter place on the following morning for England. "If," I said to him, "your client does not accept my terms, I will take his check back with me, make a bankrupt of him, — his assignees shall indorse the check per procurationem; and the whole of the funds will then be sent out to England for the benefit of his estate."

His reply was satisfactory. "I admit," he said, "that the terms you propose are such as my client ought to accede to. He will be here shortly. I will inform him of your ultimatum; and if he still remains obstinate, I shall decline to have anything further to do with him. Will you call on me again at twelve o'clock?"

I kept the appointment punctually. The guilty man was there too, and quite crestfallen. Under the heavy pressure that had been brought to bear upon him he had at length given way. He accepted my terms, — indorsed the check; and in a few hours, with a draft for the "salvage" money, drawn by the City Bank of Montreal on Messrs. Glyn & Co., of London, safe in my possession, I was steaming rapidly towards Quebec.

I landed in England on Thursday, the 2d of November. Notwithstanding the "hopelessness of my case," I had effected my "capture in Canada," and was enabled to report the same personally at headquarters in less than five weeks from the date of my departure.

NODDY'S SITUATION.

IN FIVE CHAPTERS. — CHAPTER V.

PEOPLE did talk; and the bitterness of it to Mrs. McCuller was that it was all her own doing. However, she was equal to the occasion. She had made one attempt to bring Julia out at eighteen with indifferent success. As a shopkeeper, whose good-have been exposed in his window for a few weeks, and become a trifle soiled, will remove them to the back of his shop, that they may come out fresh again by and by, so Mrs. Muciller, whose daughter had become a trifle fly-blown by the exposure, resolved to send Julia to France to finish her education for the second time, to come out fresh at eighteen again in another twelvemonth. It took a few weeks to complete the necessary arrangements for Julia's departure, during which time Mrs. Muciller's attention was distracted from Noddy's affairs. The only sentiment of emotion at the contre-temps exhibited by Julia consisted in a renewed expression, in song, of something like regret that the "two leaves were parted in the stream"; but as to any feeling of emotion, she probably had about as much as the "other leaf," that "floated forward all alone."

Towards the close of September, a very few days after Miss Julia had become a pensionnaire of a Parisian establishment, Mrs. Muciller pounced upon an advertisement in the local paper.

"At last!" she exclaimed to Noddy; "here is the very thing for you. It seems like a providence. Here have we been trying the London papers for weeks, and the very identical thing suddenly turns up in our own little print. I'll read it:—

"WANTED, A GOVERNESS.—The advertiser wishes to obtain instruction for a child turned eight years old. English only required.—Address W., Pinewood, Lyndhurst, Hants."

"Just what you want,—no accomplishments whatever mentioned; so write directly."

"Yes," said Noddy, "I will. I like the look of that advertisement. There is not too much said, and not too much required."

Noddy wrote three or four notes before she could manage one to suit the conciseness of the advertisement. The one she sent was this:—

"To W.

"I think I am competent to undertake the situation.
NORAH CRAY."

Return of post brought the following reply:—

September 26, 18—.

"To Miss NORAH CRAY.

"If Miss Cray is of that opinion, she is requested to be at Lyndhurst Station at 7.15 P. M., to-morrow. Carriage will be sent.
W."

"P. M.?" Mrs. Muciller remarked. "Not a very suitable time to engage a governess. However, that is not my affair."

Noddy was so really anxious to secure a situation for which she thought herself qualified, that she would have gone had it been M. M.,—twelve o'clock at midnight.

"You will not make any frivolous objections about accepting this situation," Mrs. Muciller said. "The family, whoever they are, seem evidently disposed to engage you, and you will understand I have no further occasion for your services with me. Should you be engaged at once, I do not even see that it would be needful for you to return. You forgot yourself more than once in your demeanor to a visitor of mine; it is not my wish you should have another opportunity of making a similar mistake. If you return at all, it will be your own fault; and if you suffer for it, it will be a consequence of your own folly."

"I will really try," returned Noddy; "for indeed, I am in earnest for employment. But you will not be angry if I return unsuccessful? You would not turn me away?"

"If you return, I do not think I should turn you away. People might talk. I should not turn you out of doors; but if, after once showing you a separate path from my own, and you refuse it, there should be a way I have not yet tried to make you feel my resentment, I will try to find that way. Until you had the prospect of a situation, I have restrained myself, because to exhibit my feeling would be useless and purposeless. Now, let me tell you that I know something of your deceit and treachery. Thanks to your poisoning Mr. Geogagan's mind against my daughter Julia, he left in the sudden and disgraceful manner he did. You need not pretend to innocence. You were walking with him the day we went to the picnic, and your lies have brought all this disgrace about."

"I assure you it was not so. I never said a word to—"

"You own you walked with him, then?"

"I did," said Noddy quietly; "but—"

"O, you did! Vastly fine! You did! Mrs. Muciller's upper-servant and parlor-maid walked out for an airing with Mrs. Muciller's guest! Indeed. Cat!" and Mrs. Muciller bent herself forward, the better to project her indignation. "Leave the room without a word, or I may forget my own interest, and, once out of the house, may be fool enough to forbid your return, even to such a reception as I can give you. Go!"

Noddy was too angry to cry. She went. Mrs. Muciller's words were too unjust to stab. No one knew their injustice better than Noddy. The one bit of truth, that she had taken a walk with Mr. Geogagan, she was not ashamed of. Mrs. Muciller's deduction from it, about its being the means of breaking off Julia's expected match, needed no contradiction. Noddy knew that, and, what is more, knew that her step-mother knew it too. The mistake of women's disputes is their predilection for hanging a quarrel on any peg but the right one. Had Mrs. Muciller confined herself to saying she hated Noddy, and always had done so, she would have been completely justified, and would have succeeded in making her victim cry.

The 7.15 train set Noddy down at a little country station, in the middle of the New Forest, amid a wilderness of tree-beauty, with no other habitation in sight for miles than the station-master's house, and the long red roofs of Lyndhurst Union peering out from the distant green. The air was scented with flowers, and musical with bird-voices, and the golden evening haze lay on all the sombre trees, and burned them into a red misty glory. A few minutes, and a shaggy pony became visible, drawing a small phaeton out of the forest shade. The man drove up, and asked for Miss Cray.

"No luggage, mum, I think? No. Perhaps you won't mind sittin' by me. The road is roughish, and the front seat is more springy."

So Noddy perched herself beside the coachman, and the shaggy pony began a shuffling sort of running trot, and the "carriage" began to glide and bump over the grassy forest-path.

"How far is Pinewood?" Noddy inquired.

"A matter of five mile, mum,—miss, I should say,—but the road is a rum un."

So it seemed. Over humps and bumps in the lawnly way, and the forest-path twisting and winding about among the majestic trees; the wheels singing pleasantly on the grass, grating a stone here and there, or going over a bough yonder, but the pony shuffling along over everything with a happy see-saw swaying of his head.

"Are they at home?"

"Yes 'm, — leastways, miss."

"Who did you say your master was?" Noddy wanted to know something of the folks she was going to.

"I didn't say he was no one, did I?" He thought this too sharp, however; for he added, "He's the governor, — that's what he is."

"And the child?" asked Noddy, a little rebuffed.

"A girl, I suppose?"

The coachman looked at her severely. "No," he said, doggedly; "it ain't a girl. — Come up, Peg, can't you?" — the last remark being addressed in a surly tone to the pony.

It was getting dusk when Noddy arrived. She was shown into a spacious room, comfortably furnished, but plenty of room to walk about. The windows looked out on the billowy forest, now fading into purple gloom, all save the nearer trees, which stood in a silhouette of black lacework against the twilight sky. Presently, an old lady in black silk entered the room. Not the lady of the house, Noddy judged, — more like a motherly housekeeper than that; but there was a comfortable smile on her face as she said, "Miss Cray, I believe, — in answer to the letter? Will you follow me, my dear?"

Noddy followed her out of the room, and along a cool white hall, to a door. The old lady knocked. "My master is within; please to enter."

Master! thought Noddy, and trembled at the prospect of the approaching ordeal; but the housekeeper had opened the door, and Noddy had to go in. The room was larger than the other; it was also darker, inasmuch as the blinds were half-way down, and no lights to enliven the gloom. Noddy could only distinguish dimly the figure of a man, in a great chintz-covered easy-chair, at the far end of the room. She judged him to be elderly by his reclining as if with gout, his legs making two great bolster-like parcels in front of him. The hair that strayed out beneath his velvet skull-cap appeared white, and he addressed her in a slow voice of some firmness. "Be seated, Miss Cray, if you please."

Norah took a seat.

"Your letter appeared to me straightforward."

Norah bowed.

"You think yourself competent for the situation, you say. I hope you have thoughtfully considered the terms in which I advertised, before venturing to make such a statement? It is a situation which will involve some amount of responsibility, as I wish to depend entirely upon the person whom I may select for the education and general oversight of her charge. I will not conceal from you that that charge, in addition to being a responsible one, may prove a difficult one, — the lad to whom I refer having many objectionable propensities, that will require to be watched and corrected."

"I think you stated in the advertisement the child is eight years of age," Norah said.

"'Turned eight,' are the words employed. He is, in fact, 'turned eight.'"

"Then, I think there is every hope that those propensities may be subdued."

"I hope so. And in proof of your ability to bring about such a result, I conclude you can give me some testimonials, received from previous situations."

She had not thought of that. "I have never been out before," Noddy said.

"H'm. Then your method of procedure would be tentative? That is a grave consideration."

"I would try to do my best," said Noddy, eagerly, "if the child is not too old, and not beyond my capacity to teach. I'm not clever nor accomplished, but it was your plainness in advertising led me to think I might suit. You said, 'English only required.'"

"Exactly, but the best of English. And you will bear in mind that there are many more English persons who can talk three or four foreign languages than can speak their own with correctness."

Noddy's heart began to sink. "The advertisement doesn't say the best of English," she said.

"No, it says English, and only the very best can be called that."

Noddy thought of Mrs. Muciller and of her own prospects at Braithfield, if she lost this place. She determined on a despairing battle for it.

"But the child is yet young, only eight; and I can teach him till he is ready for some one wiser. Indeed, I will do my best."

"Turned eight, if you please. He is, in fact, 'turned' nine. He is at least ten years of age."

"Then," Noddy said, just ready to cry with disappointment, "I suppose I am not competent? You may know better English than I do, but you have not made a brave use of it to torture a poor girl who wants work."

"Miss Cray, I believe you are so far competent that I have no hesitation in offering you the situation. You speak truth, in spite of its being calculated in many a similar case to lose you an engagement. I therefore see you are likely to give instruction. Will you accept my situation of governess?"

Noddy hardly believed her ears. "I will," she said, with heartfelt thankfulness.

"You have not mentioned terms, remember."

"I am content to accept what you may please to offer."

"Then I have only one other question to put. You may think it a strange one, but I shall be obliged if you will answer it. Do you know what you are?" There was a distinct alteration in the old gentleman's voice that sounded queer.

"No," Noddy said, blankly enough.

"Then I must ask another, — do you know what day this is?"

"The 29th of September."

"Then you are the biggest little Michaelmas-goose that ever was!" and the elderly gentleman kicked off his gouty legs, and pitched his skull-cap and wig into the fender; "and you had better own it, Noddy!"

There stood Mr. Frank Geogagan.

"Turned eight, Noddy," he said; "and turned eight-and-twenty, for the matter of that. Behold your pupil! Of the establishment, you see I am the governor. You have already given me your promise to be governess. Do you wish to withdraw it?" — and he came towards her.

Noddy was utterly disconcerted for the moment, but she got out of his way. "Mr. Frank," she said, "I answered your question, now please answer mine. Do you know what you are?"

"No," said Mr. Frank.

"You are a most dreadful horrid story; that's what you are. You said you had lost all your money." Noddy was nearly crying.

"No. I said, 'all I had in India,'—which was quite true, and six thousand pounds. I did not tell you I had brought four times that sum home with me."

"You told me you were going to seek employment." Mr. Frank was dodging her about the room.

"I did,—you told me to go and dig,—I came down here and took this little farm, and I have gone and dug, or digged, whichever you prefer."

"But you don't want a governess, after all; and that was a wicked cheat."

"But I do, Noddy. I want to be made such a man of as you can love, and you have given your word, you will not refuse. You won't take it back again? you will forgive me the artifice? For I love you as I can love no other woman."

Mr. Frank caught her up. "It is a very bad story," she said. But Mr. Frank gathered her to him in his arms; and Noddy did not refuse. He folded her to him against his breast, and Noddy did not refuse. He hushed her sobs as she lay nestled against him like a bird that has found shelter. "I love you with all my heart," she murmured, "and I'm so happy!" (in proof of which she was wiping tears from her eyes); "but you don't think I loved you for your money?"

"I'm sure you did n't, little goose," said Frank, soothing her with kisses.

"I had rather you had n't any at all, and that we had to work together."

"Nonsense, Noddy; you have forgotten you are a little woman of property yourself. Just come out with me and take the first instalment of a quarter's interest for your twenty pounds." He led her through the house, and out into the dairy, to have a draught of warm new milk. It was from Noddy's investment,—the finest milch cow on the farm.

Somehow, the comfortable old housekeeper did n't seem altogether surprised at Mr. Frank walking about the shrubbery with his new governess on his arm; I think she must have been in the secret.

Noddy did not return to her step-mother. In three days she was Mr. Frank's wife, and as there were no cards, this is how Mr. Geogagan informed Mrs. Muciller of Noddy's marriage:—

"MADAM,—I beg to inform you that Miss Cray has accepted the situation. FRANK GEOGAGAN.

"Pinewood, Lyndhurst."

FOREIGN NOTES.

MR. HENRY KINGSLEY has assumed the editorship of the Daily Review, a leading Liberal Edinburgh newspaper.

A LETTER from St. Petersburg announces the death of the celebrated Russian romance writer, Lashetschnikoff.

RISTORI has been received with almost royal honors in Brazil. Her first appearance was made in the "Medea" of M. Legouvé.

In Paris, a vast lyrical theatre, to contain 4,000 spectators, is to be constructed, the price of admission to which will be, for certain parts of the house, only one franc.

THE King of Bavaria has just decided that in future the anniversaries of the births of Gluck, Mozart, Beethoven, and Weber shall be celebrated at the Theatre Royal of Munich by extraordinary performances.

ALEXANDRE DUMAS will bring out in November his "Dictionnaire de Cuisine," the most prolific novelist of the age being likewise the best cook of modern times. The author of "Les Trois Mousquetaires" is a master of the art illustrated by Brillat-Savarin, Vatel, Soyer, and others.

THE immense oyster beds on the coast of France have been nearly destroyed by the intense heat. The most despondent owners had not anticipated so complete a disaster as that which has overtaken them. It is now certain that the harvest of this year will be a total failure; in many cases the beds are entirely depopulated and their owners ruined.

It is stated in the Italian papers that great progress is making with the Mont Cenis tunnel, the works being actively carried on night and day, and that there is every probability the line will be opened in the course of next year. To celebrate this event it has now been definitively decided that a Universal Exhibition shall be held at Turin in the spring of 1872.

THE young Earl of Rosse, the son of the peer whose monster telescope and love of astronomy are memorable things in their way, does not appear to advantage as an orator. One of the English journals alludes to the earl as "the pale, nervous young man who has spoken once or twice in the House of Lords on the Irish Church question, but has always been next to inaudible."

A CURIOUS old portrait has been discovered of Napoleon I., painted at Ajaccio in March, 1773, by Cavallucci. The future Emperor was then but four years old. He is dressed in a sailor's costume of dark olive green, and wears pointed shoes with silver buckles. Thick hair falls over the child's forehead, but the features wear a decided resemblance to subsequent likenesses.

THE last lottery which the French Government will license has been drawn. The first prize of one hundred thousand francs was won by a young seamstress of Paris whose fiancé on last New Year's Day bought two tickets of the Loterie de Toulouse, and, offering her one, said he did so because he could not afford a more costly gift. The young girl is going to marry him, which, under the circumstances, strikes one as the least she could do.

OF all the mad books ever written by a man of genius "L'Homme qui Rit," says the Pall Mall Gazette, appears to us to be the maddest. The incipient insanity which might be observed in "Notre Dame de Paris," and which in that work might be described as the extravagance of genius, began to run to seed in "Les Misérables," became far worse in the "Travailleurs de la Mer," and has gone almost as far as it can go in "L'Homme qui Rit."

THE movement for woman's rights has spread to Italy. Not long since a young and beautiful woman appeared before the Roman Senate, and announced herself to be the last descendant of the Emperors of the East, living unknown with her father in a valley in Piedmont; and, producing documents, she demanded an investigation of her pretensions. The Senate complied with her request, and finally recognized her as the Princess Lascaris-Paleologus, ordering her name to be thus inscribed in the "Book of Gold" at the Capitol. The Princess subsequently went to Florence, where she has now taken a bolder step and founded a masonic lodge for women.

THE Prince of Wales has presented to the Euter Museum a mummy and coffin discovered during the progress of some excavations recently made in Egypt, by command of his Royal Highness, with the sanction of the Viceroy of Egypt. Mr. S. Birch, of the British Museum, pronounces the mummy to be the body of Amenhetpai, a man prepared by the wax process. The coffin is covered with hieroglyphical inscriptions, an explanation of which has been supplied by a learned gentleman.

LADIES who bathe will be interested in the costume of lady bathers at Dieppe. At that town the members of a newly formed swimming club wear a vêtement of stout white merino, close-fitting to the shape, and bound at the knees with scarlet ribbon, a scarlet sash round the waist, and a scarlet ruche round the neck; short sleeves, looped with scarlet bows, and a casquette of the same material as the vêtement, with a scarlet peak. We don't comprehend a word of this. We copy it blindly from "The Ladies' own Paper."

M. GARNIER, architect of the new opera house, was the first to announce to the Paris press the triumph of his rival candidate for the Emperor's quinquennial prize of four thousand pounds, to be awarded to the finest work of art produced by a French subject since the year 1864. Ten candidates alone contended for the prize. M. Duc, architect of the new Palais de Justice, was elected by a majority of two over Blanc, and by six over M. Garnier. M. Duc, in 1831, was the architect of the Column of July erected on the Place de la Bastille.

A HUNGARIAN paper, the Hermannstädter Zeitung, mentions a new system of railway signalling, invented by Herr Eduard Krejczy, the special advantages of which are the following: 1. A train, without slackening its speed, can communicate with any station or any other train on the same track. 2. In case of an accident the train itself can signal for assistance, and make the casualty known along the whole line. 3. A concussion is impossible, as two trains in motion can constantly exchange signals. 4. The working of the new system is very cheap. Herr Krejczy has placed his invention in the hands of the Hungarian Government, with the stipulation that in case of its being sold he is to receive one half of the purchase-money and the State the other.

AN extraordinary accident lately took place at Malta. Some officers of the garrison, thinking to compliment the inhabitants of the island on one of their great festivals, that of the Madonna of Mount Carmel, added to the illuminations provided by the Roman Catholic authorities by fixing a number of lights from the stores which were always understood to be kept for the purpose of lighting up the port in the case of a night attack. They proved, however, to be fatal projectiles, and as soon as they were fired they delivered a storm of grape-shot. Fortunately, although there were crowds of spectators, little or no harm was done. The officers, seeing the mistake they had made, rushed forward at great personal risk, and threw several of the infernal machines into the sea, when they exploded under water.

If in France women fail to obtain some legal or political status, it will not be for want of their own energy, or the eloquence of their advocates. A grand banquet was given in Paris a short time since at which those of both sexes most interested in the question of "l'affranchissement des femmes" were present. The chair was taken by M. Guérault, the principal editor of L'Opinion Nationale; whilst the vice-chair was occupied by Mlle. Maria Deraismes. Amongst the guests were Messrs. Arthur Arnould and Robert Hyenne, of the Rappel; Feyrnet, of Le Temps; Henri Carle, of La Libre Conscience; Aristide Roger, of Le Petit Journal; Camille Flammarion, Ch. Fauvey, &c. Amongst the ladies were Mlles. Maxime Brenil, Louise Bader, editress of the Revue Populaire, and Karl, a well-known actress, Mmes. Arnould, Esther-Sezzi, and Collet, Miss Cameron and Miss Blands, Mde. Augusta Gamberg, from Finland, and many others. After dinner the gentlemen and ladies seem to have spoken in turns. M. Léon Richer, the editor of a journal, Le Droit des Femmes, the majority of the contributors to which are ladies, exposed the object of his paper and of the meeting, — namely, the pacific solution of the various difficulties which at present surround the position of women in society. Mlle. Brenil, whilst thanking the men whose presence at the dinner was a proof of their assent to the efforts made by woman towards emancipation, added that the greatest enemy woman had to contend with was the impalpable but ever present one — "on dira ceci et cela"; and the on, according to Mlle. Brenil, represents only women, — of whose raillery women are more afraid than they are of men's. The speech of Mde. Gamberg — who had arrived from Finland to attend the meeting — is not reported. It would have been interesting to learn the present position of women's rights in those distant countries, and under the paternal government of the Czar.

MY DARLING.

My darling is the sweetest maid
That ever lived on marmalade

Or wanted wings, to make her
The angel that she ought to be;
But then — unluckily for me;
I'm five-and-forty, and, you see,
She's only twelve — deuce take her!

Why, I was over forty-three Before she had begun to be —
That B you see leads me to D,
Because the Fates miscarry.
To let her be my wife a bar
They prove — nor suffer letter R.
To make my MARY marry!

Her hair is gold in wavy curls,
Her eyes are stars, her teeth are pearls,
Her boots are bronze and lace up,
Her cheek is bloomy like a plum,
Her breath is sweet as marjorum;
But poetry is weak to sum
Her figure and her face up.

Alas, the truth I must aver, —
My nephew Dick's in love with her,
While Prudence says I should prefer
Her aunt, who's plain and heavy.
O, would — but why ask Fate to grant
A boon which I'm aware it can't?
O, would that she had been her aunt,
Or I had been my nerry.

MY CASUAL ACQUAINTANCES.

AT five o'clock one August afternoon, a few years ago, it was hot in Piccadilly.

"Must one dress?" I asked in pathetic tones.

"Of course," replied Tibbit. "You are in London, my dear Stumps. — You will excuse my leaving you now, but I have important letters to write before dinner. Remember, half-past seven to the fraction of a second: till then, fare you well."

Important letters I knew meant adjournment to his chambers in the Albany, the removal of his coat and neckcloth, a glass of sherry and bitters a cigarette, and a sound nap till it was time to adorn himself for the event of his day; and I thought that he might have kept company for once with a poor provincial, who had but his hotel to go to when he was weary of strolling about the streets. But still a dinner at the Apician is doubtless a very great treat, and I felt ashamed of my ungrateful repinings.

Ah, here was one of the bliss-houses of my youth, still open, and showing by large announcements that it continued to cater for sight-seers. My heart was forty-two, and did not beat on approaching the Egyptian Hall so violently as it had done thirty years before, but it gave a decided though slight wobble; so fresh do hearts keep in the country. Any entertainment would be more amusing than sitting alone in the hotel smoking-room reperusing the newspapers. What! the Victoria Cross Gallery? Why, that was one of the things I had wished to see directly I heard of it. An old schoolfellow had shot six Russians with his own revolver at the affair of the Ovens in the Crimea, and another had spitted several mutineers in India with a regulation sword: a wonderful feat to the mind of a fencer, who finds one of those weapons clumsy enough in his hand after the foil. I turned in, paid my shilling, and ascended the well-remembered stairs, hoping that the room would not be crowded that hot afternoon. The selfish wish was gratified: the only living being in the place was an official seated behind a green baize table at the entrance, who wanted me to buy a catalogue, and write my name in a large book spread open before him for the purpose. To the first request I gladly acceded, but not to the second. The name of Stumps is not beautiful in itself, and I could not flatter myself that it would awaken any particular enthusiasm in the mind of a subsequent visitor who might read it; unless, indeed, he was a monomaniac about cricket. So I left the half-filled page unenriched by my autograph, and gave myself up to the enjoyment of a real treat. The room was cool, there were seats at intervals, and the pictures were just what I enjoy; full of action, and representing stirring scenes. A man named Stumps cannot be expected to appreciate high art; or at any rate I don't. I own with shame that I like Music with a tune, and Painting with a story; that I am a being without culture in short, fit to make all Mr. M——w A——d's nerves jar horribly if I came within five yards of him. Now, with the exception of a few French works, like the "Gorge du Malakoff" and the "Prise du Malakoff," all the battle-pictures I had hitherto seen were disappointing representations of smoke and impossible horses, with a broken gun-carriage and a few dead soldiers in the foreground. But there was a vivid, thrilling episode in each of the paintings which now engrossed my attention, and to study them seemed as good as reading Napier.

I was roused from rapt admiration of a couple of midshipmen in the ditch of a fortified place at midnight, one of whom was quietly lighting a portfire with his cigar, by the sound of voices and the rustling of dresses, and turning round I saw five newcomers clustered round the visitors' book. They had no objections to signing their names. Paterfamilias, who was round and stout and pleasant-featured as the ideal middle-aged gentlemen in Punch, said: "Eh, what?" and scratched his signature with the rapidity of a man who was constantly performing that operation. His wife a portly lady with an imposing nose and proud demeanor, took longer about it, evidently reading the names which preceded her own. Her two pretty daughters — the relationship was written on their faces — signed next; and then a young man in flower-show apparel, with silky hair parted in the middle, took the pen, whispering something to the youngest girl, who simpered. I'd have taken slight odds he uttered an allusion to a ceremony which is performed in vestries.

Of course, I was not staring, but took this little by-play in out of the corners of my eyes, which were still apparently riveted upon the midshipmen who were engaged in patriotic arson. Why only apparently? Because the proper study for mankind is man; because, though Art is very fine, Nature sometimes beats it; and because, even at forty-two, if one lives in the country, a pretty girl is still a pleasing object.

I soon discovered a fact, however, which modesty and experience alike prevented my calculating upon; they were noticing me. I remember a story, told I think, in this Journal, of a man who flattered himself that he was stalking a lion, and hearing a rustle in the bushes behind him, found that the lion was stalking him. I sympathized with that sportsman. There could be no doubt about it. Madam was the first to gaze on me, as though she thought she knew me, whenever she fancied herself unperceived; then she nudged her husband, and whispered in his ear, whereupon he too inspected me, as if I had formed part of the exhibition; then a mysterious communication was conveyed to the girls, and they examined me in a quiet sort of way, shyly but perceptibly. The young man, too, gave a glance in my direction, but evidently did not think much of me, — his attention being engrossed by the charms of the younger-looking of the two sisters, though, indeed, neither of them appeared more than twenty. An incident soon occurred which I am almost ashamed to mention, lest it should appear to be insinuated that it was not entirely accidental, as of course it must have been. The whole party, making their tour of inspection, passed behind me in single file, Materfamilias bringing up the rear; and just as she passed me, she dropped the pencil with which she was marking her catalogue, without perceiving the loss until she was two pictures off, when she suddenly called to her eldest daughter: "O, do look here, love; here is dear Sir Henry Slasher, whom you danced with the other night, cutting a horrid native's head off! I must put a cross against that. Dear me, what has become of my pencil?"

I picked up the little golden toy, studded with turquoises, which lay at my feet, and presented it to her. Her gratitude was amazing. She set a particular value upon the article; would not have lost it for worlds; was so much obliged to me. Perhaps you are aware how fascinating the manners of a proud matron with a Roman nose are when she condescends to make herself agreeable. I was quite charmed, and being very sociable in disposition, preferring, indeed, almost any one's society to my own, I was glad enough to accept the advances towards conversation which were made to me, in a cordial manner. Presently Paterfamilias chimed in; and then the eldest girl asked some question about a picture which was referred to me, and so in a little while I found myself chatting away indifferently with the whole party. They were a very diffident family, at least so far as opinion of their own judgment about works of art went, for they listened to my crude observations with a respect which seemed almost tinged with awe. I was cautious at first, fearing lest the young man with silky hair might be either a painter or a soldier; but when I found that he was perfectly ignorant about the things represented, and the merit of the representations, I launched out. It is not often that a commonplace dweller in the provinces finds an appreciative audience, and it is therefore just as well for him to make the most of the opportunity when he does.

The time slipped pleasantly away, till it was necessary for me to go and adorn myself for Tibbit's banquet; and then I took a cordial leave of my new acquaintances, and left the place, feeling rather as though I deserved a Victoria Cross myself, for had I not stormed the reserve of a respectable British family? I rather wished that they had gone away first, and so afforded me an opportunity of looking at the visitors' book, and finding out what their names were; especially the Christian name of the elder of the two young ladies, who had a peculiar droop of the eyelids and a certain dimple on the left cheek when she smiled, which made me feel that perhaps I had been wrong to put off from year to year the crowning of the edifice by the election of a Mrs. Stumps. Pooh, — pooh! absurd; I was as old as her mother! "But O my heart is an evergreen," and would not be pooh-poohed.

But however fresh the heart may be, it is apt, after beating for forty years, to find a powerful rival in the stomach, and I certainly forgot all about smiles and dimples when the table-napkin was across my knees. Tibbit has not many merits, but he does understand how to order a dinner, and the artist of the Apician can execute that order in a manner to satisfy the most exacting gourmet. In the smoking-room afterwards, however, those drooping eyelids came back upon me, and I spoke of the acquaintances I had picked up to Tibbit.

"Very curious, their showing such readiness to be friendly with a complete stranger, was it not?" I observed.

"Very," replied Tibbit. "The younger man said nothing about the game of skittles, I suppose?"

"Absurd!"

"Neither did the cheerful father propose subscribing seventy-five pounds to a hospital, if you would put down another twenty-five to make up the hundred — eh?"

Tibbit has a most absurd conceit of the superior wisdom of dwellers in cities, and supposes that a man who, like myself, is for the greater portion of the year "buried," as he calls it, in the deepest wilds of the agricultural counties, must be ready to fall an easy prey to the first sharper who chooses to bait a hook for him. But, except in gastronomy, Tibbit is shallow.

My reason for making my home so far from London is, that I cannot afford to gratify my passion for field-sports on any other terms. The hire of a moor is also quite beyond my means, so, when trout-fishing ends, it is a dead season for me till September; and at the time I am speaking of, I was therefore "on the rampage." This unsettled period comprised a month at Scarborough (spent), three weeks in London, two of which had also expired, and the rest of the time in Paris, or at one of the gay German baths. So seven days after Tibbit's dinner, I went to London Bridge Station to catch the tidal train, and, in consequence of three separate and distinct blocks on the road, nearly missed it.

"Look sharp, sir, and I'll manage it for you. First-class? All right, sir. Take the portmanteau in the carriage with you? Two places; here you are."

Moralists may write what letters to the Times they like, but that porter deserved his shilling. I should certainly have had to go back ingloriously to my hotel, and remain there till next day, if he had not been remarkably spry. The guard was whistling shrilly, and some official was calling out to another that all was right behind, as the tipped one shoved my portmanteau under the seat; and when I plumped down, panting, and he slammed the door to, the train was actually in motion.

When I ceased to be a flurried package, and grew capable of observing, I discovered that the four occupied seats besides my own were filled by my acquaintances of the Victoria Cross Gallery, minus the young man with silky hair. I greeted them, and they returned my salutations most cordially. The drooping-eyed one was sitting next to me, and was faced by her mother, to whom, of course, I directed my conversation, not, however, with the same complete success which had attended my efforts to interest her on the former occasion, as her mind seemed to be much occupied with a peculiar class of phenomena.

"I beg your pardon," she observed, soon after we were clear of the station, "you are next the window, can you tell me if the smoke from the chimneys is going straight up?"

"Not quite," I replied; "it is waving about, as smoke usually does."

Soon we were in the open country, and then she put another question. "Are the trees still, or swaying to and fro?"

"They seem pretty quiet, I think," said I wondering.

And then Paterfamilias leaned forward, and spoke of some matter about which he had been reading, — a Times article.

His wife soon interrupted us. "There is a wind-mill somewhere about here," she said, "on the left."

"O yes; I can see it," I replied, looking out of window.

"Tell me, O, do tell me, is it going round?"

"No," said I, beginning to think her rather cracked. "It is quite quiet; no grinding going on to-day."

I suppose that the young lady sitting next me saw a bewildered and curious expression on my face, for she offered an interpretation. "Mamma dreads sea-sickness during the crossing so very much," she said, "and takes great interest in the wind."

"O!" cried I, much relieved in mind, "then I am glad to say that it seems to be very calm."

"Thank goodness!" exclaimed the mother.

What brutish husbands almost invariably are. A man standing in any other relation to this poor lady would have let her take what encouragement she could from the motionless windmill; but her rougher half must needs blurt out, "You cannot tell inland what the weather is on the sea; I dare say it is blowing half a gale of wind at Dover."

"Prophet of evil!" said his wife, "I will not listen to you."

"You think too much about it, and frighten yourself into being ill," continued he. "Are you, sir, a good sailor?"

"Stumps, — Mr. Stumps," added I, observing that he paused.

There seemed to be a prospect of our travelling together, for I was quite alone and unfettered, and glad enough of their company, while they apparently liked mine. So, as it is very inconvenient for people who are thrown much together not to know one another's names, I was glad to have the opportunity of at once avowing mine.

But I could not imagine why it should give them all an electric shock, which it did: if they had been joined hand in hand, and the word "Stumps" had been the brass knob of a charged Leyden jar to which one of them had advanced a knuckle they could not have started more simultaneously.

Of course the involuntary movement was very slight, and might not have been observed, but that I was somewhat thin-skinned about my name, and therefore on the watch for the smile which it sometimes evoked; but there was no smile, only a thrill of surprise, which was immediately suppressed.

"O, indeed," said Paterfamilias. "I did not mean to — to be inquisitive; but since — in short, self-introduction — my name is Draper; this is Mrs. Draper (bows); this is my eldest daughter, Caroline (bows); this my youngest, Julia (bows)."

"And the young man who was with you at the Egyptian Hall the other day, was he your son?" I asked.

"O no, Mr. Stumps," replied Mrs. Draper, with a strong accentuation of the word "Stumps." "He was only a friend, no relative."

I looked across at Miss Julia, who tried to appear unconcerned, but colored slightly. It was evidently as I had supposed. What taste in the lad to think twice of the younger sister while the elder was there!

Caroline is nice; but her family called her Carry, which was intoxicating. It was impossible for me to help showing a certain anxiety to please when speaking to her, or paying her any little ordinary attention, quite different from my manner towards her parents or sister; and I thought she noticed it, and seemed rather pleased than otherwise. There is no fool, you know, like an old fool.

There were opportunities enough of showing civility to all of them before we got to Paris, for — though Mr. Draper did his best, and was not inactive for his figure — to wrestle with so much luggage as the ladies found it necessary to travel with, was quite beyond the powers of any one man who was not a Briareus, or an Argus, or a Hercules or some other peculiarly gifted myth. And then that overtaken gentleman's anticipations about the weather proved correct; it was blowing very hard in the Channel, and he did not get off much better than his wife on this occasion. Indeed, the whole Draper family were thoroughly prostrated, and as I am not subject to the malady of the sea, they looked up to me very much as people do to a doctor when there is illness in a house. The romantic boy breaks ground by presenting the girl of his heart with a nosegay; I, middle-aged and practical, insinuated myself by handing a basin.

When we were in the train on the other side, and my fellow-travellers had recovered, they seemed really hurt and ashamed at having put me to so much trouble; not that they bored me by dwelling much on the subject, but what they did say was evidently genuine.

Then they deferred to me in everything. "Which is the best hotel to go to, Mr. Stumps?" "How long ought we to stop in Paris, Mr. Stumps?"

That was a queer thing; they never spoke to me without mentioning my name with an emphasis, pausing upon it, as it were, as if to impress it upon their memories. And when Miss Carry grew playful, as she did under my attentions, she said "Mr. Stumps" in a sly way, as though there was some joke in the word, which I did not at all like, seeing that I soon began to contemplate the possibility of asking her to assume it.

For I went to the same hotel as they did; walked, drove, dined, and visited the theatre with them. When they were tired of Paris, we went to Cologne and up the Rhine together; and by the time we had settled down at Wiesbaden, I was quite like a member of the family, and the continued deference they, and particularly Carry, paid to everything I said, might well have tickled the vanity and softened the heart of a man even older than I was.

At last I determined to declare myself, and took the opportunity of speaking to Mr. Draper after the table-d'hôte, when we were taking cigars and coffee at a little round table in the courtyard of the Rose. I told him that I knew I was rather old for his daughter, and that I was not possessed of that wealth which in these cases often makes up for lack of youth; but that I was not exactly poor either, and would do my best to make Carry happy.

"Well, my lord," said he, "of course I am deeply sensible of the honor a man of your rank does my girl by such an offer—"

"My lord! What on earth do you mean?" interrupted I.

"Surely, it is time to throw off your incognito when such a serious matter as marriage is being discussed," he said.

"Incognito! What are you driving at? Whom do you take me for?"

"Why, for the Marquis of Walden," he replied.

"Marquis of Walden!" cried I. "Come, come, if you have other views for your daughter, say so; but there is no need to banter me."

"Do you mean to tell me you are not the marquis?"

"Of course I am not; there never was a title in my family yet."

"Then who are you?"

"The man I profess myself, to be sure,—plain Mr. Stumps."

Mr. Draper remained utterly dumbfounded for a while, but at last roused himself sufficiently to say, "I beg your pardon for the mistake; but why, may I ask, did you sign yourself the Marquis of Walden in the visitors' book at the Victoria Cross Gallery?"

"I never committed such an absurdity."

"It was the last name in the book when we entered, and you were the only person in the room."

"I can't help that," cried I, losing patience; "I never signed my name at all."

Mr. Draper sat still a little while with his lips tightly compressed, and his fat sides and shoulders heaving convulsively at intervals. At last he could bear it no longer, and exploding with irrepressible laughter, he rose and rushed into the hotel; while I strode off in a state of boiling indignation to the Rooms, and lost a couple of pounds worth of florins to relieve my feelings.

The cold manner of Mrs., and alas! also of Miss Draper towards me on the following morning was so extremely disgusting, after their late cordiality, that I packed up my portmanteau and left the place at once. I must say that Draper himself looked hurt and ashamed, and, I doubt not, would have apologized for his own mirth the evening before, and his wife and daughter's behavior afterwards, if he could have got hold of me alone. Poor hen-pecked wretch! Well, if I had been a marquis or a millionaire, I might have been hen-pecked too at this present writing; but that I may now safely say I never will be. I have learned my last lesson.

AN EXPERIENCE.

IN TWO CHAPTERS. — CHAPTER II.

WHEN I was again aware of anything that could have belonged to the real world,—and not to the dreadful world of horrors, some terrible, some grotesque, in which my diseased brain had, during an inexplicable period, lived such life as it had known,

—I was in my own room in Strathcarrin Street. One of the first things I consciously noticed and thought about, was the fact that my bed had been moved, from the sleeping and dressing closet in which it usually stood, out into the open room.

My dreamy eyes took this fact in slowly; after a while, my drowsy brain languidly decided that this meant I had been sometime ill, and that the bed had been moved in order to give me more air.

This settled, my weak mind was free to take note of, and feebly to speculate about other facts.

A woman sat at work not far from my bedside. Which of the hospital nurses would this be, I wondered. She was working by the light of a shaded lamp. This was night, then, I supposed, or, at least, evening.

Was it summer or winter?

There was no fire burning in the grate, and, by the moving to and fro of a blind, I knew a window was open; so I concluded it was summer.

Night-time and summer-time. I had, then, settled something.

Next, who was this woman? I seemed to need to settle this also.

I could not see her face from where I lay. I watched the swift out-flying and return of the busy hand, and wondered about her, and impatiently fretted for her to turn round towards me, that I might see her face.

But she worked on.

I remember a lady once saying to me (long years after this time, but when she said it this scene returned upon me), "Work, indeed! needlework!" she spoke with a bitter intonation and an infinite contempt. "Amuse myself with my needle! How often have I been counselled to do that! Such a sweet, soothing, quiet, gracious employment! So it is, for the satisfied, the happy, the occupied. Nothing can be sweeter than to sit at one's needle through a long summer-day, and dream over one's happiness, and think out one's thoughts. But if one be not happy, and if one's thoughts be dangerous? Or, if one be utterly weary and ennuyée, and the mind seems empty of all thought?"

"To you men it is all one. To see a woman sitting at her needle makes you content. You think she is safe, out of mischief, just sufficiently amused, and so suitably occupied! Not too much engrossed to be ready to listen to and to serve your lordships; not so far ennuyée as to be disposed to make exacting claims upon your attention and your sympathy."

"Your eyes rest on her with satisfaction; she forms such a charming picture of housewifely repose and industry,— 'Ohne Hast ohne Rast.' You like to let your eyes rest upon her when you choose to look up from your paper, your review, or your wise. You feel at liberty to study her at your leisure, as you might a picture. It never occurs to you that mocking, miserable, mad thoughts may be hammering her brain,—that passion, desperation, despair, or that utter weariness, worse than all, may be in her soul!"

This woman, sitting by the shaded lamp in my room, worked on and on.

By and by some lines of the throat and bust and shoulders began to be suggestive to my slow brain. They seemed to belong to some remembered person. To whom?

As well as I could see, this woman was dressed in white; a white, short gown, such as the peasant women wear, open at the throat, loose at the sleeve; probably, because of the heat, she had taken off her outer dress. As I was straining to remember, a great sense of pressure upon my brain, descending on me, and grasping me with the tightening grasp of a cold and heavy hand, stopped me. I should have swooned into sleep, but just then the woman laid down her work, looked at a watch hanging near her, rose, and came towards the bed.

Immediately, I closed my eyes, but voluntarily. She came close, bent over me, as if listening for my breath. I felt her breath: was conscious even of the warmth and fragrance of her vitality, as she stooped over me. Presently she laid her hand upon my clammy forehead.

Instinct revealed to me who she was: without opening my eyes, I saw her. A cold sweat of horror broke out over me; such life as was left me seemed oozing away through my pores; I was ready to sink into a swoon of death-like depth.

But I heard these words:—

"That he may not die, great God, that he may not die!" And they arrested me on the brink of that horrible sinking away, to hold me on the brink instead of letting me fall through.

Somehow, those words, though they saved me for that moment, did not remove my sense of horror and fear, any more than is the victim who knows himself singled out for death by slow torture, comforted and reassured by the means taken to bring him back from his first swoon to consciousness of his next agony.

Was it that physical weakness and nearness to death gave me clearer vision than that with which I saw later, when my senses had gathered power?

It was fear. I now experienced—there is no denying it—a most horrible fear,—a shrinking of the spirit and of the flesh.

Why was I given over to her?

Was this another world, in which she had power given her to torment me? Was this my hell?

I, weak as a child, was alone with her. That awful woman with the terrible eyes, and the arms uplifted to curse me! The woman of my dread and dreadful dreams and fever-fancies.

Here, I believe, the icy waters of that horrible cold swoon closed over my consciousness.

But by and by (and whether after moments, hours, or even days, I had no means of knowing), when I felt the gentleness of the hand that was busy about me,—wiping the clammy moisture from my forehead, bathing it with ether, holding to my nostrils a strong reviving essence, wetting my stiff lips with brandy; when I felt a soft strong arm under my neck, slightly raising my head to lean it on the yielding breast,—when I felt the soothing comfort of the warmth, the softness, the fragrance of vitality, after the wormy chill of the grave, whose taste and smell seemed to linger in my mouth and nostrils,—then it seemed not hell but heaven to which I was delivered.

Presently she gave me to drink some restorative medicine which was measured out ready for me. I swallowed it. She wiped my lips. I closed my eyes. Silence was, as yet, unbroken between us.

That medicine was strong stuff: a few moments after I had taken it, life, and conscious delight in the sense of life, went tingling through me.

Almost afraid to speak, and yet too full of wonder to remain silent, after I had for some moments listened to the steady, somewhat heavy, pulsations of the heart so near which I leaned, I asked,—

"Have I been long ill?"

"A month."

She had paused before she spoke, and her breast had heaved high,—was it, I have wondered since, in proud disgust to bear my hated head upon it.

She did not look at me as she spoke, I knew, for I did not feel her breath.

"What sort of illness?"

"Congestion of the brain."

"Is the danger past?"

"If you can be kept from dying of weakness."

"And how comes it that you nurse me?"

"I have given myself up to be a nurse."

"And have you nursed me all this month?"

"No, not the first week: not till after my child was buried."

The tone of that last answer made me shudder. It was so unnatural, in its perfect freedom from all emotion.

"I shall tire you," I said; "lay me down."

Fear was regaining its empire over me.

She did as I asked her, and, after she had arranged my pillows and the bedclothes neatly, moved to her work-table. The delicious sense of warm life was fast dying away out of me.

"Are you Mrs. Rosscar?" I asked presently, raising myself on one elbow, for an instant, to look at her.

"I am your nurse," she answered me, without looking up from her work.

I made another effort to try and get things explained and disentangled; but they were too much for me. Before I had framed another question I was overwhelmed by sleep.

That was my second "lucid interval." The first in which I was capable of speech, I believe. A week elapsed before I had another.

I knew something of what passed; I distinguished voices: I knew that Dr. Fearnwell was often in the room; I was conscious that I had a second nurse. I knew who she was: one of the hospital-nurses, a good, honest, hearty creature, but coarse and rough—a woman never intrusted with the care of delicate cases; but she seemed to act here as servant to Mrs. Rosscar. I knew all these things, but they seemed to concern some other person. When I tried to recognize myself in things, to take hold of anything with distinct self-consciousness, then came those horrible sweats and swoons, and overwhelmed me.

It was a strange wild phase of semi-existence, instructive to a man of my profession to pass through.

For some time after I had got on a good way towards recovery, I talked and thought of myself as "that sick man": seemed to watch what was done to me, as if it were being done to some other person.

When this phase cleared off, the sense of relief was not unmixed: for I had so laboriously to take myself to myself again,—to learn that that sick man's history was mine, that his memories were mine, his remorse mine, that I often groaned at the labor of it.

"You would never have struggled through, but for the skill and the devotion of your nurse," Dr. Fearnwell said to me.

"So he thinks I have struggled through now," I remarked to Mrs. Rosscar when he was gone. "I must call you something different from 'nurse.'" I went on. "It is impossible that you and that good rough creature should share one title between you."

"I should share no title with any good creature."

"You know it was not that I meant."

"I know it was not that you meant."

"What may I call you?"

"You may call me, if you choose, by my own name, Huldah."

"Huldah!" I repeated. "I wish you had a softer name. It is difficult to say Huldah softly, and —"

"I have known it said softly," she answered. "I have never, since I was a child, been called by that name, except by one person. You may call me by it."

Saying this, she let her eyes, which I had hardly ever, till then, for one moment, been able to meet, rest on mine with a heavy fulness of expression that sent a languid subtle fire through my veins, — that, also, made me again afraid; after meeting it, I watched, covertly, for its recurrence.

Mine was a long, protracted, uncertain convalescence. I did not set my will towards growing well. I yielded myself up rather to the luxury of my position, yielded myself up, body and soul, as it were. I was under a spell of fascination not devoid of fear. The shock that felled me had come upon me when my whole health of mind and body was at a low ebb. In looking back, I recognize this, though I had not at the time been conscious of it. I had never, since I was a boy, given myself a holiday; never given one hour's indulgence to any passion but that of ambition, till I knew Mrs. Rosscar.

At the time of my meeting her, I had just come to the dregs of my powers, but was not yet conscious of the bitterness of those dregs.

Now, it seemed as if my whole nature — moral, intellectual, physical — voluntarily succumbed. I lay, as I have said, under a spell, and luxuriated in my own powerlessness. As yet it was not the bitter but the sweet dregs of the cup that were passing over my lips.

The weather was hot; boxes of mignonette, some heliotropes, and lemon-scented verbenas, were in my balcony. She watered them of an evening, and let the windows be open and the scent of them float in to me as I lay and watched her at her work.

While this delicious languid luxury of convalescence lasted, and did not pall upon me, why should I wish to get well? While she was there to feed me, I would not raise a hand to feed myself.

The truth was, that my nurse, my perfect nurse, of whom Dr. Fearnwell now and again spoke with an enthusiasm and effusion that would fire my weak brain with sudden jealousy, — my nurse, who would, in untiring watchfulness and self-forgetting devotion to her task, have been a perfect nurse for any man, who had been indifferent to her, to whom she had been indifferent, was now a most pernicious nurse to me.

I loved her with a desperate sort of passion, — a love far more of the senses than the heart.

She was neither an innocent nor an ignorant woman. She knew exactly what to do and what to leave undone. She gave me no chance of growing indifferent through familiarity, if, indeed, with such beauty as hers that could have been possible. As I grew better, though always on duty near me, she was less and less in my room; ever oftener and oftener, when I longed in those cold half-swoonings and icy sweats of weakness, with an almost delirious longing to feel myself soothed and cherished, as on that first season of consciousness, by her close presence, there came to my call, not Mrs. Rosscar, but the other nurse, with her coarse good-tempered face, and her form, from which — reducing, as it did, the sublime to the ridiculous, and the lovely to the loathsome, in its caricaturing exaggeration of all feminine charms — I turned in disgust.

Every day Mrs. Rosscar seemed to me more beautiful. Every day I seemed to feel her beauty more bewilderingly and overpoweringly. Not so much the beauty of her face; it was strange how unfamiliar that remained to me, and how seldom I had a full look into it; whenever it was possible, it was averted from me; her eyes shunned mine, and she kept the room so dim, that I had little chance of studying her expression. If I noticed this, I accounted to myself for it by supposing her to be growing conscious of the burning fever of my passion. Not so much did the beauty of her face, I say, bind me prisoner. It was the beauty of her presence that so grew upon me: of her whole physical self, as it were. Of her mind and heart I knew nothing. With the music of her movement, the gracious delicacy and harmony of all she did, I was more and more captivated.

The accidents of the sick-room, the perfect postures into which her limbs would fall when she slept the sleep of exhaustion, on the couch at the far end of my chamber, made me more and more conscious of the wonderful and rare perfection of proportion of her physical beauty. And yet it was something beyond this that enchained me.

Has the body a soul apart from the soul's soul.

Is there a soul of physical beauty?

But what I mean, escapes me as I struggle to express it.

In my strange passion for her, there was always something of fear.

Sometimes, in the night, I would lie awake, leaning on my elbow, and watch her sleep, and follow the rising and the falling of the now childless breast. At those times I always thought about the child, and wondered how she thought and how she suffered, and I wondered with a great awe. Was her heart dead? About all her soft gentleness there was no touch of tenderness. Did she nurse me mechanically, not caring whether it was I or another? Then recurred to me the first words I had heard her speak when I revived to consciousness: "That he may not die, great God, that he may not die!"

Remembering these first words of hers, I could hardly think her tendance mechanical or indifferent. Was she grateful to me, knowing I would have saved and healed her child? Then returned to me the scene by the small bed, — the awful eyes, the uplifted arms. Often, at this point of my thinking, I would cry aloud to find myself bathed in that terrible cold sweat, and my cry would wake her, and her approach would then fill me with dread.

For a long time, things went on without change. I got neither worse nor better. Dr. Fearnwell grew impatient.

"Your heart continues strangely weak and irritable," he said one day; saying it, he looked — I believe it was a pure accident — from me to Mrs. Rosscar, and back to me. The sudden rush of heat to my face, then, possibly, suggested something to him; for he considered me gravely, and Mrs. Rosscar judiciously. I wished, how I wished, that, for the time of the good doctor's eyes being on her, she could have looked ugly!

"We must try change," he said. "It will not do to go on like this; we must try change. You are a man with work to do in the world; you must be braced up to do it. The air of the town, and especially of your room, is enervating in this warm weather."

"I am far too weak to go out," I said. "It would kill me to move."

He paid no attention to that; he was reflecting.

"To-morrow," he went on, "I will call for you, in the afternoon; you can quite well bear a short journey in my carriage. I will take you to a farmhouse in the country, pretty high up among the hills. There, you will soon get strong and well. You will be yourself again before the cold weather comes."

"I shall die of weariness," I answered, peevishly.

"Nothing of the kind; you will grow calm and strong."

"I can't possibly do without a great deal of nursing yet."

"The good woman of the farm is a kind motherly creature; she will do all that is necessary, — she and one of her cows, from which you must take plenty of new milk."

At that moment I hated Dr. Fearnwell. I do not know what answer I might not have made him, but Mrs. Rossar spoke, and my attention was immediately arrested.

"I am very glad you proposed this change, Dr. Fearnwell," she said. "It relieves me of a difficulty. I am unable to remain here longer. I have had news from my own neighborhood that calls me south. Nurse Wilkins is hardly competent to undertake the sole charge of my patient in his present stage of convalescence; but the farmer's wife and the cow, between them" — she smiled, one of her very rare and very brief smiles — "will get me over my difficulty."

"We are to lose you? You are unable to remain here longer?" Dr. Fearnwell said.

He paid me a long visit that day, but very little of his attention was given to me; he seemed to be studying Mrs. Rossar with roused interest.

"She is too beautiful and too young for the vocation she has chosen," he said, by and by, when she had, for a few moments, left the room. "Besides that, she is a woman with a preoccupied mind, with a memory, or a purpose."

His last words made me shudder, but I returned him some sulky, dissenting answer. That this woman was the mother of the poor little child on whom we had operated, he did not know, or suspect.

"My poor fellow, I see you're in a devil of a temper. But I don't care; what I'm doing is for your good, — if only I have done it soon enough."

"Oh! People are so very brave, always, in their operations for other people's good," I remarked, still as sulky as a bear, and yet troubled by the sound of my own words. I was mad enough to believe that Dr. Fearnwell was himself in love with my nurse, and jealous of me!

"You'll live to thank me for what I'm doing, or to reproach me for not having done it sooner," he said, and then took leave of me.

Mrs. Rossar returned to the room, finding me, of course, in the deepest dejection and sullenness. She looked at me, as she entered, with some curiosity or interest. It was very rarely that she spoke, except in reply; very rarely that she approached me, except when some service made it needful she should do so. To-day she spoke first, coming to my side, within reach of my hand, but averting her face from me. She took up her work, and then said, —

"So it is settled? You go into the country to-morrow?"

"I don't know that it is at all settled. I am not an idiot, or a baby, that I should do exactly what I'm told. I am well enough now to have a will of my own. Probably, when he calls for me I shall say, 'I will not go!'"

"Do not say that," she returned, earnestly. "Go, I advise you. It is true that I cannot stay here longer."

"It is true that here, or there, or anywhere, I cannot live without you," I said, in a passionate outburst.

"I own that you are not yet well enough to go without your accustomed nurse," she answered, "and your nurse does not like to have an incomplete case taken out of her hands. But, after the way in which Dr. Fearnwell spoke to-day, after the insinuations contained in his look to-day, I could no longer nurse you here, where I am always liable to be seen by him."

"Do you mean —" I began, with a great throbbing joy.

"I mean that if you go with the doctor to-morrow, you may find that your nurse will soon join you, if —"

"I will promise anything," I cried, grasping her hand.

"If you will be controlled and prudent, and will not again expose me to the doctor's remarks."

"I will do, or not do, anything you tell me to do, or not to do."

"Have you a sister?"

"No."

"Does Dr. Fearnwell know you have no sister?"

"He knows nothing of me, except as a student."

"Tell him to-morrow, then, and tell the people at the farm, that your sister is coming to join you. Dr. Fearnwell won't come out often: when he does, it will be easy to devise some reason for his not seeing 'your sister.'"

She stopped the outburst of my gratitude by rising to leave the room. Not only by this, but by the look she gave me, — a dark, inscrutable, terrible look, — pondering over which I grew cold.

Next day, she asked Dr. Fearnwell, when he came to fetch me, how to address to me at the farm, giving no reason for her question, which, indeed, required none. It was natural that she should wish to write to the patient to whom she had for two months devoted herself unwearingly.

In late August and early September, the Haunted Holly Farm, under the edge of the Gray Moor, was a delicious place. Dr. Fearnwell, who had, no doubt, chosen it for its austere severity of situation, and the absence of all softness and luxuriance in its surroundings, had no knowledge of the old walled south-sloping garden, lying at some distance from the house, where, because of the bleakness of the spot, all flowers blossomed late: Midsummer blossoms postponing themselves often till August; and where, because of the good soil and the pure air, they blossomed profusely. Nor did he take note of the one great meadow, now gray for the scythe, into which the flagged path, rose-bordered, of this garden opened through a grand old gate, with carved pillars and sculptured urns, and, on each side, an ancient lime-tree, the sole remnants of a glorious old avenue. The farm had been one of the dependencies of a great mansion.

On the second afternoon after I had come to the farm, — for more than four-and-twenty hours she had let me know what it was to be without her, — Mrs. Ross-car, "my sister," sat with me in the old garden, a profuse wilderness of roses and of honeysuckles; and in the meadow before us the hay was down, and the air full of its fragrance. She let me hold her hand in mine, she let me press close to her with a passionate desire to satisfy the hunger for her presence, created by her absence.

"God bless Dr. Fearnwell!" I cried. "To be ill in that dingy room in Strathcairn Street was exquisite beyond anything I have known, while you nursed me; but to grow well in this enchanting place, where the air feels like the elixir of life, with you always beside me —"

She smiled, a smile of which I saw the beginning only; for she turned her head aside. Then she sighed, and said, softly, —

"And when you are well? When you have no longer any excuse for claiming 'nurse' or 'sister'?"

There was in her voice, as she said this, for the first time, a slight tremulousness.

"Then," I cried, passionately, — the air, the beauty of the place, her beauty, completely intoxicating me, — "I shall claim a wife. I can never again do without you. You must marry me!"

Her hand moved in mine, but not with any effort to withdraw itself. She turned her face still further aside, but through the muslin that covered her bosom — she had in these days discarded her close black dresses, though wearing always mourning — I saw that the warm blood rushed across her snowy neck and throat.

By that emboldened, I pressed her for an answer, for a promise of her love. She turned on me.

"That I should love you!" she said. "Is it credible?"

She rose and left me. I sat where she had left me, pondering what might be the meaning of those words, of the voice in which they were spoken, of the look that accompanied them. The voice had none of the music of her voice; the look was incomprehensible; I could read in it, it seemed to me, anything rather than love. And yet I confidently, audaciously, believed that she loved me, but that she struggled against her love.

What motive could she have, but love, for devoting herself to me thus? Why risk good name and fame, which, to so proud a woman as I thought her, could hardly be indifferent. What could I conclude but that she loved me? And yet, with what a strange fashion of love, — so cold, so passive, so irresponsible! With so slight a difference, if with any difference, one might so easily express disgust.

I must have sat a long time where she had left me: for when a hand was laid on my shoulder, and a voice said, near my ear, "My patient, you must come in, the dew begins to fall," looking up, I found that the sunset was burning in the west, and that the stars were beginning to show.

Somehow, the way that hand touched my shoulder, and the slight accentuation on that word "my," made me shudder. She was like Fate claiming a victim. It was only the chill of the evening that sent such a thought through me. Indoors, by and by, when the curtains were drawn and the logs blazed on the open hearth, and she made my tea and brought it to me, and tended me with all watchful observance, I entered again into my fool's paradise.

And so again, next day, as through the hot, drowsy afternoon hours, she sat, and I lay beside her, on the warm hay under the shadow of the still fragrant boughs of one of those late-blossoming limes. My head was in her lap, and my cheek was pressed against the blue-veined inner side of that warm white arm.

Beyond this meadow, stretched wave after wave of yellow corn, all in a shimmer and glimmer of heat, running down the hill, overflowing the plain, seeming, from where we were, to wash up to the very feet of the castle-dominated romantic old city.

With eyes growing more dreamy and more drowsy every moment, I watched the glisten and sheen till I fell asleep. I fancy I slept some time. I awoke suddenly and with a sense of alarm. I had had a strange and dreadful dream; words of deadly hate had been hissed into my ear by a serpent, and its cold coil had been wound round my throat.

My hand went quickly to my throat when I awoke, and there lay across it — nothing dreadful — only a heavy tress of Mrs. Ross-car's hair, which, slipping loose, had uncoiled itself as she bent over me.

I looked up into her eyes with the horror of my dream still on me. Did I expect to find love shed down on me from them? They held mine a moment; they were full of darkness, but, as I looked up something softened the darkness. She smiled; in her smile there was some pity.

"I was half afraid to let you sleep," she said, "but on such an afternoon, I thought there could be no danger."

"Danger! What danger?"

"Of your taking cold. What other danger could there be? You look as if you had been dreaming painfully, my poor boy."

She had never so addressed me before.

"I have been dreaming horribly," I said. "Lying on your lap, on such a day, in such a place, how could that be possible!"

She would not meet my eyes.

"I am not at all sure I have not taken cold," I said, with a shudder, half real and half assumed.

"You must come in at once, and take some hot drink. Come."

We both rose and walked to the house. I leaned on her arm; not that I now needed its support, but liked to feel the soft, warm arm under my hand, and I liked to remind her of my dependence upon her.

I often wondered, and with uneasy wonder, that she never spoke of her child: never, so far as I knew, wept for it. But she was a strangely silent woman. As I have said, she very rarely spoke first, or, as it were, voluntarily; and when she responded to what was said to her, it was always as briefly as possible. It seemed as if she understood how expressive was every movement of her gracious form; how needless for her, compared with other beings, was speech, even of the eyes, far more of the lips. Anything approaching to liveliness of movement, or of voice, would have been out of harmony with her being. She was more fit to be set on a costly pedestal and gazed at, than to move in the common ways of this common world, I thought. And each unconscious pose of hers was so completely beautiful that I always thought until I noted the next, — "That is how I would have you stand, that I might gaze on you forever!"

Though I believed she loved me, I was not satisfied. I remembered her as she had been upon the river that day, and I felt that she was changed. I remembered the smiles she had shed upon her child. If only she would smile so, once, at me, — but she never did. Once, I had implored her for a full eye-to-eye look, and for a smile. Then, she had turned her face to mine; had fixed her eyes on mine; but the dark quiet eyes were inscrutable. Suddenly, just as I believed I was going to read them, she covered them with her hands, and turned her head away.

One evening, as we sat together in the warm twilight by the hearth, I tried to break down the silence between us about the child.

"Huldah!" I said, "you have not told me where your little child is lying. Let us go together to the grave. Let me weep there with you — let —" I stopped suddenly, with a cold damp on my brow, as I remembered the awful eyes, the arms raised, and the lips moving to curse me, of this very woman by whom I sat. I felt a slight convulsion of the frame round which I had drawn my arm; but when she spoke it was in the quietest voice: —

"We will go there together, but not yet."

"When?"

"When you are stronger; when I am your wife."

"And you will let that be soon?"

"Yes, it must be soon."

It seemed to me her heart was beating very heavily. I told her so.

"It is full," she said, drawing a deep breath.

"It is over-full."

"Of what?"

"Cannot you guess?" She leaned her face close down to mine, too close for me to be able to read it. "It is strange if you cannot guess," she added.

"If only I dared to read it by my own," I said.

"Dare to read it by your own," she answered.

"My heart is heavy and over-full with love of you, Huldah."

"And must not mine be heavy and full with love of you? Of you so generous that you are willing to make of an unknown woman your wife; to give her your name, not asking her right to the name she bears, or to any name."

She spoke more quickly than I had ever heard her speak; still with her face so close to mine that I could not read it.

"Generous? I generous in being ready to give for that without which everything else is worthless all that is only any worth through that."

"That is it!" she said, with something approaching to eagerness (so answering, I thought afterwards, some inward scruple). "It is to yourself you are ready to sacrifice yourself: not to me. Suppose I tell you I have no right to the name you call me by, or to any name; that though a mother, I have never been a wife; that I shame your name, if I take it; that —"

"You can shame nothing; you and shame are not to be named together. I want to know nothing of your past. What you are is enough for me, and what you will be — my wife!"

She answered me never a word. She suffered my caresses as she suffered my other forms of speech. Not one slightest hand-pressure, even of a finger.

My wooing of her was like the wooing of a statue, if only a statue could have been exquisitely warm and soft, and, by contact, could have thrilled one with intensest life.

A day was fixed for our marriage. The time went on. I cannot say that it lingered, or that it flew; it was, to me, a time of intoxication, — not quite untroubled by occasional pangs, and pauses of sobriety, for sometimes in those deep dark eyes of hers I surprised expressions that troubled me, — sometimes looks of pity, — sometimes darker looks than I could understand.

At last there came an evening when, as we parted for the night, I said, "After this night, only one night more, and then a day after which nothing but Death shall part us!"

An hour afterwards, not being able to sleep, I came back into the sitting-room for a book. She was sitting before the embers, which threw a lurid light upon her face, and upon her hands clasped round her knees.

She was so far absorbed that she did not hear the approach of my slippered feet across the floor.

I spoke to her, throwing myself at her feet. I poured out a passion of foolish eloquence. To my wonder, to my horror, to my fear, to my delight, she burst into a terrible storm of weeping.

I tried to soothe her as a lover might; but she rose, withdrew herself, and leaned against the oaken chimney-piece until the storm subsided.

I pressed to know the cause of this, grasping her hands to detain her.

"I find I am not a fiend, not an avenging spirit, only a woman, — a weak, miserable, wretched woman." She would tell me no more; she rid herself of my grasp, as if my hands had had no more strength in them than an infant's. "To-morrow," she said, "by my child's grave, I will tell you more." So she left me; to be all that night sleepless, and haunted by her perplexing words.

Soon after breakfast we set out, through the soft gray autumn morning, for the child's grave.

I had not known until now where the little creature was buried.

It was not a short walk; chiefly across the moors till the close of it, when we dropped down suddenly into a little jewel of a green dell, where was the smallest of churches, overshadowed by the biggest of yew-trees.

Through all the walk she had hardly spoken. The few times I spoke to her, she did not seem to hear me. Perhaps she had never, since the loss of her child, looked so softly beautiful. I had never felt myself held further aloof from her, had never been more afraid of her. I followed her through the churchyard gate to the little grave.

"She lies here."

The turf on that small grave had not yet drunk deep enough of the autumn rains to look fresh and green.

"It has had no tears shed on it. It is dry and scorched, like my heart, like my heart!"

She stood motionless and speechless for a time that seemed to me immense; her drooped eyes seemed to be looking into the earth. Presently she sank upon her knees, then dropped upon the grave, pressing her breast against it, and laying on it, first one cheek and then the other. By and by, she rose again to her knees. When she spoke it was brokenly, piteously.

"I cannot do it, I cannot do it! The mother in me will not let me. My child will not let me. You were once kind to her. You made her happy for one bright blessed day. Bertram, poor boy! I had thought to do it, when I was your wife. But here, on my child's grave, I recall the curse I invoked upon you by her death-bed. I am only a weak, miserable woman, not even able to hate or to curse Everything, even revenge, is lost to me with what lies here!"

She threw herself down again upon the grave in utter abandonment of grief; and I, leaning against the yew-tree, watched her, weeping there. I have not much consciousness of what transacted itself in my brain, meanwhile. I think I realized nothing clearly. I fancy I had a feeling of saying to myself, "I told you so" — as if something I had been expecting long, had happened at last. A soft drizzling rain that blotted out the distance, and blurred the landscape, began to fall. Of this she, lying always with her face pressed down upon the turf, was not aware, though I saw her shawl grow sodden under it. I remember well the words with which I recalled her to herself. They showed the blackness of my brain, and how little I comprehended the situation; yet, even as I spoke them, I was smitten by their imbecility.

"It is raining," I said. "I am cold and wet. It drips through this shelter. I shall be ill again. Let us go home."

I was tired, benumbed, mind and body. I stumbled and walked vaguely. She made me lean on her arm, and led me home. Even more silently than we had come, we went.

I was trying to believe all the way, that I believed that to-morrow everything would be as it was to have been, in spite of this episode, and in spite of my sense of my utter powerlessness under my bondage to her. When we reached the house she was tenderly careful of me.

That evening she told me her history, and what had been her proposed revenge. She had designed to make me love her madly. That she had done. She had designed to let me marry her, who had been a mother and not a wife. She had designed, as the wife of my infatuated love and unspeakable passion, to have cursed me as her child's butcher, at her child's grave. She had designed, — or was the nameless dread and horror of my illness taking this terrific form in its flight? — when she had thus slowly ground down my heart to its last grain of misery and grief, to murder me in my bed.

"I could have married you for hate," she said; "but for such love as has arisen in my soul for you, — if indeed it is love, or anything but compassion and kindness towards the poor wretch I have helped back to life, — never."

She left the farm that night. I never saw her again.

RAVENEAU DE LUSSAN was a young Parisian of good family and insatiable appetite for stirring adventure, who went early to the wars. But the peace of Nimeguen putting a period to the fascinating perils of soldiership, he determined to become a traveller. Somewhere about his twenty-first year, then, early in March, 1679, he sailed for St. Domingo. He reached that island in due course, and equally in due course found himself subjected to the usual fate of those simple youths who ventured on the West India voyage two hundred years ago without adequate precautions, — slavery. "I continued more than three years in that country," he says; "chiefly because I could not get out of it, being chained to one who deserved to be called a Turk rather than a Frenchman. Christian charity forbids me to mention his name; but, if ever he come in my way, he may expect just as much mercy from me as I experienced from him. Weary at last of his cruelties, I made my complaint to Monsieur de Franquesnay, the King's lieutenant, and that gentleman generously took me into his house, where I abode six whole months. I had borrowed money in the mean time, and thought it the part of an honest man to repay it. But not having the wherewithal, I bethought myself of borrowing from the Spaniards as much money as I wanted, — the more especially as this method of raising funds is attended with one great advantage, — nobody is under the obligation of repaying." Accordingly, he procured the necessary tools, and being a likely youth, — pretty well provided with muscles and daring, and having had most of his scruples and squeamishness thrashed out of him during his bondage, — he was readily admitted of the buccaneering brotherhood; launching on his first cruise, with one hundred and twenty good fellows, November 22, 1684.

The next three months were spent in wandering about the West Indian seas, but with very little profit. Thirty years of ceaseless depredation had driven the Spanish settlers of these shores into two or three strong towns, and reduced their trade to a minimum; and, worse still, compelled that little traffic to be carried on in vessels far too powerfully armed to be mastered in the old rough-and-ready buccaneering style. Growing weary of this, De Lussan and his comrades determined to cross the isthmus and try their fortune on the Pacific, — a course that had by this time become very popular with their tribe. They anchored, therefore, February 25, 1685, at the Golden Island near the mouth of the Atrato, the usual resort of rovers bent on these excursions. There they learnt to their gratification that the buccaneers were mustering very strong just then in the neighborhood of Panama. On the 27th two other pirate ships entered the anchorage, and the whole of the crew of the one and the greater portion of that of the other volunteered to join them in their projected expedition. Nor were they long in preparation. They were little troubled with baggage; while as to their ships, those who preferred the Caribbean Seas selected the best and burnt the others. This done, they despatched a native to apprise their predecessors of their coming, and departed on Sunday morning, March the 1st, being two hundred and sixty-four Frenchmen in all, accompanied by forty Indians as guides.

First of all, however, they knelt devoutly on the sands, and recommended themselves and their enterprise to the protection of the Deity: a proceeding by no means unusual among them, nor even out of character. For, though the buccaneers were not exactly models of Christian perfection, they were far from being the irreligious rascals that most people are disposed to consider them. The English rovers, for instance, were generally strict observers of the Sabbath. Nor were our predatory countrymen without that distinctive token of earnest religious conviction, a slight leaven of intolerance. They showed themselves sad iconoclasts whenever they found an opportunity, and never omitted a fair chance of knocking a friar on the head. And the French freebooters were even more intensely sanctimonious in their own way. Whenever they captured a town, their very first proceeding, after securing the plunder and the prisoners was to chant a Te Deum. And as often as they set a place on fire — their usual custom ere retreating — they took much pains to remove the saintly pictures and images out of harm's way.

Our amiable young friend and his pious companions set out precisely as the rainy season set in. Their route lay over the precipices, and through the tropical forests of that singularly rugged isthmus. And every man among them was tolerably laden; carrying his arms, — musket, sword, and pistols, — an axe, sundry knicknacks for Indian traffic; and six or seven doughboys (flat cakes) by way of provision. The journey, therefore, was a toilsome one; so toilsome, indeed, that the passage of a valley wherein they had to wade only forty-four times across the same torrent, was regarded as a relaxation. Their small stock of food was soon exhausted, and their trade with the natives went no great way towards supplying them with more. Nor could they venture to do much hunting, since they were liable at any moment to stumble on a Spanish ambuscade. So on they went, then, with hunger added to their other hardships. By the seventh day they had reached the crest of the Cordillera, and the worse half of the journey was before them. Vessels wherein to make their début on the South Seas were indispensable; and, considering their scanty band, these had to be prepared where they stood, or not at all. They spent the remainder of March, therefore, in shaping canoes out of single trees. On the 1st of April they launched fourteen, carrying twenty men apiece, on a branch of the Santa Maria, a river whose outlet forms the eastern limit of the Bay of Panama, and began their passage downwards. For the first ten days, a terrible passage it proved. Every hundred yards or so, something or other — shoal, rapid, cascade, or accumulation of drift-wood — was sure to interrupt the navigation. And at every one of these places the heavy canoes had to be dragged through the forest, past the obstacle, and this under a pelting rain, by the half-famished adventurers. Death, accordingly, began to be very busy among them. But this was not altogether an unmitigated evil in the eyes of the survivors. For when a party happened to lose their weapons by the upsetting of their canoe, "God was pleased," writes De Lussan, "to provide a speedy remedy for this great trouble, — disposing of some among us, who left their arms to those who had lost their own." On the 11th they reached the tide-way, where the heart-breaking work of the passage ceased; and on the 12th they entered the Pacific, and, to "their great comfort," met a party which their predecessors had despatched thither with a plentiful supply of food.

April the 21st the whole body of freebooters in these quarters assembled at the King's Island, in the Bay of Panama; and a tolerable show they made, — numbering nine hundred and sixty men in all, distributed among ten ships. The latter, indeed, were of little account. Two only were European, and fitted, therefore, for a long voyage. The rest had been picked up, with their cargoes, along the coast, and were of too slight and slovenly a build to be useful anywhere else. But the men were all hardy pirates, and in a fight fully equal to six times the number of the soft and inexperienced creoles. About six hundred were English, and so were the principal leaders, — Swan, Davis, and Townley. The first of these, indeed, was only a half-hearted buccaneer, whose men had compelled him to change fair-trading for freebooting, and who never took kindly to the profession. But the others were thorough "lads of the knife and pistol," and had at their elbows men of even greater celebrity than themselves, Dampier being then on board one of the vessels, and Basil Ringrose in another. The French, who were the later comers, had but one small bark, commanded by their most noted chief, Captain Grognet, and were therefore distributed, for the most part, among the English crews.

And here we may remark that the "entente cordiale," though frequently manifested, was never particularly strong, in the seventeenth century. Frenchman and Englishman often fought shoulder to shoulder, but it was always with much distrust. More than once the Frenchman left the Englishman in the lurch in the midst of a deadly fight; and more than once the Englishman was not ashamed to follow the very bad example. Of course the buccaneers were no better in this respect than their more legal brethren of the sword; and when the scamps of the two nations consorted occasionally to plunder the common victim, it was always with an amount of jealousy and bickering that was sure, sooner or later, to dissolve the partnership. More than the average quantity of this unpleasant material was collected just then in the Bay of Panama. Some of these very Frenchmen had formerly marooned Captain Davis; and Captain Davis, only two years before, had overpowered some of these same Frenchmen, turned them out of their ship, and carried it off himself. Nor were these the only accounts of the kind open between the parties. But, worse still, the English were never to be restrained from outraging the very sensitive religious feelings of the French by their behavior towards church and picture; and when other causes of quarrel happened to be lacking, this always proved a very sufficient one.

The treasure fleet from Lima was on its way to Panama, and the buccaneers were gathered to intercept it. Meanwhile they prowled day and night along the coast; making small raids in all quarters for intelligence and plunder. As to the last item, however, they were seldom very successful. For the creoles maintained strict watch, kept their valuables carefully concealed, and were always ready to retreat in good time when they happened to fall short of their ideal of fighting equality, — about ten to one. In the intervals of this amusement the pirates delighted to speculate on the coming battle, and, of course, victory. How the armada was to approach, where it was to be assailed, and who were to board the particular vessels, all was minutely arranged, — an oath even was administered, pledging every man to the strictest honesty with regard to the plunder. But exceedingly elaborate plans, as a rule, are sure to come to nothing; and this one proved no exception. While the freebooters made up their minds that the Spanish fleet must enter Panama by the south side of the King's Island, and cruised very carefully up and down this particular channel, the expected prey got in by another, so quietly that, though assured of the fact by prisoner after prisoner, they could not believe it, until it came out again to fight them on the 7th of June.

The Spaniards numbered between three and four thousand men, and in ships they had no less the advantage. Six of their vessels carried from fifty to eighteen guns, and the remainder — eight barks and thirteen or fourteen large boats — were crowded with musketeers. But, justly confident in their hardihood and skill, the rovers advanced with alacrity. This, however, was not destined to be one of the many fights which stupid Spanish pride has taken such exquisite pains — to lose. All the freebooters except Grognet had — that great advantage in old-fashioned sea-fights, — the weather-gauge, and it was clearly their interest to engage at once. But the half-hearted vice-admiral, Swan, availing himself of the excuse offered by Grognet's position, hung back, and the fight was put off for that day. When night fell the Spanish admiral sent a boat with a light some miles to leeward, and while his antagonists based their manœuvres upon the decoy, he stole away unnoticed to windward. So when morning dawned the freebooters found, to their great astonishment, that the relative position of the fleets was exactly reversed. They could no longer fight or forbear as it suited them; all that now depended on the Spanish admiral, and he resolved to engage. About an hour after sunrise on the 8th the fight began, and a very one-sided affair it proved. The Spaniards made the very best use of their advantage, kept comfortably out of musketry-range, and mauled their opponents terribly with their cannon, receiving little or no damage in return. But somehow or other, though their vessels were almost torn to pieces, the pirates themselves received little injury, — four or five killed and nine wounded forming the sum of their casualties. Nor did they show any lack of courage or skill — so far as skill could avail — during the whole of this dispiriting engagement. It ceased with the day, nor was it again renewed. The adventurers had no great liking for battles like this, and their enemies were not just the men to overdo a piece of fighting. But before it terminated the bark in which De Lussan fought was compelled to put before the wind perfectly riddled with cannon-balls. One of the Spanish frigates turned in pursuit, but the pirates looked so dangerous as she ranged up that she went about without attempting anything. Next morning both fleets were out of sight, and the damaged vessel being in great danger drove slowly for the Island of Quibo, two hundred and seventy miles off to the northwest. Few on board had any hope of reaching shore again, for they had already five feet of water in the hold. But, fortunately for them, the wind continued light and favorable for the next week, and early on the morning of the 14th they ran ashore at Quibo, quite worn out with baling.

There the rest of the fleet joined them on the 21st, being, especially the English, in no very pleasant temper. The islanders scrupled not to charge Captain Grognet with cowardice, and not a few of them were quite prepared to punish him according to rover's law. His countrymen of course supported the delinquent, and the quarrel ran high for a day or two. There was plenty of brawl, bluster, and recrimination, but as no blows were struck, the breach was patched over for the present. The entente cordiale, however, had received an irreparable injury, and this was soon apparent. With the view of procuring provisions, they threw a heavy force ashore near Puebla Nuevo on the 29th. But by this time all the Spanish settlements, from Chili to California, were thoroughly on their guard. Non-combatants and goods were everywhere removed out of reach. Beacons, too, were reared and sentinels posted on the heights, and the coast beneath thickly garnished with breast-works, behind which every man capable of bearing arms was marshalled on the first alarm. The buccaneers carried the town without difficulty, but they found not so much as an ear of maize within it; and this second disappointment revived and embittered the feud to such a pitch that the French, to the number of three hundred and thirty men, seceded and encamped by themselves on the island.

De Lussan and his comrades were now in no very pleasant predicament. Their bread was exhausted, and they dared not waste their scanty stock of powder on the numerous deer and monkeys that ran about. They were driven, therefore, to search the beach for shell-fish and the woods for fruit; both precarious resources, and the latter a dangerous one, for they lost several men thus poisoned. At this juncture a strange English captain made his appearance with a cargo of flour which he had picked up along the coast. This, of course, he reserved for his countrymen; and the result was that thirty of the French and one of their captains, unable to endure their privations in the face of such a temptation, deserted and joined the British. The others, however, remained firm, and on the 9th of August — the English having departed some days before — one hundred and twenty of them set off in five canoes for a raid on the mainland. Here they surprised several farms, taking a number of prisoners, two barks, and a quantity of provisions. Ransoming the prisoners, they bore away for Quibo with the booty, and reached that island on the 3d of September.

After two or three more of these petty excursions, and being now provided with craft capable of a longer voyage, they set off to plunder Realejo, a port about fourteen miles from Lake Leon, in Guatemala. On the way they encountered a storm that put them for some hours in jeopardy. "But," says De Lussan, in true buccaneering phrase, "the weather, as God would have it, proving fair again, we spent the 19th in setting our vessels in order, and in mending our sails with our shirts and drawers, wherewith we were already but indifferently provided." On reaching Realejo they found that city and the neighboring hamlets deserted. The English had been beforehand with them, and as the freebooters found them, and afterwards to their cost, the places they captured were invariably excommunicated by the Spanish prelates, and thenceforth given over to desolation. An important city indeed might be rebuilt, but always on a new site, as was the case with Panama itself, which now stands three miles farther west than it stood in the days of Morgan. But petty hamlets underwent no such resurrection. Their walls were abandoned hopelessly to the vegetation of the tropics, which has by this time reduced most of them to mere traveller's puzzles. De Lussan and his comrades spent some weeks in this quarter, hunting the woods and savannas in all directions, but picking up little, except a few stragglers of little value, and finding themselves too closely watched by bodies of horse to venture far inland. After a good deal of this profitless prowling, and one or two sharp skirmishes, the provisions began to run short. So releasing thirty prisoners, they bore away southward on the 24th of November, having the annoyance to see beacon after beacon flare up as they swept by, until as far as the eye could reach the shore was girt with a line of fire. They husbanded their stores to the utmost, — they dismissed prisoner after prisoner, — and they landed repeatedly. But the Spaniards were far too alert, and famine came down in spite of them. On the 9th of December they landed fifty men, and managed for once to surprise the sentinels. But the country was too thoroughly alarmed for that to avail them anything, and so "they were forced to kill and eat the sentinels' horses, after four days of strict abstinence. And this sort of fasting," adds De Lussan pathetically, "was not the first that we had to put up with, and did not prove to be the last neither." On the 10th they landed at a plantation of bananas and helped themselves to the fruit without stint. On the 22d, "having no victuals to eat," they threw sixty men ashore to seek some. And these found some few handfuls of maize, 600 men intrenched to the teeth in a little town a league and a half from the beach, to oppose their advance, and 400 horsemen manœuvring to intercept their retreat. This, however, they effected, after fighting every inch of the way. As nothing further could be done in these parts, they reembarked and bore away for Quibo, which they reached on New-Year's Day, 1686.

On the 5th of January 230 of them departed for a raid on Cheriquita, some eighty or ninety miles off. They landed, undiscovered, at the mouth of the river whereon the place is built, at midnight on the 6th, and marched till dawn through the woods. All that day they kept under cover, and started again at nightfall. But they found on the 8th that they had taken the wrong side of the stream, and thus thrown away all their labor,—not a pleasant thing, considering that they had tasted nothing since they left the boats, and could expect nothing until they took the town. Retracing their steps, they crossed the river, near its mouth, the same day, and soon traversed the three leagues that lay between them and Cheriquita. "The scenery hereabouts," observes De Lussan, "would have been delightful if we had not been so awfully hungry." They managed to surprise the town and all its people without the slightest trouble. Though perfectly aware of their danger, the Cheriquitanese had been squabbling for the last three days,—like the couple in the old Scotch song,—about whose duty it was "to bar the door"; and the door, therefore, remained conveniently open until the pirates marched in and settled the dispute. At this place De Lussan ran one of his greatest risks. The day after the capture, himself and four companions were decoyed into an ambuscade, and beset by a multitude of Spaniards. Standing back to back they faced their enemies on all sides, and fired with great effect. Numerous as they were the Spaniards never once attempted to charge, but kept shooting at the buccaneers from a "foolish distance." They were very bad marksmen as it happened. Still they managed, after pegging away for the better part of an hour, to kill two of the party and disable a third. The survivors then raised their voices in a farewell halloo, and prepared to go through the last dread scene like buccaneers,—fighting to the latest gasp. "But," says De Lussan, "God was pleased that some of our men, who, up to this, had supposed us to be firing at a mark, should hear our shout," and these, running up at the critical moment, alarmed the Spaniards, who took to their heels, leaving thirty dead behind them. Next day the corsairs fired Cheriquita, and marched off with their prisoners, beating up an ambuscade by the way. They delayed for the next four days on a neighboring island for the ransom. This they received on the 16th. and returned to Quibo. Here they were attacked on the 27th by a fleet sent from Panama expressly to destroy them. But as they were all snug ashore, whither their assailants did not care to follow them, the latter wreaked their fury on the solitary ship, riddling it first with cannon-shot, and then burning it to the water's edge. This done, they drew off, having taken no life but that of a cat, and inflicted not the slightest damage on the rovers, since the ship had become utterly useless to them for want of sails.

The next two months were employed in building canoes. These completed, they set out on the 4th of March for Granada on the Lake of Nicaragua, and caught a Tartar by the way. A Spanish frigate, which they attacked at Puebla Nuevo about the 6th, beat them off after a fierce fight, in which they had four killed and no less than thirty-three wounded.

On the 9th, "having nothing at all to eat," they went ashore at a town ten leagues to the east of Cheriquita. The place, however, had been ransacked and deserted by its inhabitants before their arrival; and as they returned rather downcast to their canoes on the 11th, they found, "in order to strengthen them under the languishment to which hunger had reduced them, a regale in the shape of an ambuscade of 500 men spread before them," and had to fight their way through with the loss of two killed. Making three or four more descents as they passed along, sometimes to hunt and sometimes to pillage, but always with poor success in the latter particular, they reached the vicinity of Granada on the 22d, and went ashore on an island to make their last arrangements. This done they started at once and rowed all night. Next morning they fell in with Captain Townley and 115 Englishmen,—one of the three bands into which the freebooters of that nation had by this time broken up. As for the rest, Captain Swan had sailed with one for the East Indies; and Captain Davis had led the other south to Peru. Mutual disappointment had by this time toned down the national rivalry. Besides, neither party felt sufficiently strong to effect anything of consequence alone, so they coalesced at once with considerable heartiness. And from this time forward De Lussan's story becomes more stirring. The enterprises in which he shares drop their patrician and assume a broad and daring character, ceasing to be mere henroost robberies, and becoming good hearty raids after the old Norse type,—prolific of stubborn fighting, and in the end of any quantity of plunder.

They landed to the number of 345 on the 7th of April, marched upon Granada, finding little or nothing edible by the way, and reached the town on the 10th, to discover—that nothing was left therein except a strong garrison. Nevertheless, they attacked and carried the place after some fighting, losing four killed and eight wounded; but gained nothing by the exploit, except a number of captives and a seasonable supply of ammunition. They hovered about the neighborhood, making various descents for provisions, until the 7th of May. On that day they came to an arrangement with their wounded, of whom there remained but ten. Four of these, who were crippled for life, received 1,000 pieces of eight a man; and each of the others, whose hurts were of less consequence, 600. This distribution completely cleared out their treasury; so that their whole gain, since they entered the South Seas rather better than a year before, amounted to 7,600 pieces of eight: considerably less than the men lost in winning it would have realized had they been brought to the hammer in the white slave-markets of St. Domingo or Jamaica.

Disappointed at the bald result of so many hardships and perils, the company broke up on the 12th, — 134 of the Frenchmen going northward under Captain Grognet, and 134 more, including De Lussan, accompanying Captain Townley and his Englishmen towards Panama. This party met with ugly weather — several squalls, some heavy gales, and one or two good specimens of the tropic hurricane — as they stood along the well-known coast, but they weathered all gallantly. Nor did they dawdle away their time at Quibo on this, as on so many former occasions. Pausing just long enough to take in wood and water, and not a moment longer, they steered southwest to their next goal, La Villa, 100 miles from Panama. Reaching the neighborhood by midnight of the 21st, 160 of them landed at once and marched on the town. This they gained early next morning, and, thanks to their speed, they surprised the whole community in the church and much of its wealth unremoved. — 300 prisoners, 15,000 pieces of eight, in silver, and goods to the value of a million and a half more falling into their hands. Even greater treasure was thought to have been concealed. But De Lussan complains that "the rascal Spaniards" preferred to be tortured to death rather than reveal the hiding-places. There were two barks, also, lying in the river, but these had been dismantled and the rigging secreted. Selecting the choicest of the prisoners and the best of the goods, the buccaneers fired the town and departed. The heavier plunder they heaped in the only two canoes they could find thereabouts, and told off nine men to conduct them down the river. All went well so long as they marched beside the stream, but a stretch of marsh and thicket soon interrupted that arrangement; and while they made a circuit to clear the impediment, a large body of Spaniards took the opportunity to assail the canoes. The men in charge made a stout defence, but in the heat of the fray they neglected the navigation and drifted ashore. There a close volley killed four of them and severely wounded a fifth, — the survivors taking to the water and barely escaping. The Spaniards carried off the plunder and the wounded man, smashed the canoes, and, by way of wind-up, decapitated the dead and stuck their heads conspicuously on four poles. The main body of the pirates, alarmed by the firing, pushed on towards the river, but before they could reach it they were joined by the fugitives and apprised that all was over. Having stumbled, however, on the rigging of the barks, they determined to carry off these vessels as some small compensation for their loss. And as the rising tide compelled them to defer that operation for another day, they took advantage of the delay to pay a visit to the scene of the catastrophe. The sight that met them there excited them to characteristic vengeance. Removing the heads of their comrades they slew four of their prisoners and stuck theirs up instead. They then dropped down the river, fighting their way to its mouth through several ambushes, and losing three more men slain. Here they lay for a week awaiting the release of the wounded rover, and the ransom of the captives. But a hitch took place in the negotiations, and the pirates, to show that they at least were in earnest, cut off two heads and despatched them to the authorities as a slight sample of what mischief their parsimony might produce. This had the desired effect, and on the 10th of July they received their comrade, a store of provisions, and 11,000 pieces of eight, including compensation for the arms that they, the buccaneers, had lost in the expedition! A few days after they found themselves in great need of water. But as four thousand horsemen tracked them along the shore they sailed for the neighboring islands. There, however, the water proved undrinkable; and they had no alternative but to land on the continent, which they did in the teeth of the foe, filling their casks after a stubborn conflict.

They cruised about the Bay of Panama during the whole of July, — making various incursions, sundry captures, and two narrow escapes from destruction. The governor of Panama caused a sham ship to be built on the sands near the city, constructed several earthworks in its neighborhood, and employed an adroit scoundrel to throw himself in the way of the freebooters. This fellow discharged his mission to admiration. Being caught on one of the islands after a smart chase, he kept his lips firmly closed to that gentle persuasive, — much in vogue among the buccaneers, — suspension by the thumbs with a weight at his heels. But perceiving that his captors had gathered a quantity of spines from the prickly palm, and were wrapping them in cotton dipped in oil, with the view of planting them in his flesh and setting them on fire, — another practice dear to the advocates of "no peace beyond the line," — he deemed it time to recover his speech, and he told his inquisitors so much that they knew to be true, that they credited him very readily concerning more of which they were ignorant. Among other enticing things he admitted that there was a frigate richly laden in the port, and that, under his guidance, it was very possible to cut it out. The pirates caught eagerly at the idea and determined to realize it. Bringing their vessels to the Island of Tobago, about twenty miles from Panama, they anchored them behind a convenient headland, and set off in their canoes. By moonlight on the 1st of August they reached the harbor, and seeing what seemed to be a vessel ready to slip from its moorings in a neighboring cove, they prepared for a rush that would certainly have fixed them high and dry aground in the midst of an ambushade. But just then a bark glided out among them and was taken.

This was fatal to the governor's plan, and not less so to his spy, who, being recognized and denounced by the crew of the prize, was instantly shot and thrown overboard.

The governor next attempted to destroy the ships while a majority of the crews was absent raiding to the south. But, by a special interposition of Providence, as De Lussan puts it, the cruisers rejoined their vessels before the plan was fully developed. The attack took place on the 21st of August, and almost caught them at anchor. The point of land behind which they sheltered, concealed the approach of three Spanish ships until the foremost was upon them. But slipping from their anchors under a heavy fire, the rovers gained the weather-gauge by a desperate manœuvre, that smacks all over of the English seaman. They ran, one after another, ship, barks, and canoes, between two rocks where there was barely room to pass, and where, indeed, until they had cleared it, they could not be sure that a passage existed. The battle lasted some hours, and a right give-and-take affair it proved, wherein it was hard to say who had the advantage. About noon, however, a volley of grenades exploded a quantity of powder in the principal Spanish ship, blowing up many of the crew and setting the vessel itself on fire, and the pirates boarded and carried it in the confusion. A second Spanish ship surrendered immediately after. And the third, seeing the battle lost, attempted to escape, but being closely pursued, ran ashore and went to pieces. The loss of the conquerors was trifling, but the enemy had most of their officers and the greater part of their men destroyed. And the rovers were all the better pleased when they found that the larger vessel was the very one that had handled them so roughly at Puebla Nuevo. While they were examining the prizes two more sail appeared bearing down upon them. Raising the Spanish banner above their own, the buccaneers loaded their guns to the muzzle and awaited the result. Ranging alongside without suspicion, one of the new-comers was sunk with a broadside and the other captured. While rummaging this last prize, the victors found four packages of halters intended for themselves stowed away in a corner; and fierce as they were from the action, they brought them instantly and mercilessly into requisition, hanging every man they found on board.

The freebooters had but one man killed in this fight, but there were twenty of them wounded, and nearly every one of the latter, including Captain Townley, died. For the Spaniards, it appears, had adopted a device very common with degenerate races, and poisoned their projectiles. This did not tend to soften the temper of the conquerors; and after some tedious parleying they decapitated twenty of the prisoners and sent their heads to the governor. Nor would they have scrupled to present him with all the unfortunates by similar hideous instalments, had he not instantly come to terms; releasing five buccaneers captured at various times, supplying medicines and stores, and paying down ten thousand pieces of eight.

De Lussan and his comrades remained in the Bay of Panama for the next three months, harassing the country in all directions: seizing everything that put to sea, and making no end of prisoners. In the beginning of November they started northward for another cruise of the old stamp. But raiding had now a greater danger before it than mere skirmish or ambuscade. The creoles, improving in ferocity as well as the buccaneers, adopted the ugly stratagem of firing the woods and prairies to windward, and more than once made a close approximation towards roasting their tormentors alive. Slowly and fiercely the latter edged away to the north, impressing their mark in characters of fire wherever they set foot. They devastated; they captured by wholesale, to ransom when they required money or food; to torture cruelly when they needed intelligence; and to degrade or massacre according to the appetite that happened to be in the ascendant. On the 30th of January, 1687, they met their old captain, Grognet, and sixty of his men: the remainder had gone off to California.

Three days after they took Nicoya, and as the citizens refused to ransom the place, burnt it to the ground: "showing ourselves very exact, however," writes De Lussan, "in the preservation of the churches, into which we carried the images of the saints which we found in the various houses, that they might not be exposed to the rage of the English, who were not over-pleased at this kind of precau-and pleasure in burning our churches than in destroying all the other houses in America."

Having perpetrated all the mischief they could in this quarter, they made up their minds to steer for Guayaquil. But disagreeing about the arrangements, they separated once more; Captain Grognet's band and ninety-two Englishmen going together in a ship lately taken, and 168 Frenchmen, including De Lussan, remaining in their own two vessels. There was now a trial of speed as to which party should reach Guayaquil first. De Lussan started on February 24: on March 8 they crossed the Equator; and on the 18th they sighted their former consort and made up their differences. For the next ten days they steered rather wildly, the weather being too hazy to allow of an observation, and the rovers, therefore, not knowing very well where they were: and being besides in very great straits; for their water was all but exhausted, and their provisions so far spent that they were restricted to a single meal every forty-eight hours. On the 26th, however, a providential shower, as De Lussan takes care to inform us, filled some of their casks, and a few hours later they fell in with an equally providential shoal of fish. The next fortnight was a succession of contrary winds and tantalizing calms. At last, on April 14, they sighted the long-wished-for Cape St. Helena, to the north of the Guayaquil inlet; and the same day they received a small reinforcement of eight Englishmen, who happened to be on board a prize laden with those very acceptable commodities, wine and flour. This handful was a portion of the company that had sailed with Captain Davis, and which had pillaged the Peruvian and Chilian shores with great effect, sharing five thousand pieces of eight a man, at the end of the cruise. The major part of the band had gone home with their money through the Straits of Magellan. But, as usual, a large number had lost every penny for their plunder at play, for the buccaneers were incorrigible gamblers. And these not choosing to return to Europe in such a plight, were still cruising about the coast under their old commander. The main body, however, was too far off to share in the coming fray.

Leaving their ships in charge of forty or fifty men near Cape Blanco, they took to their canoes on the 15th, and steered two hundred and sixty strong, up the bay; having a pull of one hundred and twenty miles before them. Hiding on the islands during the day, and going up with the tide at night, they managed to reach the neighborhood of Guayaquil on the 19th undiscovered. For though one party of sentinels had seen them and lighted their beacon, the pirates had killed the men and extinguished the blaze before it was noticed. They concealed themselves all the 19th on an island at the entrance of Guayaquil River, and resumed their course after dark with the flowing tide, intending to land on the farther and weaker side of the town. But the ebb caught them while they were yet some leagues from the spot and compelled them to go ashore two hours before day. Just then a careless fellow struck a light for his pipe, and this being noticed by a party on the watch, a thundering volley rolled the alarm to the city. Further concealment being impossible, the buccaneers moved sharply forward. But they had not advanced many paces before the clouds broke overhead, and down came a furious tropic shower, that extinguished the matches of the grenadiers, and drove the whole some neighboring sheds. This storm blew over by the dawn, and then they advanced again in very good order. First went the forlorn hope of fifty Frenchmen under Captain Picard; then came fifty Englishmen conducted by Captain Hewitt; the main body, one hundred strong, under Grognet followed; and finally marched the reserve of forty men commanded by one of the quartermasters. As for the city, that had been in uproar for the last two hours; lights flashing and guns going off in all directions. Nor were the rovers altogether so silent as they might have been. A dozen drums kept up what would have been a considerable clatter in their ranks, if the roll of these instruments had not been stifled by the songs and yells that usually accompanied a freebooter's charge: for, as the governor of Costa Rica once wrote of them, they invariably "fell briskly on singing and dancing as if they were going to a feast." Nobody among them had the slightest notion of localities. So keeping right on for the spot where the houses were grouped the thickest, they found themselves very unexpectedly brought up by a ditch, a wall five feet high beyond it, and seven hundred long muskets poked viciously across. And scarcely had they clapped eyes on this pretty obstacle, when out rushed a sheet of flame and a hail of bullets, and down fell a dozen freebooters. Utterly surprised, the others reeled back in very unwonted confusion. Taking the movement for incipient flight, the Spaniards sallied forth amid a very hurricane of "Santiagos." This was exactly what the buccaneers would have preferred had they been allowed any choice in the matter. And therefore, in somewhat less than five minutes, a small, but not particularly elegant, extract of those heroes, re-entered the fortification with the rovers at their heels. Some of the fugitives sought to defend the neighboring houses, but the grenades soon disposed of them. The others mixed up with the crowd of non-combatants, or gathered into the numerous stockades. The latter were stormed, one after another, by the indefatigable Brothers of the Coast, who, as the sun went down, found themselves masters of Guayaquil, with the loss of nine killed and eighteen wounded; Grognet, who died shortly after, being among the latter.

By the 24th, "the dead carcasses which, to the number of 900, lay up and down," rendered the place unbearable; and, nailing up the cannon and dismantling the fortifications, the desperadoes removed to the neighboring island of Puna, with the best of the plunder, and 600 of the choicest prisoners, "including a great many officers, and persons of distinction." There they remained exactly a month, and a delicious season they found it. The Spaniards on the mainland supplied them with necessities and luxuries in profusion; and their female prisoners, at least, were not backward in amusing them. For, dripping as they were with the blood of their kindred, the buccaneers were only too acceptable to the dames of Guayaquil, and their victory in the bower was just as rapid and complete as it had been on the battle-field. It was not that the creole beauties had exaggerated notions of these men, and fallen in love with them beforehand. Up to the day of the storm, they had been far from dreaming of the pirates as the Greek demaols dreamt in their day of those antique buccaneers, Theseus, Hercules, and Jason, — far from picturing them as heroes, whose presence corresponded with their daring deeds. But on this point we must let De Lussan speak. "The women of the place are very pretty," he writes; "but the lazy padres had actually taught them to believe that we were monsters in shape and appetite, who took especial delight in roasting and eating women and children. Nor is it from hearsay that I know this. The day after we took the town, a young gentlewoman happened to fall into my hands, and as I made her walk before me to the place where we kept our prisoners, she turned round, with tears in her eyes, and exclaimed, 'O sir, for the love of God, don't eat me!'" Then I found that the fathers had not only libelled us in this scandalous manner, but had actually given the dear creatures to understand that we were formed for all the world like monkeys, — tails included! Ugh! But I can boldly affirm," he continues, "that these ladies formed very different sentiments on this point before we quitted the island." Here we may remark, by the way, that De Lussan makes no further complaint concerning the sacrilegious doings of the English.

To fair lady and pirate that month on the island was a very carnival. Lute and harp and sweeter voice never ceased to discourse most eloquent music through the long clear tropic nights. And the voluptuous Spanish dances whirled their mazes round and round before the weather-beaten robbers, and the figurantes "made eyes" at them until they must have fancied themselves the tenants of Mohammed's paradise. It was the realization of the ideas which Browne expressed seventy years before in his exquisite Sirens' song.* There was no lack of pairing off either before the month was half out, and De Lussan had his fair share of the good that the inevitable providence had so kindly provided. A charming matron, widowed by the assault, looked upon him with doting eyes, and endeavored to witch him from his stormy career "to live with her and be her love." Nor was beauty her only spell. She promised him wealth, and she proved that she could procure him rank, — if he would only stay; and the youth was much perplexed. What between the perils that threatened before, and the golden bribes and brighter smiles that tempted beside him, — it was only by dint of sternest resolution that he brought himself to speak the dreadful "No."

But this voluptuous season was not without its sprinkling of the terrible. As usual the Spaniards delayed and haggled over the ransom; and as usual the pirates resorted to their hideous logic. Causing their male prisoners to throw the dice, they sent ashore the heads of the four who chanced to lose at the game of death. This was decisive; and on the 26th of May, the last payment of 42,000 pieces of eight was made and the prisoners released; but not without much reluctance and considerable altercation, — though scarcely of the kind that recent events would lead us to expect. A strong body of pirates, discontented with the ransom, — so far short did it fall of their expectations, — proposed to murder the captives every one. Fortunately, however, for the latter, the milder-tempered cut-throats happened for this once just, and only just, to outvote their more atrocious mates.

* "Steer hither — steer your winged pinet,

During the previous weeks the Spaniards had been gathering forces by sea and land, and 5,000 men were now assembled at Guayaquil, while two heavy ships waited to dispute the passage down the bay. But the buccaneers on their side had been joined by Davis and his crew fresh from a running fight of three days. This affair had lasted so long, not because the Spaniards had fought very desperately, — though they were quite powerful enough to have destroyed their antagonists had they possessed either the skill or the courage to use their superiority, — but simply because the Englishmen were too drunk for the first two days of the battle to manoeuvre as they ought. Attributing this to anything but the right cause, the foe waxed insolent, and on the third morning hung out the blood-red flag, — the signal of no quarter, a trick that soon sobered the Englishmen, and set them to work in such good earnest that in another hour the Catalina was beaten to matchwood on the neighboring rocks. With this catastrophe in view the remaining Spanish frigates made no very strenuous opposition to the departure of the rovers. They skirmished with them during the three or four days that they were beating down the bay, but so feebly that they merely wounded of them half a dozen men, of whom De Lussan was one. And no sooner had they reached the open sea, where seamanship might be brought into full play, than the Spaniards stole off under cover of the night.

Having repaired damages and taken in wood and water, the buccaneers proceeded on the 11th of June to divide the booty. The coin was distributed first. Then they put up the pearls, gold, and precious stones to auction. And as many, — especially the fortunate gamblers, — bid eagerly for these because they took up such little room, they were speedily sold and the purchase-money shared out. "The last," says De Lussan, "I made no account of, but used just for play money during the rest of the cruise."

So well, indeed, were the buccaneers satisfied with their prey that in their future descents they looked for nothing but gold and precious stones. Indeed, they attached such little value to silver that they thought it not worth their while to take along with them "a great quantity of plate and other things, whereof Guayaquil was full."

Next day Captain Davis sailed for Europe; but their vessels being too small and crazy for a voyage like that, De Lussan and his comrades determined to return overland. They weighed and went northward on the 18th of June, and having made a raid and captured one ship during the passage, they reached St. Michael's Bay, some distance to the north of Realejo, by the 17th of July. Here they met thirty of the men who had separated from Captain Grognet, and determined to go in search of the remainder, whom they judged to be in difficulties on the Californian coast. They took the bare walls of Tehautepec on the 29th of August, after a smart contest, and hovered in that quarter, making occasional and generally profitless forays, until the 20th of November. Hearing nothing by that time of the party they sought, they turned southward for the last time and steered for Amapala. This was not a very pleasant run. A storm dispersed them on the 1st of December; nor did they reunite until they reached the rendezvous. During the greater part of the way De Lussan and his comrades were almost famished with thirst. For eighty leagues the sea broke violently over a shoal that extended all that great distance between them and the shore. One of the company, unable to bear his sufferings, swam through the breakers and gained the land, but was drowned as he attempted to return, not twenty yards from his comrades, who could give him no aid. Two days after, their own extremity drove them to encounter a similar peril, and they ran desperately ashore near a small town, through a surf that half filled their bark as it touched the sand; and this, too, under the very eyes of an armed party that had been watching their motions. But the latter thinking that an attack was meditated on the town, hurried off thither, and the pirates filled their water-casks and departed at their leisure. Next day they obtained some food by a raid on a happier beach. And on the 15th they reached the rendezvous, where they found the rest of the band assembled.

From this spot they determined to cross the continent, taking the city of Segovia on the passage, and descending the river Gracias á Dios to the cape of the same name. But requiring further information, a party of eighty was sent ashore on the 18th of December to catch a few prisoners. During this inroad, De Lussan and seventeen others, separating from the main body, made a reckless assault on a town containing four hundred whites, besides colored inhabitants. Thinking them the advanced guard of a much greater force, most of the people fled at their entrance, but still the rovers managed to secure fifty prisoners of both sexes and all ages, and clapping these up in the church, under a very small guard, they dispersed to plunder. The fugitives, however, seeing no sign of a larger party, returned and attacked the scattered buccaneers, who retreated to the church. The prisoners there seeing the state of affairs, attempted to break out, and then ensued probably the most horrible incident that De Lussan has to record. One half of the pirates fired fast and furious on the assailants, and the other poured volley after volley into the prisoners. These wretches, after the first rush, could do nothing but huddle together in a helpless mass, while the murderous bullets smote them down, male and female, old and young, until but eight were left. By this the Spaniards on the outside had scattered out of range and the pirates appalled for once, and not the less since the catastrophe had befallen in the place which they were accustomed to hold so sacred, mounted in haste, for there was always plenty of horses at hand in these towns, and dashed off with their prisoners, closely pursued by the infuriated creoles. After riding a few miles they did a very unusual thing — released the females — and, coming up shortly after with their comrades, escaped without loss. This was their last raid.

The report of the prisoners was far from favorable. But most of the buccaneers were determined on the march; and to prevent any faltering, they ran their larger vessels aground on an island, and reserved only their canoes to carry them to the mainland some three or four leagues off. The next day, the 28th, a Spanish frigate hove in sight, and bore down to destroy their shipping. This was a matter of small consequence to them now; but they dared not let the Spaniards think so. Accordingly, they made a show of resistance until the last man had left for the mainland on the last night of 1687.

They spent the whole of New-Year's Day, 1688, in arranging the order of march, and making the few personal preparations requisite. Their treasure they placed in bags to be carried with the ammunition, and as their incorrigible habit of gaming had by this time distributed the booty very unequally, — some having lost all, and a few having accumulated really large fortunes, — those who had more than they could carry, divided the overplus among their more unfortunate mates, on condition that the latter should return half when they reached a place of safety. And this was done the more readily since it was very well known that the more unfortunate gamblers had conspired to murder the winners at the first favorable opportunity. De Lussan was one of the wealthiest of the band; though, having invested his thirty thousand pieces of eight in precious stones, his booty was probably the lightest of all. But for all that he had the prudence to intrust a third of it to other hands; and a very effective method of assuring his life this proved. The day closed, as will probably be surmised, with solemn prayer.

Having secured seventy or eighty horses to carry their food, and such among them as might happen to be disabled, they set out on the 2d of January; and admirably did they conduct their march. They had an advanced guard of forty men, and a rear-guard of an equal number, while mounted buccaneers scouted in couples far away on all sides.

They never entered a wood without firing down the avenues and into the coverts at the entrance. They always encamped on some commanding eminence. They placed their sentinels and went the rounds with military precision. And they roused and formed for the march at beat of drum. The country was soon in fierce commotion round them, dogging them perpetually with strong bodies of cavalry: obstructing the forest-paths and mountain-passes with felled trees and rocks hurled from the cliffs; firing the woods and savannas to windward, and posting ambuscades at every convenient spot. But, thanks to their fine order, not one of these devices succeeded in injuring the buccaneers. On they wound through the difficult forests, and up they went shivering through the misty mountain-passes towards the summit of the ridge, here probably eight thousand feet above the sea, finding the country devastated before them, and the enemy indefatigable upon their track. They reached Segovia in the midst of this Alpine district on the 12th, and much to their surprise found it deserted too; for they had calculated that there at least they must prepare for some resistance. But all that was to come. An old and skilful Walloon officer with a powerful force and ample resources at his command was busy not many leagues in their front. And they had escaped so well hitherto, merely because it was considered wisest to involve them inextricably in this difficult country previous to assailing them with an overwhelming force.

At sunrise on the 13th they paused on a hill-top, and seeing some cattle on a height half a mile in front, they despatched a party across the valley to secure them. This detachment returned in half an hour with startling news. What they had taken for cattle were but a few of thousands of saddled horses; the road crept up that same height through a ravine cut by a torrent, and for the first fifty yards of its ascent was heaped with felled trees, above which one over another rose three formidable ble redoubts crowded with men, while a precipice and thicket rendered the rest of the hill altogether impassable. The horsemen in the rear, also, were rapidly barring the path in that direction. And beacons, flaming like volcanoes along the cliffs, apprised the distant districts that the hour of vengeance had come at last.

So far the buccaneers were safe in the trap: and that it must be allowed was a strong one. But every school-boy knows what an ugly customer a snared rat is; and a buccaneer in a predicament like this was not a whit less perplexingly fierce and formidable to Mexican Spaniards. De Lussan and his comrades acknowledged all their peril at once and braced themselves to meet it. Despatching a dozen of their comrades — proved cragmen all — to search the mountain side under cover of the thick forest, — they set about fortifying their post. Towards night the scouts returned and pronounced it just possible to scale the barrier in front. That was all the buccaneers needed, and selecting eighty men to keep the camp, with directions to shift for themselves as best they could should the coming fight prove disastrous, "they said their prayers as low as they could, that the Spaniards might not hear them," and crept out on their perilous enterprise, just as the moon began to show above the horizon. The Spaniards, too, went through their vespers, but in much noisier style, accompanying each response with a discharge of small arms. This, however, soon ceased, and for the rest of the night the adventurers heard nothing but the roar of the torrent, the watchword of the sentinels, and the occasional whirr of a bird disturbed from its nest. Slowly and painfully they labored forward, through brake and quagmire, up precipitous cliffs and across giant trunks that had fallen through age, — more than once brought to a despairing halt by their difficulties, but always impelled to fresh exertion, by the recollection of their danger. When day broke they found themselves on the crest of the mountain. A little to the left they recognized the road, and a few yards lower down they heard the tread of the topmost Spanish sentinel; but he and all beneath was as yet enveloped in the morning mist. Half an hour's halt to take breath, look to their weapons, and gather their ranks; and then, just as the fog lifted, down they went like an avalanche, or the Highlanders through the pass of Killiecrankie. A fierce halloo called up the Spaniards, a crashing volley mowed them down, — and then with nervous arms and bloody blades the buccaneers were among them. The best and bravest were slain at once, the rest turned and fled. But they had been too mischievously skilful in barricading the pass for flight to avail them much; and while they floundered among its thousand impediments they were massacred without mercy. Then followed the flight of the horsemen in the rear, and the junction of those who had maintained the camp during that fearfully anxious night with those who had toiled to victory through such appalling difficulties. Te Deum was chanted on the field; the slain were stripped of their valuables and their boots; and hundreds of horses being seized and hundreds more hamstrung to prevent pursuit, — the whole band mounted and resumed the march with the loss of but a single man slain and two wounded. Two days after they passed a similar formidable intrenchment, and on the third another, but both alike deserted. That morning's work was enough for the Spaniards: they showed no more on the track. At last, on the 17th of January, the buccaneers gained the southern declivity of the plateau and the head-waters of the river they sought.

The torrent here was too fierce and broken for canoes, so they constructed a host of piperies. Each of these very primitive craft consisted of four or five logs some six feet long, bound together by creeping plants, and carried two men, who stood one at each end and guided it with poles. This kind of navigation was rather precarious, especially the first day, when the freebooters started in a crowd, and suffered, of course, no end of collision and upset. The pipery, too, had an awkward trick of deserting the surface, and progressing several feet beneath for miles together; and a still more awkward one of tumbling over as it shot the numerous rapids. But when De Lussan and his friends became habituated to these trifling peculiarities, they got on very well, seldom averaging more than a score of immersions in the day.

As for the cataracts, when the boom of the fall and the aspect of the stream apprised the voyagers of their vicinity, they landed and let the pipery take its chance. If it passed the ordeal undamaged they re-embarked; if not they made another. With respect to food: they killed a number of horses the day they set out; but the flesh was too constantly immersed to keep, and they had to fling it away the second morning. Their firearms too were rendered quite useless. But they found an abundance of bananas along the banks, and the Indians of these parts, being bitter enemies of the Spaniards, helped them a good deal. There was another risk, however, which some of them could not so well provide against. After the first day it was arranged that the piperies should float one by one at considerable intervals; and some of those reckless scamps who had lost all by gambling, took advantage of this to murder and rifle five of their comrades who had omitted to avail themselves of De Lussan's precaution. The adventurers reached the navigable portion of the river by the 20th of February; and though some few — Englishmen, of course — chose to complete the voyage on their beloved piperies, the great majority here made them canoes. De Lussan and his party completed and launched theirs on the 1st of March, and by the 9th they had reached the mouth of the river. There they found a small vessel, and fifty of them crowding into it were wafted to St. Domingo at a cost of forty pieces of eight a man. But it was easier to get home than to recover from the habits and feelings of the life they had so long been leading.

While coasting St. Domingo, they happened to notice some planters riding along the beach, and a number of them, thinking that they were still on the Pacific, ran to their arms, and could hardly be restrained from firing. They landed on the 4th of April at Petit Guaves, so delighted to find themselves among people of the same tongue, that they burst into tears; "grateful," says De Lussan, "that after we had undergone so many perils it had pleased the Almighty Maker of earth and seas to grant us a safe deliverance. For my own part," he adds, "I had so little hope of ever escaping, that for the space of fifteen days I could not persuade myself that my return was anything more than a pleasant illusion; and I dreaded to go to sleep lest on waking I should find myself back among the hardships of a BUCCANIER."

THE MINUTE NERVE-STRUCTURE OF THE HUMAN EYE.

BY DR. MANN.

MR. HULKE has recently been delivering a series of lectures on the structure of the eye, at the Royal College of Surgeons, in Lincoln's Inn Fields. The course was brought to a close a few days since by a very elaborate and interesting description of the minute nerve-structure of the organ, in which the lecturer ably demonstrated pretty well all that is known at the present time in this still somewhat mysterious and recondite branch of human anatomy, and in doing this had to deal somewhat with paradox, and to indicate the road to further investigation. The field, indeed, is a peculiarly rich one, both in suggestion and in material for philosophic thought.

The lecturer dwelt very lucidly, and with some measure of professional relish and affection, upon the delicate mechanism by which an exquisite physical impression seems to be transmuted into a yet more exquisite vital action. He traced out, by the combined power of a pictorial hand and tongue, the way in which vesicles, and fibres, and prisms are piled into successive layers, bacillary, outer, inner and intermediately, and finely, granular; nerve-vesicled, nerve-fibred, and liminary, and the rest. All of which, however, when reduced to ultimate simplicity, simply means that into this wonderful organ nerve-fibrils run on end, and are then bunched with ripe-nerve vesicles, somewhat as the fruit stalks of a vine are bunched with ripe grapes; the vesicles, however, being grouped more or less into interrupted layers, and the whole thickness of nerve-vesicle and nerve-structure being bound together by transverse bands of non-nervous fibre, or connective texture. On one side this remarkable mesh of organized fabric is defended by a compact "liminary membrane" of invoven fibres. On the other side it is paved with a layer of rods, or prisms, imbedded upon the subjacent texture, somewhat as the wood prisms are imbedded upon the subjacent surface in one particular method of paving the streets. These prisms, or rods, are fairly held to be the essentially physical parts of the structure, because they are "optical" in character and look; straight-sided, regular, rigid, and exact; instead of being vital and physiological of aspect, like the subjacent granular and vesicular layers. There is, however, also an intermediate and debatable ground of considerable interest, where a series of bulbous expansions, or "cones," connect the physical domain of the rods with the physiological domain of the granules and vesicles, in which the transmutation of the physical into the vital action is presumed, most rationally, and in all probability correctly, to be effected. There is obviously a very delicate and subtle fibrous connection between the cones which lie on the threshold of the physiological domain, and the outer granules which are within its pale. A fine fibre passes from the granule, through a sort of outer limiting membrane, into the pointed extremity of the cone; and this fibre has been described by some observers as being carried on into the prism, or rod. The cones, however, fall asunder very readily from the prisms; their connection with them is very frail and slight. In the eyes of many birds the exact points of connection are "jewelled" by beads of very remarkable and brilliant color; but these optical gems are not found in the more sober and prosaic eyes of man.

This is pretty well all that the microscopic anatomist is able to tell regarding this wonderful piece of elaborate living organization.

But the inquirer does not reach even this stage without coming across paradox. He has had clearly displayed before him a beautiful structure spread into a broad membrane in which there are tubes, or prisms, for the reception of light-beams on one side, and nerve-vesicles and fibres, to be acted upon vitally by the rays that are received by the prisms, at the other side. When this plan of arrangement is first perceived, it is very naturally anticipated that the prisms which receive the light are on the outer side of the fabric, and that the vital vesicles and fibres are on its inner side. This, however, strange to say, is not the case, — the nerve-structures are on the outer side, or that upon which the light first strikes in the interior cavity of the eye, and the optical prisms are on the inner side. The eye, in regard to its intimate internal structure, is not like a camera in which the opening of the window is in front, and the ground-glass screen for the painting of the picture at the back of the dark chamber. The arrangement is virtually just reversed. The opening of the window is behind, and the screen in front, and the light has to pass clean through the screen to the window, and has then to be thrown back from it, upon the posterior surface of the screen. The whole of the granular, vesicular, and fibrous layers, which form the vital portion of the organ, are so exquisitely transparent that the light passes freely through them, as it would through the clearest film of glass, then strikes into the closely ranked tubes and prisms, and reaches their bottoms; but finding no outlet there, rebounds upon the nerve-structures it has just permeated, to be felt by them in its reflected and spent-ball-like state as sensation. Why it is that vision is thus brought about by this rebound, and back-stroke influence of luminous vibration, no one can say. No one can tell how it is that the light rushes through the sentient nerve-membrane in its first direct course without exciting visual perception in it; or why on its return-course, or rebound, it does not again pass through in the same unperceived way. The prisms and the cones no doubt contain within their walls the explanation of the mystery. It is, unquestionably, by their instrumentality that light is changed into "sight," and no doubt the back-stroke action that looks so paradoxical to the uninitiated observer is part and parcel of the ways and means. In some wonderful way the prisms absorb the physical energy that traverses the million-mile chasms of space in almost unmeasurable instants; and convert its spent-force rebound into vital feeling. But in what way the marvellous transformation is brought about, neither optician nor physiologist, can yet declare.

The prisms (or rods and cones) associated with the vital nerve-structure of the human eye have been conceived to be each a complete piece of optical apparatus in itself; a virtual camera obscura, or dark chamber, in which the cone plays the part of lens, and the prism, or rod, the part of opaque walls.

It is worthy of remark that in the eyes of some creatures lower in the scale of organization than man, the walls of these prisms are coated inside with a dark pigment, much as the cavities of artificial cameras are painted with lamp black, to prevent confusing dispersions and reflections. In the human eye the dark absorbent coating is dispensed with, mainly because the cavity of each prism is so narrow and long, that the dispersions and reflections which would have room for play in wider quarters are stifled for want of space. In the human eye the isolation of each separate stroke of light appears to be secured by the refined delicacy of the optic part of the apparatus, rather than by the blackening of the tubes. That, at any rate, is at the present time the explanation of the anomaly offered by physiological ingenuity. In this particular also, there is, most probably, room for further investigation.

It is hardly possible to contemplate this curious apparatus of prismatic chambers paving the interior surface of the nerve-coats of the eye, without being forcibly struck with its intrinsic resemblance to the chambered structure of the compound eyes of insects, in which a faint mosaic of external nature is laid down in light by sifting and sorting the parcels of rays in the precise order in which they are thrown from the external objects that are distributed around. In all probability the eye of man is a compound eye with a difference: the coarse elementary type of eye-organization extended and perfected by additional contrivances.

In one part of the seeing nerve-membrane spread out around the interior of the human eye, there is a spot which is deserving of a separate and an especial notice. It looks, at first glance, like a pit or depression, in the woven fabric. It lies near the centre of the concave eyeball, and it has thence been designated the "fovea centralis." The cause of the pit is simply that the substance of the woven membrane is here thinned away. This effect, however, is produced merely by the removal of the granules and fibres, and coarser elements of the structure. The remaining portions, the prisms and cones, and nerve-vesicles are smaller and finer than they are in other parts of the membrane, and they are proportionately more numerous, and more closely packed together.

Indeed, they are more delicately and more exquisitely organized, and on that account perform their appointed task of seeing with finer precision and finish. This portion of the eye is accordingly employed when any extraordinary effort of vision has to be made. There is neither paradox nor uncertainty about the nature of this spot. Its character is well ascertained and thoroughly understood. The seeming speck is in reality a tract of refined finish and perfection, in which the optical and vital structure of the organ is raised to the highest strain of perfection. The coarser portions of the fabric are drawn away, and the finer portions, and more essential elements, are further refined and vitalized. The "central pit" is in reality the "microscope of the eye," the part of the organ which is drawn upon for all its most exact, and delicate, and exhaustive operations.

The "fovea centralis" of the human eye has, however, an indirect bearing upon a paradox, although unparadoxical in itself. The discovery of its character and structure suggests a complete explanation of a matter that has puzzled some of the most intelligent and distinguished opticians of the day. The puzzle, reduced to its simplest form of expression, is this, — If, in the deepening twilight of the evening, a telescope of considerable aperture and low power is directed to the face of a clock when the figures and hands of the dial have already become quite invisible to the unaided eye, they become perfectly plain again as if more light had been thrown upon them. The telescope is a faint-seeing as well as a far-seeing instrument. The reason for this is that the telescope virtually enlarges the aperture of the eye that avails itself of its co-operation. The comparatively large aperture of the instrument gathers in additional light, and so paints the image within the eye with proportionally augmented brilliancy and splendor. But if, in faint twilight, an optical lens of high power, which really augments the size of the visible picture very much more than it adds to its illumination, be employed in looking at an inconspicuous object, the same result ensues. The print of the Times newspaper can be distinctly deciphered by a very small and very powerfully magnifying lens of glass when no trace of the letters can be discerned by the unassisted eye. Now the explanation of this curious and unanticipated fact is physiological rather than optical. When a powerful magnifying glass is used in looking at a small, faint object, the picture of that object is spread over a very much larger surface on the membrane within the eye. Consequently, thousands instead of hundreds of the minute prisms and nerve-fibres of the organ become engaged in the work of discriminating the details and features of the delineation. The increase of nerve-power enlisted in the effort to see virtually has the same effect as increasing the force of the stimulus. Vital energy is brought into action to compensate for the deficiency of the physical impacts. When a powerful lens is used to assist vision, the entire surface of the nerve-coat of the interior of the eye is for the time being practically converted into a fovea centralis. A larger number of the visual prisms and fibres are caused to perform the particular work on hand, and the work is accordingly more delicately, completely, and exquisitely accomplished. By the use of the lens the entire eye is converted into a microscope. All parts of its seeing membrane become endowed with the superior powers which otherwise belong to the "central pit" alone.

Allusion has been made to the strong probability that the conical appendages of the rods or prisms of the human eye are the material instruments concerned in the transmutation of physical impact into vital action. There can be no doubt that these little bodies are very important parts of the organ in eyes fitted for the most perfect kind of vision. Eyes can, nevertheless, be made without them. They are entirely absent in the eyes of night-prowling animals like the owl and the bat. The inference is hence very fairly drawn by some of the German physiologists, that the sight of these nocturnal creatures must be wanting in some of the higher attributes of the sense. As it is not possible to bring the owl and the bat into the Court of Scientific Inquiry to give evidence upon this point, the great experimentum crucis of all the more occult and subtle difficulties of vital organization, pathology, will have to be appealed to. In all probability some day an owl-eyed or a bat-eyed human being will be discovered who will be able to tell how external nature looks to "coneless" eyes. Possibly Schultze's idea that such eyes see everything in monotonous white and black shadow may be near the truth.

RACINE, WITH A GLANCE AT HIS TRAGEDIES.

YOUTH OF RACINE.

JEAN RACINE was born at Ferté Milon, 21st December, 1639. He learned Latin at the College of Beauvais, where, in one of the juvenile battles fought in imitation of the intestine struggles in which the children's parents were engaged, he received a wound in his forehead, of which the mark remained during life. Being removed to Port Royal des Champs, he was enabled by the able scholar, Claude Lancelot, to understand Euripides and Sophocles in the course of a year. It need not be understood by this that all the passages which have since given so much trouble to Porson and other English and German scholars, were thoroughly mastered by him. The spirit of poesy paid him early visits. He would take his darling authors, and spend days in the woods enjoying their beauties, and indulging in the poetic images presenting themselves before the mirror of his mind.

The discretion of his master is not at all to be boasted of. Finding him studying the Greek romance of Bishop Heliodorus, "The Loves of Theagenes and Chariclea," the earliest of all the Greek romances extant, and a thoroughly harmless one, he took it out of his hands, and cast it into the fire. He used another copy, afterwards procured, in the same way. The third was voluntary, presented (a month or so later) to the severe tutor with the words, "Here's a third victim for the flames: I have it all by heart."

Racine's early platitudes in Greek and Latin verse were not much better or worse than the unnecessary and unhappy efforts of other modern geniuses in the same line. But his "Nymphé de la Seine," an ode on the marriage of the young King with the Spanish Princess, met with unwonted success. Chapelain, who was then head-ranger of Mount Parnassus to the Court, spoke so favorably of it to the Minister Colbert, that he presented a purse of a hundred louis to the poet, and soon after put him on the pension list for six hundred livres. To an ardent poetic spirit this must have been a strong incentive to make literature his unique profession; but his uncle, Vicar-General of Uzeu, in Languedoc, who wished to resign his living to him at his death, induced him to pay him a visit and study theology. He was obliged also to pay attention to jurisprudence, distracting and unpalatable occupations both, for a young man of his peculiar talents. Writing to La Fontaine he said, "I spend my evenings with my uncle, with St. Thomas, Aristotle, and Virgil."

He did perhaps a wiser thing than any of these, — he studied his own language, and when he began to be known his composition was remarked for a propriety of expression, and what might be termed daring combination of words, a richness of style, an energy, a movement unknown to French writers before his time. Getting tired of waiting for promotion in an ungenial place, he returned to Paris.

The first acted tragedy of our poet was the "Thebaide" (the Seven before Thebes), which made its appearance in 1664.

LES FRERES ENNEMIS AND ALEXANDRE.

In this piece the monologue of Iocasta, in the third act, the interview of the rival brother-kings in the fourth, and the animated description of the internecine fight in the fifth, were the passages most approved by the judges. However, the stern contention of determined spirits, or the word-painting of the deadly struggle of a heady fray, were not the things after his heart, which was more susceptible to the tender passions, including, in chief, pity and the domestic affections. There was an evident imitation of Corneille in the Thebaïde.

He read his second piece, Alexandre, to Corneille before representation, and the great tragedian uttered this opinion at the close: "I judge by this play that your talent is eminently poetic, not dramatic." As Corneille was so injudicious on one occasion as to say that he preferred Lucan to Virgil, Racine's satiric friend, Boileau, made this epigram on his taste:—

"It is possible to rhyme well, and yet want judgment;
It is possible to obtain the name of poet in the city,
And yet not be able to distinguish between Virgil and Lucan."

In the papers on Molière was mention made of Alexandre being withdrawn from that great man's company, and given to the actors of the Hotel de Bourgogne. Molière's people, though excellent in comedy, were not at home in tragedy; at least, so thought Boileau and others of Racine's friends. In consequence a coolness arose between the two great dramatists which continued through life. A circumstance of this removal, very annoying to Molière, was the loss of his best actress, Mademoiselle Daparc, who accompanied Alexandre to the rival house.

Soon after the failure of the tragedy at the Théâtre de Monsieur (Molière's), an Abbe was observed during a sermon to be in great uneasiness. He twisted himself about, grimaced in a fearful manner, and exclaimed in a loud whisper from time to time, "O Racine, O Racine!" A friend sitting near at last whispered, "What is disturbing you about Racine?" "O my friend, don't you perceive the identity of my position with that of the author of Alexandre?" "How so?" "I wrote this sermon to which you are listening. It is an admirable discourse, but this executioner delivers it as Molière's actors did Racine's piece. If I had intrusted it to another it would have the success which Alexandre has had at the Hotel de Bourgogne."

Racine in his first glow of self complacency was boasting to Boileau of the ease he found in putting his verses together. "Dear friend," said the critic, "I will endeavor to teach you to make these same easy verses with some difficulty."

In one of Boileau's "Dialogues of the Dead," he pleasantly ridiculed his friend's making a petit maître in love out of the insatiable conqueror. Pluto is in some trouble; he has a little insurrection to quell, and is consulting Diogenes. They see the shade of Alexander approach, and Diogenes exclaims in some surprise,—

"I believe that it is Alexander. How changed he is! I can scarcely recognize him. His physiognomy is neither Grecian nor Barbarian; it is that of a petit maître-warrior. His long travels must have made a great alteration in him. It is Alexander, however."

Pluto, however, being in need of a champion is determined that the new-comer must be the genuine hero. He cries out, "Draw near, generous conqueror of Asia, draw near. Fighting is at hand. The king of hell has need of your strong arm." The hero, bent on quite another business, utters a rhapsody on love. "Did I not say well," observed Diogenes, "that he has been spoiled by his travels? Alexander the Great is now only a sighing youth." Pluto adds,—

"What abominable nonsense he utters! Eh! Alexander who breathed only in combats, sighing to his mistress, resigned heart and soul to a woman!"

Alexander continues, addressing his Dulcinea:—

"How little you know of the violence of my love,—
Of a love which breathes out all its sighs to you!
I confess that ere now I mingled with armed men;
My heart aspired after naught but renown;
But now, alas, thine eyes, these amiable tyrants,
Very different effects have produced on my soul,
The name of conqueror it desires no more."

"We must," says Diogenes in an aside, "send him to keep company with the Grand Cyrus." Alexander continues,—

"Eh, do you imagine that, cruel to myself
I would have in this bleak region a beauty so rare?"

The king of hell much chagrined at his own disappointment, cries,—

"To Cerberus with his extravagant tenderness!
By my sceptre he is as great a fool as the rest. A pity that Macedon did not possess a lunatic asylum. If they had treated him as a madman above, he'd have brought some sense down here. Shut him up."

In fact the great conqueror was so occupied in matters of the heart, that Porus enjoyed more of the warlike interest of the piece, and much of the poetry was weak.

It was about this time that he obtained the presentation to the priory of Epinay, but all the benefit fell into the hands of the lawyers, as his claim was disputed, and a lawsuit followed, which neither he nor his opponent nor the judges understood, but which he afterwards made capital of in his comedy of the Plaideurs. He was soon engaged in a more annoying quarrel. His aunt, a Religieuse of Port Royal, finding him much taken up with the player-folk, wrote him a feeling letter on the danger he was in from consorting with men of loose lives, disapproved of by the Church, and liable to be excluded (unless previously reconciled) from Christian burial at their death.

Racine looked on this letter as a sort of excommunication, and while he was suffering from the smart, he found himself engaged in a controversy between the mad enthusiast Desmarets de Saint Sorlin, and the simple, and timid, and withal profound scholar and pure moralist, Pierre Nicole of Port Royal. Desmarets had composed many plays and poems, and a romance or two, one of them obscene enough. He put the "Imitation of Christ" in poor French poetry, and wrote the "Triumphs of Grace," and an epic poem or two. His Visionnaires was considered the masterpiece among his dramatic works. He was entitled the greatest fool among the poets, and the greatest poet among the fools. He took on him to explain the Apocalypse, the leading idea being himself as sent for the regeneration of man. In his "Advice of the Holy Ghost to the King," he promised Louis XIV. the Mohammedan empire, through the means of 144,000 victims, who under him would establish the true religion. Jansenists and Atheists were his special Bêtes Noires.

PIERRE NICOLE, OF PORT ROYAL.

Of a very different type was his literary antagonist, Nicole, of Port Royal. From his youth this man was gifted with great penetration and a surprising memory. Port Royal was his favorite abode.

In 1656, being then thirty-one years of age, he was advised to enter into holy orders, but after an examination of three days he was discouraged by his examiner, Pavillon, Bishop of Aleth, to aspire to anything beyond mere tonsure. Nicole was a Jansenist, yet on the subject of quietism he sided with Bishop Bossuet. He died in 1695 at the age of seventy. His "Essays on Morality" (thirteen vols. 12mo, 1704) are very highly esteemed. There are upwards of a score of his works extant, chiefly on moral or theological subjects, all distinguished by depth and research. Some are controversial, a few in defence of Jansenism. His treatises against infidelity were so closely reasoned that a nullifidian said of him: "If you commence to read a tract of his, be on your guard. If you agree to any one proposition, your mouth will be immediately closed; make no concession at all."

Nicole, though so eloquent with his pen, was as unready as Goldsmith or La Fontaine in conversation. He said of Treville, a clever viva voce controversialist: "He overcomes me indeed in the drawing-room, but I have regained the victory by the time I get to the bottom of the stairs." Candid, simple, timid, and without any knowledge of the world, he frequently amused the solitaries of Port Royal with his blunders.

One day as a young woman was consulting him upon a case of conscience, Father Fouque, of the Oratory, opened the door. "Ah, Father," said he, "you have come in a good time. This young woman wishes my advice in such and such a matter," explaining it fully. "You can give it much better." The poor damsel blushed to the eyes, and good Pierre Nicole got no few reproofs for his indiscretion. "How am I to blame?" said he. "Is n't Father Fouquet my confessor, and sure I keep no secret from him. The girl has no more to fear from him than from me."

He lived a long time in the Fauborg St. Marcel. Being asked the reason why he selected that unpromising locality, he answered: "The enemy who is now ravaging Flanders, and threatening Paris, will enter by the Porte-Saint-Martin, and be some time before he gets at me." It is said that when he presented himself to be examined for sub-deaconship the examiners found such little (apparent) capacity in him that they could not conscientiously pass him. Respecting his abilities as writer so much, they expressed their concern and sorrow as feelingly as possible, but he bade them not annoy themselves, it was God's will.

This simple sage, on reading some of Desmaret's lucubrations on the Apocalypse, took him up sharply for his presumption, observing as he went on that he began his evil course by writing romances and plays, "a quality," added he, "not very reputable in the account of discreet people, but quite abominable in the eyes of Christianity. A compiler of novels or a playwright is alike a public poisoner, not of the perishing bodies, but of the more precious soul, and chargeable with innumerable murders."

Racine being sore enough since the receipt of the letter from his aunt, took this diatribe as if it was expressly intended for him, and returned an angry and able answer, which the ill-willers of the Port Royal gentlemen put on a par with the Lettres Provinciales. Nicole did not reply, but reprisals were made by Barbier, D'Aucour, and Dubois. A second letter was prepared by Racine, but on its being first submitted to Boileau, that sound-judging friend observed: "This letter will do honor to your ability, but not to your heart. In it you bitterly attack men of great merit, to whom you owe in great part what you are." The letter was not printed, and the poet calming down did all in his power to suppress the one already in print. Both, however, have been preserved.

ANDROMACHE.

Andromache succeeded Alexandre, the abilities of the poet still further developing themselves with each successive piece. It is many years since we read Phillips's "Distrest Mother," which is a translation or adaptation of the tragedy, and distinctly remembered how much more we enjoyed the story of the "Three Calenders" or the "Mysteries of Udolpho." Andromache was first performed in 1667, when its author was in his thirtieth year. Terror and pity are the moving powers. The style is noble and at the same time simple, no bombast, no commonplaces, and as there is no episode the interest never flags. We have heard the despair and fury of Orestes, the waverings of Pyrrhus, and the jealousy of Hermione objected to; but it is not easy to see how the catastrophe could be brought about if these passions and weaknesses were forbidden to appear.

Mlle. Champmeslé made her first appearance in Hermione, and though the author was at first very apprehensive of success on her part, she succeeded in giving him and the public great pleasure by her performance. The actor Montfleury so strenuously depicted the fury of Orestes that his death followed after a short illness. Mondory's death was caused by his vigorous performance in the Marianne of Tristan. A wit of the time said that no successful author would henceforth be pleased if he did not succeed in killing his man.

This tragedy was the first on the French stage which was honored by a parody. In our days the author of a serious drama is more pleased than otherwise by a burlesque on it, but Racine was deeply offended by the liberty taken with Andromache.

Allusion has been already made to a lawsuit endured by our poet, which frustrated any intentions he might have entertained of entering into orders. One day as he was in company with Boileau, La Fontaine, Chapelle, and Furetière, — all the choice spirits of the day at the sign of the sheep, he gave an outline of the trial. After the merriment caused by the recital had sobered down a little, they all agreed that a comedy should be written on the event. A councillor of the Parlement, Mons. de Brilhac, furnished Racine with some of the terms in chicanery and the play was produced. A few words on the outline of the piece will not be amiss.

LES PLAIDEURS.

Mons. Perrin Dandin, a judge in Lower Normandy, has his soul so absorbed in trying causes that he has beheaded his cock for not waking him up one morning time enough, alleging that some client had greased the poor bird's claw for his own ends. Trying causes has become a mania with him, and his son Leander employs the porter, Petit Jean, a clever Picard, to confine the old gentleman to the house and allow him no legal indulgence. But the cunning judge makes a provision of law papers sufficient for three months, and leaps through a window in the early dawn. He is secured, however, by his son, his secretary, and little John, and among other complaints, laments his lost wife, who loved the law as much as he himself.

"My poor Babonnette! Alas, when I think
How in her life she never missed a trial!
Never, never, never would she quit me,
And goodness knows all she secured.
Rather than return home empty handed,
She would make conveyance of the coffee-room towels."

They confine the mad judge to the house, and Leander consults with the clerk about delivering a letter to Isabelle, daughter of Chicaneau, a crazy client worthy of the judge. He must assume the disguise of a tipstaff, and be provided with a summons to escape detection by the father. Just then, Chicaneau enters (the action passes in the street between Dandin's and Chicaneau's houses), and is soon joined by the Countess Pimbésche, both anxious for an interview with the judge. After some mutual condolence the lady states that all her great causes have been decided, and that

"There now remain only four or five slight affairs;
One against my husband, the other against my father,
One against my children! Ah, sir, pity me!
I can't tell what part the cruel thought in their heads.
They have got a decree that I shall plead no more,— Plead no more, but be clothed and fed during life."
'How! tie up the hands of a lady like you!
But the pension! Is it liberal!'
'I can't complain! 't is liberal enough;
But what is life without Law?'"

"How long since you commenced to plead?"
"Thirty years." "And what age are you now?"
"Sixty." "Just the age for legal vigor: you have been vilely treated. Now attend to my grievance."

"About fifteen or twenty years ago an ass's colt got into my meadow; rolled about, and otherwise damaged it; I made my complaint to the village judge, and seized the ass. A valuer was appointed, and the damage assessed at two bottles of hay. A year passed, sentence was pronounced, and ourselves dismissed. I appealed, and during the new trial,—remark this, madam, if you please—my friend Drolichon, by some money well laid out, obtained a reverse in my favor. All in vain; the enemy obtained a stay of execution, and while we tugged away on both sides, he let his fowl stray into my meadow. A new suit, and an order made to calculate how much hay a cock or hen would eat in a day. This was tacked on to the other cause, and a new trial appointed for 5th or 6th of April, 'fifty-six.' New expenses!—I furnished statements, counter statements, perquisitions, demands for documents, valuers' reports, attendances, three consultations, new complaints, new evidence, bail bonds, depositions. I obtained letters-patent. I convicted my opponent of perjury. There ensued fourteen consultations, thirty summonses, six processes, twenty-six productions of documents, witnesses, and twenty writs of error. Judgment at last! I lost my cause, and was condemned to pay six thousand francs. Is that justice? is that equity after twenty years? I have still one resource, the civil request, and will use it: No surrender!"

Amid mutual condolences the gentleman tells the lady how to address the judge. "You are to say, madam, 'You may tie me, but'—" "But I won't be tied." "Have patience! 'You may tie me'—" "I tell you I won't be tied. You are a dolt, a fool, a ninny, a, &c."

He recriminates; calls her an old fool, and an action ensues. He is summoned to wait at her house, and in the hearing of certain people of credit to bear testimony to her good sense.

Meanwhile Leander's clerk, dressed as a sheriff's officer, has an opportunity of delivering the billet to Isabelle; but while she reads, her father, Chicaneau, returns, and asks what it is. She answers it is a summons, and tears it up. The false summons-server contrives to get a beating from the angry father, writes out his proces-verbal on his knee, and begs him to add to the chastisement, which will secure him and his four small children a competence for the rest of their lives. The frightened Chicaneau gets his daughter to write an ample apology, which, in her hands (instructed by her lover), becomes a free consent to her marriage with Leander. He signs this without examination, and then the audience is treated to a grand trial before Judge Dandin.

The poor man not being allowed by his watchers to go to court, gets on the roof, and holds a consultation with the other personages in the street. Being removed from his bad eminence he harangues them from the grating which lights the cellar. At last, to occupy his attention in a healthy fashion, his son submits a domestic cause for trial. The dog Citron has laid violent hands on a capon; Petit Jean is appointed prosecutor; the secretary, the defender; Leander will be the audience, and as Petit Jean the porter fears for his inexperience in legal matters, a prompter is granted to him. The judge thus opens the court:—

"Allons nous préparer! ça messieurs, point d'intrigue;
Fermions l'œil aux présents, et l'oreille à la brigue.
Vous, Maître Petit Jean, serez le demandeur;
Vous, Maître l'Intimé soyez le défendeur."

Petit Jean by the prompter's aid thus commences his exordium, occasionally missing the word and sending it forth disguised:—

"Gentlemen, when I consider with attention
The inconstancy of the globe, its vicissitudes also;
When I behold among the crowd of multitudinous men,
Not one fixed star, but many wandering planets;
When I view the Cæsars, when I study their fortune,
When I behold the sun, when I look on the moon,
When I see the States of the Babilonians
Transferred from the serpents (Persians) to the Nacedonians;
When I look on Japan —"

"When will you have seen everything?" said the opposite counsel, and poor Petit Jean lost the thread of his discourse.

The secretary begins his defence as far from the poor dog as the porter did his accusation, some war of wits intervening.

"Gentlemen, everything calculated to dismay a culprit,
Everything most dreaded by mortals,
Seems as if by fate arrayed against us.
On this side I'm dismayed by the credit of the defunct,
On the other the flashing eloquence of Master Little John!"

Here, as he ended, every line in a shrill treble, in mockery of some well-known lawyer, he was requested by Judge Dandin to change his tone for a more natural one, and he complied, occasionally pitching his voice in the familiar accents of this or that well-known pleader. He continues:—

"Still, the credit and the eloquence notwithstanding,
We rely on the anchor of your goodness; besides,
Before the great DANDIN innocence is bold.
Yes, before this Cato of Lower Normandy,
This sun of equity is never obscured,
Victrix causa diis placuit, sed victa, Catoni."

So far the judge is delighted; but now the pleader wanders off to Aristotle, Pythagoras, Pausanias, and the Corinthians. The judge cannot bring him to the point. At last he dashes into cosmogony itself. "Before the creation of the world," he exclaims. "Ah!" cried the poor judge, "pass on to the Deluge." However, he cannot be got out of chaos, and thunders two lines on the subject from the first page of Ovid. At last he puts the judge to sleep. Roused from a short nap, and requested by his son to pass sentence, he cries, "To the galleys with him!" "A dog to the galleys!" "O, he has filled my head with chaos; conclude."

* The successful cause pleased the gods, but the unsuccessful one CATO.

Here the adroit counsellor presents a couple of little pups to the Court, and endeavors to raise the waters.

— "Approach, ye little desolate ones.
Come, poor children, about to be made orphans!
Come, exercise the powers of your infant minds!
Come, let your youth and weakness plead for you!
Yes, gentlemen, you see our miserable state,
We are orphans; — restore our father!
Our tender father, to whom we owe existence,
Our father, who" —

The poor judge betrays his inability to come to a decision. The tender father deserves death, but if justice is done, his children must go to the Foundling Hospital. However, he is spared further annoyance by the entry of the young lady and her father. The display of the consent signed by him, and the non-necessity of furnishing a dowry reconcile him to the match, and the promise of a lot of causes to be constantly tried at home softens the judge, who merely stipulates for the future orations to be abridged.

A living president, who loved his profession so much that he exercised it in his own family, was caricatured in Dandin. Several of the advocates of the day were handled in the Plaideurs, notably in the different tones used by the counsel for the defence. The secretary's exordium, taken from Cicero, was really made use of by a popular lawyer of the day in defence of his client, a baker. The scene between the Countess Pimbesche and Chicaneau took place in presence of Boileau's eldest brother, who was Master of the Rolls, the real personages being his nephew, a president, and the Countess of Crissée, a lady who had so tried the patience of the Parisian courts that she was forbidden by an order of the Parliament to commence any new action unless by the written advice of two councillors chosen expressly for the purpose. This interdict threw the law-loving lady into a state of despair, from which she sought to extricate herself by inflicting sundry visitations on judges, counsellors, attorneys, and finally on the Greffier Boileau, in whose office she met his young nephew. There was great sympathy at first between the gentleman and herself, till she took fire at an expression used by him with a thoroughly harmless intent; she then heaped abuse on his head.

While Petit Jean was wandering from the point, Dandin more than once exhorted him, —

"Et vous, venez au fait, un mot du fait."

The needful request arose from a recent occurrence at the Palais de Justice. An advocate charged to rescue his client from a claim of affiliation was descanting on every subject but the one before the Court, and the judge anxiously exhorting him to come, —

"Au fait: 'Venez au fait.'"

At last the counsellor, annoyed for having his oratory so rudely nipped, exclaimed, "Le fait est un enfant fait; celui qu'on dit, l'avoir fait, nie le fait; voilà le fait!"

Dandin's dear defunct, who, if nothing else was to be brought home from the Palais, would make free with the towels, merely imitated the wife of the lieutenant who presided over the criminal business.

"Elle eût du bavôlier emporté les serviettes, Plûtôt que de rentrer chez elle, les mains nettes."

This piece, most laughter-moving in representation, excited no enthusiasm at first. About a month after it first appeared, it was performed as an afterpiece before the king, who laughed so heartily that the audience nearly split their sides. The performance being over, the comedians returned in three carriages from St. Germain to Paris at eleven o'clock. They drove at once to Racine's lodgings, and the noise of the horses' feet, the wheels of the carriages, and the voices of those within them, brought the whole neighborhood to their windows. To all inquiries the answers given were LES PLAIDEURS! So they took for granted that the poet was about being conducted to prison, for ridiculing the judges and the lawyers. Molière, though not on friendly terms with the poet, had from the first pronounced the "Plaideurs" an excellent piece, and pronounced all and sundry devoid of taste who did not appreciate it as he did himself. The idea of this piece was taken from the Vespes of Aristophanes.

BRITANNICUS.

Racine's next tragedy, "Britannicus," might be considered a failure, as at first it was only honored with eight representations. Nero is represented in his youth, not indeed the monster he afterwards became, but still with a strong tendency to cruelty and self-indulgence. Junia, the Ingenue of the piece, and the loved of the young Britannicus, escapes from the hated caresses of Nero into the society of the Vestals, as a Christian virgin of Paris would effect hers if the proposals of the Grand Monarque did not find favor in her eyes.

Before the appearance of this tragedy the young king took much delight in figuring in the court-ballets, and attracting the ready admiration of the spectators. He renounced that gratification after hearing this report made to Nero by the unworthy Narcissus, of the estimation in which he was held by the people: —

"He centres all his ambition, thinks it a high virtue,
To drive a chariot with skill in the circus,
To contend for prizes unworthy of his hands,
To exhibit himself a spectacle to the Romans,
To let his voice be heard in the theatre,
Reciting lays which he wishes to be idolized."

Louis probably considered this passage as a censure on his conduct; at all events, he laid the lesson to heart. After the performance of Britannicus he was never again seen in a ballet.

Boileau, with the instinct of true friendship, gave the greatest praise to the tragedy when he found the poet suffering mortification from the failure,

An actress personating Agrippina, erewhile wife to Claudius, caused as much merriment among the audience as did the English actor with the famous couplet —

"And oh, how sharper than a serpent's thanks it is To have a toothless child!"

Merely misplacing two words, she declaimed how her destiny —

Mit Rome dans mon lit et Claude à mes genoux."

To say that Racine was very sensitive to neglect or disapprobation is merely to say that he was a tragic poet. His preface to Britannicus is very sore, but very just at the same time in every literary opinion expressed. He maintains throughout that if he had done what his various critics would have had him to do, he would have drawn down on him the censures of Homer, Virgil, Sophocles, and Cicero, provided they had been present at the representation.

BERENICE.

Berenice, the next piece in order of time, was represented in 1671. It is reported that Henrietta of England, sister to our Charles II., and wife of the unworthy brother of Louis XIV., would have much preferred to have her brother-in-law for husband. She pitied the royal sufferers, Titus and Berenice, for their forced separation, mentally assimilating their fortunes to those of Louis and herself. She accordingly expressed her wish to the veteran Corneille and to Racine, to compose dramas on this subject, and they obeyed.

Racine, as before observed, was easily annoyed by the nettle-stings and pin-pricks suffered at the hands of the critics and parodists. He was exceedingly vexed at the following passage:—

"Columbine (drawing Harlequin by his skirt) — Answer me.

"Harlequin — Ah, your 're tearing my coat.

"Columbine — You 're Emperor, lord, and yet you 're crying.

"Harlequin — Yes, madame, 't is true, I weep, I sigh,

I groan, but when I accepted the crown,

When I accepted the crown, I was made Emperor."

He was even more chagrined at an answer of Chapelle's. At a social party all were loud in their praises of Berenice. Chapelle alone kept silence. "Give me your opinion frankly," said the poet. "What do you think of Berenice?" "What do I think?" said he.

"Marion pleure, Marion crie, Marion veut qu'on la marie."

This disparaging couplet of Chapelle's inflicted much chagrin on the poet, to whom, as well as to La Fontaine, Boileau, Feuretiere, and other friends, Chapelle's society afforded so much pleasure. He excelled in the light and airy literature of the day, and his social qualities were in the highest estimation among his friends. He was weak on the side of wine, and this gave Boileau and Racine much uneasiness. The latter, meeting him once in the street, began to speak very seriously to him on the subject of intemperance. "What you say," answered Chapelle, "is most just and edifying; but it is hot and wearisome here in the glare of the sun. Let us take a seat in this cabaret, and talk more at our ease." In order not to take up room without giving anything in return, a moderate drop of liquor was called for. Chapelle continued to pay marked attention to his friend's discourse, keeping his (Racine's) glass well filled, while his Mentor, intent on his reformation, never noticed the underhand proceeding. His zeal increased, his advice became more earnest and more affectionate, and he paid no attention to the quantity of liquor he was imbibing. By the time he had arrived at the complete conversion of his friend, he found himself in a perfect state of inebriety. He never after ventured to speak to Chapelle on the subject of temperance.

This agreeable and witty man lost his ordinary powers under the influence of drink. As soon as the fumes reached his brain, he would begin to hold forth on the system of physics taught by his master Gassendi in opposition to Descartes; and when left alone by his much-enduring companions, he would secure the tavern-keeper, and continue to enlighten him while his patience endured.

Louis XIV. meeting the court physician on coming out from the theatre, after witnessing Berenice, said to him with a very serious air, "I have been just on the point of sending for you to come to the relief of a princess who wanted to die, but did not know how to go about it."

The great Condé knew better how (at all events, he had a better will) to turn a compliment than Chapelle or Louis. Being asked how he liked the play, he answered by quoting what Titus said of Berenice,—

"For two years I've seen her every day,
And every day thought it was for the first time."

The actress Gaussin threw such pathos into her representation of the dismissed lady, that one of the stage sentinels burst into tears, and let his musket fall on the stage. Racine, however, did not live to enjoy that triumph of his genius.

Really our tragedian did not consult that eternal fitness of things so lauded by Mr. Square. Such love as Titus, and the wife or paramour of three or four others, could entertain for each other, was not a sufficient or suitable foundation for a tragic drama (the piece may be called tragic in a way, though no blood is spilled).

Berenice, sister of that King Agrippa before whom St. Paul made his oration, was married at an early age to Marcus, son of Alexander the Alabarch. Her second spouse was her uncle Herod. After his death she is accused of having loved Agrippa with more than a sister's affection. Complaints arising on this head, she espoused Polemon, King of Cilicia. Not finding happiness in his society, she returned to Agrippa, and we are not told whether she formed any other tender engagements till she enthralled the great conqueror of Jerusalem. Historians say he would have made her his Empress, but for the generally expressed dissatisfaction of the Romans at his choice. This time the vox populi was raised for the right. Now if the affection was of that pure lofty character sung by poets, and told by romancers, and so often recorded in history, we could pardon Titus and Racine. The historians tell us of the one day lost by the generous Emperor; they have omitted from their calculation all the days lost in doting on a disreputable woman.

As no one suffers death in this drama, some have thought the name of Tragedy a misnomer. But a separation between the chief personages loving one another so intently may be made as tragically interesting as death itself. In the preface, Racine displayed nearly as much soreness as in the preface to Britannicus. The simplicity of the plot giving such displeasure to many critics, the poet skilfully convicted them of ignorance of the true canon of criticism. He begged of outsiders "to lay upon him and his brothers the fatigue of clearing up the difficulties of the Poetics of Aristotle, and reserve to themselves the pleasure of being affected." He then related the anecdote of Philip King of Macedon blaming a bard for not having composed his lay according to the rules, and the answer made by the poor man: "God forbid, sire, that you should ever be obliged to understand these things better than I do."

Deprecating the ill opinion of those who considered that many characters and many incidents were essential to the merit of a piece of one day's action, he thus judiciously argues:—

"It is only the truthful that touches us in tragedy, and what likelihood is there that in one day a number of things should happen which could scarcely occur in many weeks. Some assert that this simplicity is an evidence of poverty of invention. They do not reflect that all invention consists in making something out of nothing, and that a crowding of incidents has always been a refuge to poets who did not find in their genius sufficient abundance nor sufficient strength to rivet their spectators' attention by a simple action, sustained by the force of passion, the beauty of sentiment, and the elegance of expression. I am far from thinking that all these perfections are found in the work, but I cannot suppose that the public will blame me for giving them a tragedy which has drawn so many tears, and whose thirtieth representation has been as well attended as the first."

Still, argue as he might, Berenice is only a heroic pastoral. There is neither the sublime nor the terrible in it. Titus is not a hero: he is merely an estimable prince of the Court of Versailles. The action is conducted with much skill and vivacity. Delicacy of sentiment rules all through, and an elegant, noble, and harmonious versification distinguishes the lines. The poet keeping before his eyes, not the Berenice of history, but the amiable English princess, concentrated the interest on her heartfelt grievance.

BAJAZET.

Bajazet was first acted in 1672. The reader must put out of his mind the Turkish Emperor whom Timour conquered and led about with him in a cage. The Bajazet of Racine lived in the same century with him, and his nephew Mahmoud ruled the Sublime Porte, when the play was first performed. Bajazet was one of the four brothers of Sultan Amurath, two of whom were put to death by his order. The Sultan, in 1638, sent orders from Babylon, which he had just taken, to put Bajazet to death privately. In the tragedy, the Prince loves, and is beloved by Atalide, one of the Royal family, but for his and her misfortunes, Rozana, the haughty wife of the absent Amurath, has bestowed her affections on him, and offered to secure for him the throne. She discovers that she has not his heart, and his death is decreed. She herself meets with deserved punishment, and Atalide perishes by her own hand. Love, as in nearly all Racine's plays, rules supreme, and is painted with energy. The plot is closely compacted; there are striking situations, and many passages breathing tragic vigor. It did not give thorough satisfaction to Corneille, however. Perhaps the most perfect piece in the whole world would not do that with a rival tragedian. During the first representation he whispered in the ear of M. Legrais: "The personages of this piece entertain very French sentiments under their Turkish robes. I would say this only to you, others might think I was actuated by jealousy."

MITHRIDATE.

Mithridate, performed in 1678, met with great success. The historic characters and events were such as in the hands of a good dramatist were sure to interest an intelligent audience. Mithridate, the defeater of the Romans, with his determined hatred of that power, his great courage, his cruelty, his fiensse, his dissimulation and jealousy, was such a character as a great actor would desire.

The design of Mithridate to pass into Italy, as Pyrrhus did before him, gave Racine an opportunity of seizing on the needful unity of time and place. Coupled with his design on his enemies was his suspicion of his betrothed Monimia, and his prying into the secrets of his sons, one of whom, Xipharex, is the beloved of his intended bride, and the other a rebel in heart, and an instigator of the soldiers to desert their king. The deeply incensed monarch and father having pronounced an awful curse on his traitor son, Pharnaces, procured death at the hand of a Gaulish officer, not finding any poison strong enough to effect the object.

Racine departs from history in making his wife Monimia only his espoused, and also making her outlive him. In reality he had much difficulty in obtaining her hand, and after this promotion such as it was, she found her life what she might have expected with a cruel and suspicious husband, whose thoughts were ever occupied with encroachments on the possessions of others or the defence of his own.

Mithridate, in one of his reverses, being apprehensive that his wives would fall into the hands of his enemy, sent trusty emissaries to put them to death, or see them perish by their own hands. Monimia, weary of existence, cheerfully took the golden circlet from round her head, and essayed to strangle herself with it. It was not strong enough, and she uttered this reproach to it, "O, cursed and unfortunate tissue, can you not render me even this melancholy service?" Spitting then with contempt on the earth, she resigned herself to the hands of the executioner.

In the play she is the betrothed of Xipharex, Mithridate's son, and the king descends to an unworthy artifice to ascertain the state of her heart. She is destined to death towards the end of the tragedy, but is saved to become the happy wife of the young prince. This departure from known history was not judicious on the part of the dramatist. He might have selected another lady for the purpose, and not mention Monimia at all.

Mithridate's character is well developed and supported. Such as he was in life he is in the drama, breathing vengeance and ambition, courageous, great in adversity, violent, furious, jealous, and cruel; but his affairs of the heart, and the ruses used, belong to comedy rather than tragedy.

The tragedy, on the whole, more resembled one of Corneille's rough, energetic pieces than any of Racine's own.

About the time of the first appearance of Mithridate, Corneille had the mortification of witnessing the complete failure of his Pulcherie.

Of all theatrical pieces known to Charles XII., Mithridate was his favorite. He passed many hours of his forced sojourn among the Turks reading it.

Beauborg, a talented actor, but a rather ugly-faced man, while filling the roll of Mithridate, was thus addressed by Mademoiselle Lecouvreur on the part of Monimia—

"Ah, seigneur, vous changez de visage."

A wag in the pit improved the occasion by crying out, Laissez-le faire, and shouts of merriment filled the theatre. They brought no joy to the heart of the poor actor.

Bannières, an actor from Toulouse, made his début in 1729 in Mithridate. He acted with such precipitation and want of judgment that the house was filled with laughter. He was not devoid of sense nor talent, and at the end he came respectfully forward and begged the audience to allow him to try the part again the next night. He got leave, and showed such improvement that he was applauded by pit and boxes.

On a day when the play was announced for the evening, the chief actors and actresses were summoned to the Court at St. Germain, and the poor Parisians were obliged to endure the acting of the inferior player-folk. There was great uproar before the first scene was over, and the company were thinking it best to return the money, when Legrand, good man of business but no actor, stepped forward to the footlights, and thus spoke, as soon as he could get an opening:—

"Gentlemen, Mademoiselle Duclos, M. Beauborg, MM. Ponteuil and Baron have been obliged to attend at the Court. We are in despair for not having their talent, and can only present Mithridate. We avow that it will be wretchedly performed. You have not as yet known the worst, for alas I myself am to be Mithridate." There was great cheering and laughing, and the play was murdered to the delight of the audience.

IPHIGÉNIE.

Racine admired Euripides beyond all the Greek dramatists. He borrowed three of his subjects, making changes greater or less in the plots. These are Andromache, Iphigénie, and Phædra (from Hippolytus). He could not bear to have the breast of the innocent virgin, Iphigenia, mangled by the knife of the ruthless priest, and did not suppose his Christian audience would much approve the mechanical rescue of the fair victim by Diana, and her passage through the air. So he substituted Eriphile, called also Iphigenia, daughter of Theseus and Helen, to receive the fatal stroke which she inflicted with her own hand.

Iphigénie, produced in 1674, was acted before an audience consisting of the king and the nobility in a temporary theatre, set up in the park of Versailles, on the return of his Majesty from Franche Comté. However versed in the wicked ways of the world were the noble and beautiful individuals assembled, abundance of tears were shed, chiefly wrung out by the well-skilled actress, Champmeslé, in the part of the virgin victim. Boileau said on this subject:—

"Never did Iphigenia, immolated in Aulis,
Cost so many tears to the assembled Greeks,
As in this fine spectacle under the maiden's name,
Champmeslé has drawn from the eyes of her hearers."

Lully was once accused of being unable to furnish music to any lines more energetic than those feeble ones furnished him by Quinault. To give a practical denial to the charge, he sat down at the harpsichord, and after running his fingers over the keys for a few seconds, he sung this quatrain (uttered by Clytemnestra from the Iphigénie), accompanying his voice with befitting chords:—

"A priest surrounded by a merciless crowd,
Shall lay a criminal hand on my daughter,
Tear open her bosom, and, with curious eye,
Consult the gods in her palpitating heart."

One who was present related long afterwards, how the company almost fancied themselves looking on the odious sacrifice, and how the harrowing sounds groaning from the instrument nearly set the hair upright on their heads.

There were pretentious ladies in the days of Racine as well as in our own, in whose classical education there were some flaws. One of these showing the treasures of her gallery in which were many "old masters," stopped before one, and acknowledged her ignorance of the subject. "It is the sacrifice of Iphigenia," said a bystander. "Pardon me," said she, "it is not ten years since the tragedy was written by Racine, and that picture has been in this gallery upwards of a century."

PHEDRE.

Once engaged in a literary discussion, Racine, perhaps, out of a whim, maintained that a good poet had it in his power to render the greatest crimes excusable, and excite compassion for the criminal perpetrators of them. "No more was needed," he said, "than fertility of imagination, delicacy of feeling and judgment." With these, sympathy might be roused even for Medea and Phædra. All were against his opinion, and this rendered him more determined on trying his powers on one of these little-lauded women. He had another strong inducement. Mlle. Champmeslé had requested him to create a part for her in which she could present a picture of all the passions. Phædra was just the character, and he began, and wrote that tragedy (1677), to exhibit the rare and fine faculties and qualities of the actress.

As Racine has depicted Phædra, no audience but would find it very difficult to condemn her. She is obliged by the cruel goddess to love Hippolyte, yet she does all in her power to make him hate her, and to have him sent away. But the mother of Cupid is inexorable, and when she thinks with all but absolute certainty that Theseus will never recross the Styx, the too complaisant counsels of Cénéon and the implacable Aphrodite wring her secret from her. So far from criminalizing Hippolytus, she is about to sacrifice herself, when Cénéon accuses the prince of that crime furthest in all the circle of crime from his intention, and the fearful catastrophe ensues. A foreigner merely able to translate, but still retaining a rooted dislike to French tragic poetry, could not help admiring the vigorous, and picturesque, and terrible description of Hippolytus's progress along the strand, the rushing of the mountain wave towards the shore, its disgorging of the monster, its retiring in terror of his fearful appearance, and the ensuing awful event.

A monster as fatal to the continuation of Racine's labors as that which issued from the boiling sea was to the poor prince, appeared in Paris just before the production of Phædra in the form of a clique of envious and unfriendly personages of high rank. Madame Deshoulières, who loved neither Boileau nor Racine, as soon as she learned that he was about to produce the Phædra, induced her brother, the Duke of Nevers, the Duchess of Bouillon, and others in high places to join her in insuring its complete failure. Pradon, the playwright, was set at work on the same subject and brought out his piece at the same time. This might have an effect the reverse of what they wished, but the clique hired the chief places in two theatres for the first five nights, left those in the Hotel Bourgogne vacant, and filled the boxes and stalls in the other theatre. The result was a certain triumph for Pradon's poor piece, and a coolness towards Racine's chef-d'œuvre, even among the actors.

Spiteful and satiric sonnets were made on both sides, and the Duke of Nevers was so irritated with the hostile one that he threatened to have the two inseparables assassinated, or at least soundly cudgelled. Duke Henri Jules, son of the Great Condé, on hearing this, invited the poet and critic to the Hotel de Condé, saying: "If you are innocent he will defend you, if you are guilty he will protect you, for the sonnet is a good one."

The public soon recovered from its little manifestation of bad taste. As soon as the cabal ceased to hire the boxes, they began to be filled with the accustomed patrons, and the tragedy acquired a high reputation.

RACINE AS HUSBAND AND HISTORIAN.

All this did not overcome the disgust which the sensitive and offended poet conceived against the theatre. He was then only thirty-eight years of age, but never after wrote a line of a play on a profane subject. He began to have serious thoughts of entering into the religious state, but his confessor dissuaded him. He told him he would tire of solitude, that his was a temperament which needed sympathy, &c. The result was a marriage next year with the daughter of one of the treasurers, a lady not gifted with the slightest possible taste for poetry or plays, but of a pleasing countenance, good-humor, and sound sense. She never read even a scene of one of her husband's tragedies. With all these good, every-day qualities, she cared not for riches nor rank.

One day as she was at Boileau's house waiting for her husband, he came in flushed with joy at bringing a thousand louis from Versailles. "Congratulate me, my dear. See what I have brought." The answer he got was, that Billy was very naughty and had not looked in his book for two days. "O, never mind Billy for the moment; let us talk of our good fortune." "I declare he must be brought to a sense of his ill conduct when we get home"; and out of this groove she could not be got. "Well, well," said the astonished husband, "here is stoicism. I did not think it was in human nature to despise a thousand louis."

Our poet lost no time after his renunciation of the theatre till he made his peace with the Messieurs Port-Royal. Good Pierre Nicole, who had not room in his whole organism for an ounce of resentment, was only too eager for the renewal of friendly feeling; but Mr. Arnaud was made of sterner stuff. However, he was inveigled into reading a portion of one of the tragedies, and found it so moral and just that a way was paved towards a reconciliation.

Boileau and Racine, being appointed historiographers to the king, were obliged to follow him in his Flanders' campaign. M. de Cavoy, wishing to divert the king with the ignorance of the two great men on common things, came to Racine the evening before the setting out of the expedition, and asked him were his horses contract-shod. "Contract-shod!" said he, "what do you mean?" "O, I'm surprised at your ignorance. There are so few opportunities of getting our beasts well shod on these expeditions that we are obliged before we set out to get contract-smiths to put such shoes on the beasts as will endure a half-year without being renewed. Has not Boileau told you about it?" "Not a word; that man never looks after what is needful." Boileau comes in, is put in possession of the idea, and while they are in search of the contract-smiths the king and the court enjoy the rich joke.

The same wag woke up Racine one night as they were on the journey, but filling his face with as much trouble as it would hold, he forebore to tell his business till the awakened man became frightened. At last, when his patience was about to snap, he cried out, "Ah! my poor friend, you have incurred the king's deepest displeasure." "How! how! in the name of wonder?" A shake of the head followed by a pause. "Don't keep me in suspense; it is worse than the worst ill news." "Do you think you will be able to endure it?" "I'll try." "Well, then, the king said this evening, in the hearing of every one —" "What?" "That you sat your horse very ungracefully to-day." "O, if that's all, I'll venture on another nap."

ESTHER AND ATHALIE.

Madame de Maintenon, annoyed at the worldly spirit of the pieces acted by the young damsels of Saint Cyr, persuaded Racine, after his pen had remained idle for twelve years, to compose a piece in which human love should be completely ignored. He unwillingly set about it, but found in the history of Esther just the subject needed. Moreover, he had therein an opportunity of paying compliments to the king and Madame de Maintenon. That lady was an embodiment of Esther, Mme. de Montespan of Queen Vasthi, Louis of Assuerus, and Louvois of Haman.

As Madame de Maintenon had the education of her young ladies so much at heart, Esther was allowed some Jewish orphans not particularized in the Sacred Book to patronize and instruct. The young ladies performed the piece before the king to the entire approbation of himself and the court. Madame de Caylus, who had only a short time before been a pupil, after witnessing a rehearsal, was seized with such a desire of performing that the poet wrote a prologue expressly for her. All the allusions were well understood and relished, and the living personages beheld themselves with much complacency in the Biblical tableau. Among the spectators at the first performance were the ex-king and queen of England, James II. and Mary of Modena. When the piece was printed and presented to the people in the public theatre it was far from exciting the same enthusiasm.

Athalie was intended to be performed by the same young ladies about the end of 1690, but Mme. de Maintenon, probably reflecting on the inconvenience of her young and beautiful pupils exhibiting their talents before an assembly of the highest in the land, few of whom were of pure morals, also that the performance was more likely to encourage vain and worldly aspirations than pious sentiments in the young actresses, cut short the scenic representations. However, as the rehearsals were made, she had the piece presented before the king at Versailles, but without decorations or costumes. His Majesty was highly delighted, and at once conferred the dignity of Gentleman of the Bedchamber on the author.

When the play was printed it made little impression on the public. Some Parisians being at the time on a visit at a chateau, were amusing themselves at forfeits, and the punishment inflicted on one unlucky person was the perusal of the first act of Athalie in a separate chamber. He protested against the severity of the infliction, but was obliged to submit. He did not make his appearance at the time expected, nor till he had read with the greatest interest the drama entire. He spoke of it in such terms that the whole party assembled to hear him read it next day. An entire revolution of opinion was the result. Racine always considered Phédre his masterpiece, Boileau preferred Athalie.

In 1702 the tragedy was represented in the court of Versailles, the Duchess of Burgundy taking the part of Josabeth, the Duke of Orleans presenting Abner, the Lady President of Chailly Athalie, the Count d'Esparre Joas, and M. de Chaperon Zacharias. The tragedy was honored with three court representations, but the outer Parisian world still remained cold. In 1716, by the Regent's orders, it was at last fairly put on the stage, and obtained the success it deserved. Some circumstances of the time added interest to the subject matter. Louis XV. was then at the age of Joas, and was the last preserved scion of a numerous stock, and the following passages were seized and warmly applauded:—

"Behold then your King, your only hope,
I have watched over him to preserve him for you."

"Of the faithful David he is the dear representative."

"Reflect that in this child all Israel lives."

THE POET'S LAST YEARS.

The history which Racine was ordered to write was little to his taste. He dreaded to be judged guilty of flattery or ingratitude, whichever way he handled his subject. It has not remained to our time, having perished in a fire. Valancourt, the guardian of the MS., cried out that he would give twenty louis to the rescuer, and a poor Savoyard rushed into the flames. Alas! he only brought out a bundle of the "Gazette de France."

Racine's organization was too finely put together for his happiness. Mme. de Maintenon, wishing to do something towards the amelioration of the condition of the people, rendered miserable by the pride, pomp, and circumstance of the Court of the Great Louis, and his expensive wars, induced the poet to draw up a memorial to meet the eye of the king. He, discovering the author, was so offended that he never after showed him the slightest countenance. The poet appearing at Versailles during the period of his disgrace, the king passed close to him without notice or speech. His death is supposed to have been hastened by this loss of Louis's friendship. Ah, why did he not reflect on the blessings of a good wife and good children still remaining with him! His death occurred in 1699 at the age of sixty.

The evil side of our poet's character presented little more than a too great sensitiveness to criticism, and a tendency to punish it by biting satire, for he was extremely caustic. Boileau, being once blamed for his bitterness, answered, "Racine is much worse." Racine's allusions to Corneille are by no means just nor kind. Many papers of his were burned by his people after his death on account of their severity to then living persons. In reparation of these defects he was (especially after his last secular tragedy) sincerely pious, a good father, a good husband, and a sincere friend. In person he was of the middle size, and his countenance had an agreeable, frank, and cheerful expression. He understood Greek so well, and was naturally so eloquent, that he once kept a company wrapped in the deepest attention while he read from the original Greek, the Œdipus Tyrannus, giving it out in glowing French.

Racine was gifted with a thorough knowledge of the workings and the expression of the passions, a sustained elegance of diction, truth of sentiment, and admirable correctness. There was little declamation (considering him as a French poet), but throughout, the language of true feeling. He possessed a facility of versification, harmony, and poetic grace in the highest degree. In these gifts he excelled Corneille himself, standing in somewhat the same relation to him as Pope did to Dryden. We exhort any of our readers who has mastered Telemaque, but is not yet reconciled to the jog-trot march of French verse, to take up any of Racine's tragedies, and, ignoring the defect just mentioned, get through the first act, he will, if a person of taste, require no persuasion to proceed to the end.

Owing to his disagreeable reminiscences connected with the theatre, he took no care to have a correct edition of his works published during his lifetime. The early issues abound in mistakes, but as his language has not yet, nor is likely to become obsolete, no more than the English of Pope or Addison, the loss to literature is trifling. Editors of good taste have fixed the existing text.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE pearl fishery in Scotland is a failure this year.

THE Austrian government proposes an annual tax on pianos.

M. DE LAMARTINE's coupé was recently sold in Paris for sixty dollars.

ONCE A WEEK has changed hands, given up its illustrations, and dropped its editor, Mr. Dallas.

THE well-known firm of Breitkopf and Härtel have just celebrated at Leipzig the completion of their five thousandth piano.

A LIFE of Miss Austen the novelist, and the Memoirs of Miss Mitford are among the latest books announced as in press.

It is reported that either Dr. Doran or Mr. J. C. Jeaffreson will succeed Mr. Hepworth Dixon in the editorial chair of the Athenæum.

THE Indian Daily News states that two enterprising native females have applied to the registrar of the Calcutta University for admission into the entrance examination.

Mlle. ROSA BONHEUR is living near Fontainebleau, where she keeps her studio. Her brother, Auguste Bonheur, who lives in Paris, is also a successful painter of animals.

THE Rev. Charles Kingsley is to preside over the Education department of the Social Science Association at the forthcoming Congress to be held at Bristol in September and October.

THE Parisians will lose their darling, M. Capoul, awhile, if it be true that Mr. Strakosch has engaged him for a tour in the United States. La France Musicale says, pathetically, "Espérons qu'il n'en sera rien."

Mlle. DÉJAZET has at length determined to take her farewell of the stage, which she has graced for so long a period as the memory of the oldest playgoer extends. Her last appearance will be in a play by M. Sardou.

GUSTAVE DORÉ and Blanchard Jerrold have been making a systematic exploration of London, from Wapping to Kensington, among high and low, with a view to a work on the great capital. It is said that Doré has made a most interesting collection of studies.

MADRID has lately been favored with a hail-storm of great violence. Many of the hailstones were as large as hens' eggs, and weighed as much as three ounces each. The trees were greatly injured, and vegetation suffered severely. An immense quantity of glass in greenhouses and windows was broken. In many places the telegraph wires were destroyed, and the railways at various points inundated and greatly damaged.

Dr. GEDGE, of Caius College, Cambridge, late assistant to Professor Humphry, is about to follow Sir Samuel Baker into Africa as head of the medical staff, as well as to investigate the natural history of the district and collect specimens for the Viceroy of Egypt.

MME. RISTORI's appearance at Rio de Janeiro as Medea has been followed by her performance of Maria Stuarda and La Pia. The Emperor has been present at each representation. A poem in honor of the actress was on one occasion recited, the Emperor and the entire audience standing uncovered during its delivery.

MONSIEUR LESSEPS, not content with the laurels he will have earned by the successful completion of the Suez canal, is ready with a new project for cutting through the Isthmus of Corinth, which, if carried into effect, will shorten the journey from Marseilles to Constantinople by fourteen hours, and that from Trieste to the same town by twenty hours.

THE Musical World says that at a concert lately given by the Auckland Choral Society to the officers of the fleet, his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh took part as "first fiddle." In the opening piece he played with Colonel Balneavis and the other violinists. The Duke subsequently played in Mozart's "Jupiter" and other orchestral pieces. In all he is said to have acquitted himself most admirably.

AT Sierra Leone, on the west coast of Africa, there is printed a paper called the West African Herald, the entire staff—proprietor, editor, and compositors—being real natives. Amongst the names of the agents who receive subscriptions, and supply papers, is the following: At Winnebah, Henry Ahquah, King of Winnebah. His sable majesty is also agent for the same paper for the Gomooah district.

THE Diary, Reminiscences, and Letters of Henry Crabb Robinson, and Mr. Forster's Life of Walter Savage Landor are two of the most important biographies that have been issued from the English press for many years. Both works have been made the subjects of elaborate papers in all the leading reviews, and are regarded as choice additions to what is permanent in English literature. The volumes of Crabb Robinson are a mine of literary anecdote and illustration.

ACCORDING to the Journal des Connaissances Medicales, M. V. Esaling, with the help of a microscope, has been making some disagreeable discoveries respecting milk. If the surface of fresh cream be examined under the lens, there is to be found, amid myriads of milky and fatty globules, a number of either round or oblong corpuscles, sometimes accompanied with finely clotted matter, being just what is seen in most substances in a state of decay. In summer these corpuscles make their appearance within fifteen or twenty-four hours after milking; in winter they will be perceptible after the lapse of two or three days. If the observation be continued until the moment of coagulation, these corpuscles are seen to increase in number, bud, form ramified chains, and at length to be transformed into regular mushrooms or filaments composed of cells placed end to end in simple series, and supporting at their extremities a spherical knob filled with granulous matter. M. V. Esaling thinks they may be classified among the ascophora, and that many of the gastric affections to which children are liable are owing to this state of the milk. All this must be very unpleasant for people in the country whose misfortune it is to get pure milk and cream, but to city folks, whose milk is a more artificial composition, it does not so much matter.

A GOVERNMENT agent attended at the Palais de Justice, Paris, some days since, to receive numbers of the Lanterne and other condemned publications. Of the former there were about 160,000 copies, filling forty-two sacks. Formerly articles of this description were pounded in a large iron mortar, but at present the proceeding is much more simple. The agent takes the whole to a paper-factory, where, under his inspection, they are thrown into a caldron of boiling water and reduced to pulp, then passed under a wheel cylinder, whence the matter issues in the form of cardboard.

THERE really is nothing new under the sun. The paddle-wheel for boats is seen on the Assyrian slabs, and in more than one old European fresco. The bicycle seems to have been known in China more than two centuries ago, and the velocipede was probably seen even before that in Europe. Among the ancient painted glass in and about the once noble church at Stoke Pogis may be seen the representation of a young fellow who is astride the mute but active horse: he is working his way along with the air of a rider who has introduced a novelty, and is being looked at by admiring spectators. It is one of the most curious illustrations of ancient times in the painted glass windows of this interesting church.

MRS. STOWE's last novel is having great success in England. The London Morning Post says: "We do not remember to have seen the author more in her element than in these volumes. They have all her playful humor, her marked individuality, and her sympathy with whatever is kindly and good." The Literary Churchman considers it "a novel of great power and beauty, and something more than a mere novel." "We rarely get hold of so sensible and well written a work," says the Examiner, "and might fill our columns with gems taken from these pages: but as that would not after all give any correct notion of the work in its entirety, we can only commend it to all who are capable of appreciating a thoughtful work where exciting interest is made subservient to solid reasoning, and where every chapter yields something that may teach as well as amuse."

MR. GREENWOOD's "Seven Curses of London," published simultaneously in this country and in England, is thus spoken of by the last number of the London Athenæum:—

"Proclaiming by his title that he speaks of curses and has little to say of blessings, Mr. Greenwood prefaces his collection of essays with a table of contents which shows that the evils to which he draws attention are the results of criminal propensities, bad legislation, and the thoughtlessness, which is more productive than heartlessness, of sin and the fruits of sin. The doings and experiences of neglected children, professional thieves, habitual mendicants, unchaste women, persistent drunkards, and betting gamblers, are the topics which he takes under consideration. After describing the ills that flow from the action of our immoral classes, and from our scandalous disregard of the claims of helpless infancy, he concludes his book of homilies with two shrewd and thoughtful chapters on the consequences of misdirected and wasteful charity.

That the volume contains pictures as stirring and forcible as the sketches by which Mr. Greenwood first rendered himself famous, we cannot say; but together with a mass of clearly digested facts, that will afford no less of assistance to the social reformer than of entertainment to the curious investigator of the condition of the London poor, "The Seven Curses of London" comprises not a little writing in which sympathy for distress is not more conspicuous than humorous suggestiveness."

THE Spectator thinks Australian loyalty is clearly genuine, since it stands the money test in its most extreme form. The Melbourne Argus, a most respectable paper, the first in Victoria, announces that the Duke of Edinburgh's club bill for cigars and wine, being left unpaid, was discharged by a colonist, while his bill from the furrier and jeweller for presents to his friends, being also left, was paid out of funds voted by the Colonial Parliament. Moreover, a motion is to be made in the Legislature to repay to Great Britain the sum of £8,400 voted in the estimates of this year for the presents distributed by the Prince, and a return asked for of the more valuable presents made to him. The colonists are not kind in the comments they make on the Prince's forgetfulness, but still they cash up, and clearly that is with royalty, as with commonalty, the main point. "O peuple Français!" said the elder Mirabeau, "corvéable et taillable à miséricorde."

ADVERTISING is carried to a great excess in Paris; and yet such a thing as a newspaper with a couple of pages of advertisements is altogether unknown. The man who conceived the idea of the little kiosques on the boulevards, in which newspapers are now sold, but which were originally erected solely for the purpose of displaying advertisements on their glass panes, received a small fortune from the company who carried out his suggestion, and who, nevertheless, pay their shareholders something like a dividend of 20 per cent. It is the success of this speculation that has, no doubt, induced a company to buy up the drop-scenes of certain Paris theatres, which no longer display handsome tableaux in which some of the best known characters of the French stage are represented, but, in lieu of these, are covered with announcements of the merits of the Lait antiphélique, the Chocolat Perron, the Eau de Melisse des Carmes, Machines à coudre silencieuses, the Toile-Cataplasme, the Vinaigre Balsamique, Vélocipèdes irréversibles, the Insecticide Vicat, the Moutarde Bordin, and the other thousand and one advertisements that have fatigued the eyes of Parisians for years.

CONSUL MARKHAM, in his official report to the English Government, gives an entertaining account of his visit to Kiu-foo, the city of Confucius. Mr. Markham states that Kiu-foo is a city of no importance, but it may be called the historical city of China. Here Confucius was educated, lived, taught, and finally died and was buried. His birthplace, a cave, is in the Ne-shan Hills, some twenty li to the northeast. His representative, a Kungyih, or Duke of the Empire, dwells in the city, the whole of the north and west of which is taken up with the grounds of the ducal palace and temple to Confucius, spacious and splendidly wooded. The temple is a building on a far more magnificent scale than any Mr. Markham saw in China. Here are numerous relics of the sage, some of the bronze censers, &c. bearing date B. C. 2300. The city has a population of about 25,000, which is composed chiefly of descendants of Confucius, eight out of ten families bearing his surname. The office of Che-shien or magistrate is hereditary in the family, as are also the official appointments. When the rebels occupied the surrounding country they spared the city of mandarins, declaring that they only wished to destroy the unjust and corrupt rulers, but that Confucius's descendants could not be so. Except the fact of so many families bearing the sage's surname, which requires some little explanation, nothing could be more satisfactory, and it would be well for some of the rising generation if, instead of making books on the turf, they were to take a leaf out of the book of Confucius, who, we may be sure, never saw the face of a bailiff in Kiu-foo, and whose bronze censers, &c. were never profaned by the auctioneer's hammer, like some people's family plate and racing cups in these degenerate days. Tsin-hsien, the city of Mencius, is similarly dedicated to the memory of that sage; he has a fine temple, and his descendants are pensioned by the State.

DR. FAVROT, celebrated as a ladies' doctor, has just died in Paris. The Gaulois asserts that so great was his reputation that ladies of high rank used to consult him masked. At Etretat, whither he was summoned for a consultation, he was beset by a little old man, the type of a malade imaginaire, who offered him a fabulous sum if he would live with him as his private physician. Dr. Favrot peremptorily refused the offer, but the little old man expressed such unfeigned despair at the prospect of being separated from him that the doctor permitted him to follow him about in the capacity of courrier. Thus, wherever Dr. Favrot went he appealed to "Jacques" to know if he had telegraphed for rooms at hotels, whether dinner had been duly ordered, &c.; in reply to which the little old man invariably pleaded the state of his health in excuse for the omission of his self-imposed duties. "Ah, you remember, Jacques, our agreement; each time you speak of your health, one guinea! No use talking to me about your will. Dr. Declat lost the fortune the Duke de Grammont Caderousse left to him, bequests from the sick to their physicians being illegal in France." The little old man instantly and invariably took out a guinea, in spite of which the doctor resorted to every possible stratagem to get rid of him. Once, whilst travelling, he met two of his colleagues; to them he related his misfortune, and induced them to assist him in his dilemma. Accordingly, Dr. Favrot summoned them to consultation on his patient. They were unanimous in pronouncing his health perfect, and congratulated him on there being no further necessity for the continuance of his erratic life in company with Dr. Favrot. The little old man handed his new advisers their fees, and bowed them out of his room. The doctor, having on the previous evening taken leave of his patient, stole on foot from the hotel at an unearthly hour, in order to start by the earliest train. On the steps of the railway terminus sat, awaiting his arrival, the little old man. "Ah, you thought to escape me; but here I am, as ill as ever, and I have taken my ticket to accompany you."

MR. HARDCASTLE'S FRIENDLY ATTENTIONS, AND WHAT CAME OF THEM.

I. BEWILDERMENT AT BRIGHTON.

"If the gentleman who found the lady's glove at the ball of the —th Dragoon Guards at Brighton on Wednesday last will be at the Zoölogical Gardens in London on Sunday next, he may hear of something to his advantage."

The Southdown Reporter and Devil's Dyke Free Press, in which the above advertisement was contained, fell from the hands of a gentleman who was reading that enterprising print in the coffee-room of a hotel in the town first referred to, — the Sybarite Hotel, facing the sea. I suppose it was the advertisement that caused the surprise, not to say emotion, which evidently possessed him. It could not be the attack upon the Mayor, nor the denunciation of the Town Council, nor the exposure of the Gas Company, nor the clever article upon the dearth of local amusements, nor the pleasant reference to "Our Autumn Visitors," nor the eulogistic review of "Our talented fellow-townsmen's" volume of poems, nor even the facetious letters about ladies' bonnets and high-heeled boots. Yes, it must have been the advertisement.

There is one thing that a man is sure to do when an announcement in a newspaper exercises upon him such an effect that he drops the newspaper upon the floor. The odds are at least Lombard Street to a China orange that he picks the newspaper up and reads the announcement again. The gentleman in question adopted this inevitable course of action; and while he is engaged in mastering the interesting paragraph, and making his reflections thereupon, I will tell you who he was and all I knew about him up to this period of his career.

You could see for yourself, as he sat in the bow-window in the twilight, with the broad sheet spread before him, that he was a gentleman, in the conventional sense of the term; that he was a well-made, manly looking fellow of unmistakably military cut, with a leisurely expression of countenance suggestive of the fact that he need be in no hurry to assert his good looks, as they were sufficient to assert themselves; and if he kept curling that long tawny mustache round his thumb and finger you might be sure that it was an action caused by nervous anxiety rather than by any thought of improving that appendage. If you guessed his age to be somewhere between twenty and thirty you would not be mistaken; and if you made a bet that he was the and a captain of light dragoons on leave from India, you would win your bet beyond all chance of dispute.

But you would never suppose, unless you happened to know, what a troubled life Harry Doncaster was leading. Money had never been the strong point of his family, at least during the last two generations. His brother the Viscount had not much, and what he had he wanted, — for viscounts must have money, of course, come what may. His family set Harry up in the cavalry, — he took a great deal of setting up, by the way, though he got his promotion by luck, — and he inherited some private means from his mother. But in reference to the latter he made the not uncommon mistake of confounding capital with income; and the original sum, after several abortive settlements in life, refused at last to be made the sport of an unscrupulous check-book, and disappeared indignantly below the financial horizon. After this pecuniary crisis Harry Doncaster, as far as any additions to his pay were concerned, was supported, like the hospitals, by voluntary contributions. But the voluntary system was no substitute for an establishment in his case; and in a thorough state of disendowment, without edifices, glebes, or any consolation of the kind, he found himself in a state which he described as "dependent on the generosity of my family, who refuse to give me anything." Then he began to borrow, which was crisis the second in his career. He began by merely overdrawn with his agents; and Cox, it must be said for that obliging firm, allowed him a considerable fling. But there is a point when even Cox loses patience; and Harry Doncaster, when he found his pay looking very small in perspective, compared with the massive foreground, of liability, did not relish the effect of the picture, and squared up with Cox by a great convulsive effort. It was then that he took to borrowing in a direct manner, and came to crisis the second, as I have said. Now crisis the second would not much matter; but it is very apt to lead to crisis the third when borrowing becomes so difficult as to approach the confines of impossibility.

And to this gloomy boundary, I regret to say, Harry Doncaster had arrived at the period in question. He did not know, as he declared, how to turn himself round, and performed the process only, like the scorpion girt by financial fire, the circle narrowing with every successive sun. He began serious borrowing in India, — that gorgeous land which has the fatal gift of credit in a bewildering degree, — and where the trail of the ser-of Bengal to the rose-gardens of Cashmere. He had a few debts in England at the time. He thought they would not matter; but they did. And he soon found that the process which follows non-payment in the one country is much the same as the process which follows non-payment in the other; the principal difference being that in India you are arrested by a baillif in a looser pair of trousers. On coming home upon leave he made another discovery, — that Eastern impecuniosity is a tree of hardy growth, and will bear transplanting to the West with considerable success. It was with a profound conviction of this important truth that he began serious borrowing in his native land; and for a time his native land treated him with her well-known liberality in the way of advances, and equally well-known consideration with regard to their return. But there is a time for all things, and that for payment comes with remarkable punctuality, and when it really means business is apt to be a difficult customer. This is just what Harry Doncaster is beginning to discover when we find him at the Brighton hotel conning over the advertisement. He has exhausted worlds of leave, and will have to imagine new if he wants much more of it. But he dares not return to his regiment under present circumstances, and remaining in England seems equally out of the question. He has an idea that the interior of Africa would be a proper part of the world for his future sojourn; but a recent event has made him reluctant to turn his back upon the land of his youth; and the latter feeling, I fancy, has some connection with the advertisement.

Were I to follow the example of many misguided novelists I should represent Harry Doncaster, at this juncture, as soliloquizing aloud, and giving a summary of his past life and present prospects, with a statement of the nature of the question which occupies his attention, for the benefit of anybody who might happen to be listening. But people never do this in real life; and, confining myself to facts, I shall simply mention that a few muttered words escape him to this effect;

"Must be meant for me, — will risk it, — can't come to any grief on a Sunday."

And with the newspaper still in his hand he rises, with the intention of making for the fireplace, by the side of which is the only bell-handle he happens to call to mind, though there are half a dozen about the room. But he pauses in the act, for there is a stranger sitting with his back to the bell-handle, finishing his dinner in a leisurely manner; and it is evident that Harry Doncaster cannot get to the bell without disturbing the stranger. The two have been taking their respective repasts a few paces apart. Each has been well aware of the presence of the other, but each has ignored the other's existence, as in conventional duty bound, — a very proper arrangement, by the way, in a public room, which ought to be a private room to anybody who pleases to make it so.

Having an object in so doing, Harry Doncaster considers himself warranted in addressing the stranger, which he does by asking him to ring the bell.

There are various ways of asking a man to ring a bell, and Harry's, upon this occasion, was a little unceremonious, — unintentionally so. But the stranger obeyed the mandate, and had evidently no intention of ordering the other stranger's carriage, as the rough gentleman who inhabited Brighton did with Mr. Brummell under similar circumstances; for before the waiter could obey the summons he remarked to Captain Doncaster, —

"It is not the first time that I have obeyed your orders."

"Indeed," said Harry; "I don't remember that you have served with me."

"No, but I have served things for you at Harrow; don't you remember your fag, Jack Shorncliffe?"

"Of course I do, and I am very glad to see you again, but should not have known you, you're so altered." Mr. Shorncliffe, as he now appeared, was a person of small stature, particularly neatly and compactly built, with a face that was particularly neat and compact also, and the same character belonged to his hirsute adornments. He had a very keen eye, and was very decided in speech and manner.

"Well, you don't expect me to look such a fool as I was then," said he. "I knew you at once; saw you the night before last at the Plungers' ball, but could n't speak to you, — always with some girl."

"You mean you were."

"Yes, of course; you seemed to be mooning about doing nothing."

"And what are you doing yourself, in another sense? You were going into the service, but I never heard of you, or noticed your name in Hart?"

"No; the paternity changed his mind about me. He made the discovery that at least nine out of ten of our immediate family who have gone into the army have punctually come to grief and are at the present time head over ears in debt."

Harry could not deny that there are officers in the army in such a predicament.

"So he put me in his bank instead, where I am a partner, — awfully rich, — want a few hundreds, eh?"

Harry started at the question, — jestingly put as it was, — for he was by no means used to such pleasant inquiries. For a moment he felt a fiendish temptation, but he restrained himself. The thing would never do; at any rate, it would be premature at the present time. Mr. Shorncliffe abruptly returned to the subject of the ball.

"I saw who you were looking after there, — the unknown enchantress with the pompous papa. Did you find out who they were? I couldn't. Governor must be an alderman, I suspect: they came from London, that was all I could pick up."

Harry Doncaster looked a little confused, but he answered, carelessly, —

"Ah! I know the people you mean, but I did not find out their names. Of course I admired the lady, like everybody else."

"Superb creature," pursued Mr. Shorncliffe. "It would be invidious to particularize where all is perfection, as puffing critics say in the papers; but I think her great points are her eyes and shoulders, — it would be difficult to say which are the brightest of the two."

Harry Doncaster pretended to laugh at this criticism, but did not half like it. Jack Shorncliffe proceeded, —

"I suspect her eyes are too blue to be very bright by day; but there is no mistake about her shoulders. Alabaster is a ridiculous comparison. There are no complexions like alabaster, and I should be very sorry if there were: her shoulders are simply like ivory, and the elephant tribe ought to be much obliged to me for the comparison."

Harry was getting angry by this time, but he refrained from any manifestation which might betray his secret (you know as well as I do that he had a secret), or, still worse, make him appear ridiculous. The subject of conversation, too, was pleasant to him upon any terms, so he allowed Shorncliffe to proceed.

"I should like very much to know who found her glove," pursued that gentleman. "I know that she lost one, for a man who saw her leaving the ball said she turned round to look for it while stepping into her carriage, and that the governor said, 'O, it does n't matter, you are close at home.' You have seen the advertisement in the paper, of course. Ah! you have the paper in your hand."

Harry Doncaster, at the commencement of this colloquy, had taken his seat at Shorncliffe's table, and had brought the South Down Reporter and Devil's Dyke Free Press with him, for the simple reason that he did not think of laying it down. However, there was no betrayal involved, and Harry simply said that he had seen the advertisement, adding, what was strictly true, that he was as much mystified by it as his companion.

But I am sorry to say that the matter did not end here. The two gentlemen spent the evening together, as well as that process could be performed in the absence of private engagements; that is to say, they walked out upon the new pier, and returned at ten o'clock or so to the hotel, where they were both staying. During their walk the conversation had not fallen upon the lady of the lost glove, but it did so when they returned, and Jack Shorncliffe, growing confidential, avowed himself an ardent admirer of the lady, whose acquaintance, he said, he was determined to make. The family lived in London, he knew, and if nobody would introduce him he would introduce himself. He was possessed, he added, of "a genial audacity which might be mistaken for cheek," that never failed in such cases. This was not at all pleasant to Harry Doncaster; but he could not help remembering that one stranger has as much right to be in love with a lady as another stranger. When, however, Jack Shorncliffe grew bold over his not unqualified seltzer, and began to express his admiration in a similar strain to that in which he had previously indulged, Harry remonstrated, somewhat to the speaker's astonishment,—

"Why, the lady is nothing to you?" said Shorncliffe, inquiringly.

"I am not sure," replied Harry. And then, I regret to say, he was weak enough to own the state of his own feelings, and, what was worse, to acknowledge himself as the finder of the glove, which article he produced from his breast-pocket in proof of the assertion.

Mr. Shorncliffe was very far from relishing this revelation, and the pair presently found one another's society not quite so pleasant as it had been before. They discovered, in fact, that sitting up was a bore, and determined to go to bed. Harry Doncaster was the first to leave. He did not go to bed, but went out for another walk by the sea.

When he returned to his room he felt in the breast-pocket of his coat, remembering that it would not be well for its contents to come under the notice of his servant in the morning.

The glove was gone!

II. WHAT HAPPENED AT THE ZOÖLOGICAL GARDENS.

Sunday at the Zoölogical. The season is drawing to a close, but the day is one of the fullest that there has been since its beginning. Everybody is there; but that is not saying enough. There are all the necessary nobodies to keep the everybodies in countenance, and save them from staring at one another like idiots. There is even a Royal Prince and a Royal Princess, and these illustrious personages actually seem to like being present, for nobody bores them with intrusive attentions.

The day is one of the finest as well as one of the fullest of the season, and the one fact, I suppose, accounts considerably for the other. It has doubtless influenced the toilets, which are lighter and airier than ever, as far as the ladies are concerned; and what wonderful coiffures these same ladies wear! Coiffures seem to reach their culminating point at the Zoölogical; go anywhere afterwards and you always notice a declension.

There is nothing to do, of course, at the Zoölogical after you have been to see some of your favorite animals. There are always a few of these in fashion, and you "do" these rigorously. This object accomplished, you concentrate your attention upon trying to get chairs, a pleasing pursuit which passes away an hour very well. As everybody tries to get chairs, I suppose they are the unsuccessful candidates who walk about; and it is well that somebody should so disport themselves, otherwise sitting would be comparatively dull work.

An elderly gentleman, to whom I wish to call your attention, has been foraging for seats ever since he entered the gardens. He has not regarded the chase, like more philosophical persons, as an incidental piece of amusement, and has been actually out of temper at the delay. But see, he has at last brought down his game, and comes upon the grass with a chair in each hand; and his satisfaction is complete when, on joining two ladies who form his party, he finds that one of them has found a seat for herself. As he also is thus saved from standing you might suppose that he would begin to be amiable. But he does nothing of the kind. He dislikes the place and the people also, and, as he says, does n't care who knows it. A more insane way of passing the afternoon he cannot conceive, and he expresses his dissatisfaction in audible terms. He is a portly person with a pink face, dresses scrupulously in black, with a white cravat of a previous period of society, and a big diamond brooch in the bosom of his shirt which "would buy half Northumberland," if half Northumberland happened to be for sale. Both his pink face and his portliness are appearances in his favor. Neither is too pronounced, and both draw that nice line between prosperity and apoplexy which one always rejoices to see in elderly gentlemen.

Of the two ladies one is evidently his wife and the other apparently his daughter.

His wife is tall, stately, and reserved; grandly rather than gayly dressed, like many courtly persons of her period in life whom one meets in the exclusive circles of Madame Tussaud,—persons whose manners have considerably more than the repose which stamps the caste of Vere de Vere; for so little influenced are they by vulgar emotion that a condescending inclination of the head, or a haughty turn of that appendage upon their aristocratic shoulders are all the signs they deign to make of taking the smallest interest in their fellow-creatures.

The lady in question has evidently modelled herself upon one of these courtly dames. You can see at a glance that her ideas of good-breeding are entirely of a negative character; and without overhearing any family conversations you may be sure that she tells her daughter not to do this and not to do that, because great people never do anything of the kind, neglecting, of course, to add what it is that great people do do, and in what respects the nature of their activity differs from that of little people.

Her daughter, ah! her daughter is very different. You have heard some account of her in the artless criticism of Mr. Shorncliffe; for—there need be no mystery in the matter—she is indeed the unknown enchantress of the Plungers' ball! But Mr. Shorncliffe, with all his enthusiasm and powers of description, did nothing like justice to her loveliness, which in its general character was like that of a lolling lily, if you can fancy a lolling lily with an aggressive abundance of chestnut hair and eyes the color of the corn-flower. She has, as Mr. Shorncliffe observed, an ivory delicacy of surface; but that gentleman forgot to mention the pale coral tints that gave it relief. I am bound to admit also, on my own account, that I have never beheld a lily, lolling or otherwise, arrayed to such purpose in pale blue. It was Solomon in all his glory and the lily combined.

But it will save trouble to tell you at once who these people are.

Mr. Surbiton is principally known for having made a great deal of money. It is a very good reputation to have, and will carry its subject a considerable way into society. It is not quite understood how the money had been made, except, I suppose, by Mr. Surbiton's old and more immediate friends; but he is supposed to have begun in a very small way and ended in a very large way, and being now retired he is, of course, in no way at all. But do not suppose that people in general care in what particular line of business the money had been made, and very few would trouble themselves on the subject but for Mrs. Surbiton's horror at any hint of her husband having been in trade, which makes her friends laugh occasionally, and of course tends to keep the fact before their eyes.

Two thirds of her life, I should think, are passed in trying to conceal what she considers this family disgrace, and, as far as any degree of success is concerned, she might as well proclaim it periodically from the house-tops. Her main object at the present time is to effect an aristocratic alliance with her daughter. That young lady, by the way, is happily uninfluenced by the peculiarities of her parents. Being no more than seventeen or eighteen years of age, she is not able to remember the humbler state of the family, and having been educated away from home she is unaffected by any of its traditions.

Scarcely have Mr. and Mrs. Surbiton and their daughter taken possession of their chairs than they are joined by a gentleman, a stranger, who addresses himself to the head of the family in a manner indicative of some special errand.

But I must here leave them to note a scene which is enacting in another part of the gardens.

Harry Doncaster has been two or three times up and down that long walk where the walkers seem to congregate for the amusement of the people in chairs. He has performed the process with some impatience, having an object in view apart from being stared at. But his glances right and left are evidently not rewarded by the sight of some persons of whom he seems to be in quest, and after mingling for a few minutes with the crowd on the grass he turns away as if for the purpose of being alone. His mood is plainly not a pleasant one, and he seems preoccupied to an extent incompatible with enjoyment of the Zoölogical. So he sits under a tree and has an interview with himself,—a very unsatisfactory interview, I should say, judging from his frowns and occasional ejaculations. It would end in a violent quarrel, I have no doubt, but for a diversion caused by the appearance of a stranger.

Harry Doncaster, being rather slender in figure than otherwise, did not occupy the entire seven or eight feet of the bench upon which he had chosen to rest; so the stranger availed himself of the vacant accommodation. This stranger was one of the most agreeable persons you ever beheld. He was not a fat man, but he was certainly a plump man, with a beaming, radiant presence, confirmed by his face, which was so happy and healthy, smiling and benevolent, as to be irresistibly attractive. A sanguine complexion and sandy hair may have had something to do with the prevailing effect, but the genial nature of the stranger shone especially in his eyes.

Harry Doncaster, preoccupied though he was, could not avoid notice of these characteristics; so when the stranger spoke to him he did not resent the intrusion, but showed himself to be favorably impressed.

"You do not remember me, Captain Doncaster?" said the stranger.

"No doubt you do not; you were a small boy when we used to meet. But I was well acquainted with your father, the late viscount,—was, I may say, his friend, and had the pleasure of obliging him in many ways. Always happy to do it, too, having the greatest respect for him and his family. Besides, it's always better to make friends than enemies, and every man has it in his power to do some good in his generation if he only has his heart in the right place."

Harry Doncaster was charmed to hear such generous sentiments, and professed some hereditary gratitude for the services rendered to his father, not that he knew their nature, but he guessed that they might have been of a pecuniary character.

"You do remember my name, I dare say," pursued his obliging neighbor,— "Matthew Hardcastle."

Harry Doncaster thought he remembered it,—was not sure,—yes, he certainly,—it seemed familiar to him,—he must have heard it at home when he was young.

"Ah! I thought you had not forgotten my name, at any rate," said Mr. Hardcastle, with a pleasant chuckle; "and now let me tell you why I have recalled myself to your recollection. Frankly, I wish to render you a service. There is too little sympathy in this world between man and man; we ought all to do more for one another than we do; the curse of the world is selfishness."

"My dear sir," said Harry Doncaster, "it is charming to hear you express such noble sentiments, but I am not aware in what manner you can do me a service. I am full of troubles, but they are of a nature very difficult to provide for, and a stranger —”

“Not a stranger,” interrupted Mr. Hardcastle, taking Harry's hand and grasping it with much warmth; “say a friend. It is indeed in my power to render you a service, and fortunately it is not necessary to test my friendliness by any sacrifice on my own part. The service I am able to render you will cost me nothing. On the contrary, I shall be a gainer by conferring an obligation in another quarter, not a pecuniary obligation of course. What I mean is that I shall gain the lasting gratitude of the family of one of my oldest friends, and that is payment to me enough. Nobody ever said that Matt Hardcastle ever did a good action only for money, though that perhaps is no merit of mine. I don't know what I might have done had I been poor, and we must always be charitable to the errors of needy men. Happily I have always been beyond the reach of temptation.”

“You puzzle me,” said Captain Doncaster, who thought that his new friend would indeed be a clever fellow if he could do anything for him. But he remembered that he had read of equally wonderful things in the “Arabian Nights' Entertainments.”

“Now let me be frank with you,” Mr. Hardcastle continued. “I know your position at the present moment to be one of great embarrassment. I know that you have for years past spent a great deal more than your income. You have had expectations, doubtless, and were justified in so doing; but these expectations have not been realized as yet, and you have no time to wait for them. I know that besides a — if I may so call it — somewhat reckless personal expenditure, pardonable in a young man of family belonging to an expensive regiment, you have been unfortunate in horses and have dropped a little at cards. You have met debts of honor by contracting legal obligations. There are some of them considerably over due, and unless — in the immortal words of our friend Micawber — ‘something turns up’ for you, you may be considered in the light of a ruined man.”

Harry was obliged to own that this was but too faithful a picture of his state and prospects in life; but he expressed some surprise that Mr. Hardcastle should have arrived at so accurate a knowledge of his condition.

“Never mind how I came to know it,” said that gentleman, in his most genial manner; “I know a great many things about a great many people that they little suspect. The fact is that I have rather a specialty for doing friendly offices for people in my humble way, and such cases reach my ears sooner than they reach those of most men. Now there is only one way of extricating yourself from your difficulties, and that one way is — marriage.”

Harry Doncaster was deeply disappointed at the nature of the remedy proposed. As if he had never thought of it before! Why, it is the first idea that occurs to every spendthrift who is hard pressed. Harry did not avow this contemptuous opinion, however, but contented himself with saying, —

“I am much obliged, my dear sir, for your suggestion, and I must confess it had occurred to me before. But there has always been this difficulty in the way. I have a prejudice against marrying a woman I don't like, and I have hitherto been unable to combine the necessary conditions. When I have liked, or fancied that I have liked, a girl, she has always turned out to be without a penny, and richer than myself only through having no debts.

On the other hand, women with fortunes sufficiently large to enable them to take me, debts and all, have always been objectionable persons one way or another, besides being mostly cads. Indeed, women in my own rank of life are not to be had under the conditions, and I have never found any with money enough whom I cared even to ask. I am not very particular about grade, but in any grade I have always met with the same difficulty. As for selling myself entirely for the benefit of my creditors, I have not quite arrived at that pitch of heroism. Of the two I prefer the creditors to the kind of wife I could get, — they may ruin me, but they cannot force me to suffer my ruin in their society.”

“An attachment already formed, eh? Excuse me, — I am an older man than you, — for asking the question. It is so, I see by your face. No doubt it does you honor, and so do all the sentiments you have expressed. It is something strange to meet with the finer feelings in a man who has passed through your career. But supposing that I could assist you with the object of your choice?”

“My dear sir, I have not told you that I have any choice, and I repeat —”

“Now, my dear friend, don't make a stranger of me, who only wish to oblige you. It is just possible that your choice — or shall I call it your fancy? — is but a few days old.”

“You are certainly determined, Mr. Hardcastle, to know as much as I know myself.”

“It is not improbable that you never yet spoke to the lady?”

“Mr. Hardcastle, I —”

“That you do not even know her name?”

“That you never saw her but once, — at a ball?”

“Well you evidently know something about it,” said Harry Doncaster, his first instinct of resentment appeased as he found his obliging friend really as well informed as he pretended to be.

“Supposing, then, as I have said, I could introduce you to the lady in question?”

“You would indeed please me, but I know not to what it could lead. To tell you the truth, I came here on purpose to see her; but even had I seen her I should scarcely have ventured to introduce myself, for I have no right to suppose that either she or her family desired to meet me, and the only excuse I had for intruding I have somehow lost.”

“You have lost the glove, then?”

“And you know about the glove!”

“Yes. I agree with you that they were not likely to advertise for such a very unimportant article, and it would certainly be strange if they advertised for you.”

“That is just what occurred to me. And you have seen the advertisement too?”

“Well, I have heard about it. But you won't want the glove if I present you myself.”

Harry Doncaster could not withstand the temptation; and in a few minutes the pair were in the midst of the promenaders, and peering in every direction among the occupants of the much-coveted chairs.

I left the Surbiton party taking their rest, and being joined by a stranger. You may guess who it was, — Mr. Shorncliffe, of course.

Mr. Shorncliffe rushed in where Captain Doncaster feared to tread; but he considered himself the lesser fool of the two on that account, and I suppose he was in the right.

Lifting his hat with a half-recognition of the ladies, this enterprising gentleman addressed himself to Mr. Surbiton, who rose from his seat with a certain air of deference; for Mr. Shorncliffe's manners were imposing — to Mr. Surbiton, at any rate.

"I have taken the liberty of intruding upon you here," said Mr. Shorncliffe, with composed audacity, "in obedience to your hint."

"My hint, sir," replied Mr. Surbiton, surprised out of politeness. "What do you mean?"

"Mean, sir! Is it possible that you have forgotten the Plungers' — the Dragoon Guards' ball at Brighton, and the advertisement in the South Down Reporter? I am the finder of the glove."

The latter communication was conveyed in a low, confidential tone, as if it bore the weight of a state secret. Poor Mr. Surbiton was sorely perplexed. As soon as he could find words to reply, he said, —

"Ball! Yes, I remember the ball, and a very dull affair it was. But what the deuce you mean by the advertisement and the glove I can't say. You must take me for somebody else, or have gone clean out of your senses."

And here the horrible idea seized upon Mr. Surbiton that he had to do with a lunatic of a dangerous kind; so, with a precautionary instinct, as creditable to him as his premeditation of action, he seized the chair upon which he had been sitting, covered himself with it, and covered the ladies with it, while awaiting a further demonstration on the other side.

The attitude was so unusual at the Zoological as to attract the attention of several bystanders; but they were well-bred persons, and did not precipitate a scene. The ladies, if not alarmed, felt very awkwardly placed, and Mrs. Surbiton told her husband in quiet, but commanding tones, to resume his seat, and hear what the gentleman had to say.

"I can assure you, sir," continued Mr. Shorncliffe, rather amused than otherwise, and speaking round the chair for the benefit of the ladies, "that I am not a madman, but am most pleasantly in my senses, and that I have intruded myself upon you simply because I supposed you desired my presence."

The explanation seemed at least reasonable, so Mr. Surbiton was persuaded to drop his defence and take his seat upon it, — a pacific movement which satisfied the bystanders that there was nothing the matter; so they moved off, and an apparently promising scandal was nipped in the bud.

"The gentleman will tell you, I dare say, if you ask him," said Mrs. Surbiton severely to her husband. "what he means by the advertisement."

"Well, what do you mean?" said Mr. Surbiton, sulkily.

"I mean the announcement which appeared on Friday in the Southdown Reporter," said Mr. Shorncliffe, taking from his pocket the paragraph in question, which he had taken the precaution to cut out.

Mr. Surbiton read the advertisement with amazement; then he handed it to Mrs. Surbiton, who read it and looked scandalized; then Mrs. Surbiton handed to Miss Surbiton, who read it, — and laughed.

The latter lady was the first to express her views on the subject.

"If it relates to us, mamma, it must be intended as a piece of fun, — though not such fun as a friend would practise upon us. I certainly dropped one of my gloves as we were going out; but nobody could suppose that we should advertise for such a thing as that; and I, at any rate, saw nobody pick it up."

"I had that honor," said Mr. Shorncliffe, not quite so assuredly as before, and addressing himself still to Mr. Surbiton, though with reference to the young lady, "and seeing the advertisement, I was naturally under the impression that — that — there was a desire to communicate with me."

"Then your impression was mistaken," said Mr. Surbiton, recovering his self-possession as he began to understand the question at issue. "We know nothing about the advertisement here; somebody has been making a fool of you."

Mr. Shorncliffe began to think that he had at least been making a fool of himself, and sincerely wished that he had left Doncaster to perform his legitimate part in the affair.

"Shall I at least perform the commission which I have so innocently undertaken, and restore —"

Mrs. Surbiton here interposed, and stopped the movement which the speaker was making towards his pocket.

"On no account, — such a proceeding could not be permitted in public, — with the eyes of the world upon us, — and nobody here requires the glove."

"If the gentleman had found the little ring I lost the same evening I should be obliged to him," said Miss Surbiton.

But Mr. Shorncliffe had unfortunately not found a ring.

"At least," said that gentleman, as he made a movement to depart, "I hope that I shall be acquitted of having taken a part in what seems to be a very silly hoax. My name — which I dare say is not unknown to Mr. Surbiton — should be some guaranty of my honorable motives."

And here Mr. Shorncliffe handed his card to the gentleman whom he addressed. The latter glanced at it, and his manner changed immediately.

"Bless me! — Mr. John Shorncliffe! Are you of the house of Grampus, Shorncliffe, and Co., of Lombard Street?"

"I am a partner in that firm."

"My bankers. Then you are at least a respectable person. My dear sir, I am very glad to see you. This business of the advertisement is evidently a mistake, — some foolery of those military coxcombs. I am very sorry that you have been imposed on. Grampus, Shorncliffe, and Co., — first-rate house, — know some of the partners. You don't know me, I dare say."

"Your name, I have no doubt, is known to me," replied Mr. Shorncliffe, with renewed confidence at the turn which the conversation had taken.

"My name is Surbiton, sir. Do you know me now? I have had an account at your bank — and, I flatter myself, never an unsatisfactory balance — for the last twenty years."

"There is no name I know better — none more honored in the firm — than yours. I am proud to make your acquaintance, Mr. Surbiton."

"And I am proud to make yours; though I must confess I thought at first you were a scoundrel."

Never mind, — mistakes will happen. And now I know who you are let me introduce you to my wife and daughter."

The wife and daughter duly acknowledged the introduction, — neither of them, however, with any unnecessary graciousness; for Mrs. Surbiton, now that her husband had retired, "did not approve of people in business," and Miss Surbiton did not find herself taking much interest in the person upon short notice. However, Shorncliffe had gained his point, and, attaching himself sagaciously to the quarter where he had made an impression, he talked "City" to Mr. Surbiton with such success as to fairly win that gentleman's heart.

The afternoon, which was young when they entered the gardens, had been middle-aged for some time past, and now showed signs of growing old. On every side people were seeking social safety in flight. Chairs, — that sure test of the Zoological market, — which had been so lately at a high premium, were now at a miserable discount. There had been no transactions in seats indeed, except in leaving them, for the last half-hour, and those comforting securities exhibited not only a downward tendency, but a rapid state of decline. I am indebted for this playful metaphor to Mr. Shorncliffe, who employed it in his conversation with Mr. Surbiton with such effect as to make that gentleman regard him as the most witty person he had ever met in the whole course of his life. Mrs. Surbiton, whose sympathies were wedded to the West End, scarcely disguised her disgust at this kind of pleasantry; while Miss Surbiton, with whom the West End was an open question, had a very small opinion of the wit, for the young lady-like reason that she did not care about the individual.

"And now, my boy," — it was my boy by this time, — said Mr. Surbiton to his new acquaintance, "you are leaving this place of course. Which way are you going? Westward, of course, — everybody goes westward. Take a seat in our carriage. You have your own? Never mind — may as well drive with us — just room — tell your man to follow — take my wife out like a good fellow."

So Mr. Shorncliffe gave his escort to Mrs. Surbiton, and Mr. Surbiton followed with his daughter.

It was at this juncture that Mr. Matthew Hardcastle and Captain the Hon. Harry Doncaster encountered the party, — just in time to be too late.

Harry was disgusted at the perfidy of his friend. "Never mind," said his genial companion; "they have not seen us, and we shall have plenty of time to give him checkmate to-morrow. If we do not castle his queen, — Hardcastle his queen I may say, ha, ha, ha! — never believe me again."

III. RIDING, DINING, AND LOVE-MAKING.

Mr. Hardcastle, who was a bachelor, — all these genial old boys are bachelors, — occupied one of the best suites of chambers in the Albany, — I will call it A 1, which it was in all respects but its local classification. Thither Captain Doncaster went to breakfast with him on the Monday morning succeeding the Sunday afternoon at the Zoological; and breakfast concluded, the pair arranged their plans for the coming campaign. These were not very elaborate, being limited to paying a visit at Mr. Surbiton's house, and enabling Harry to make what way he could with the ladies.

"There is no occasion," remarked Mr. Hardcastle, "to make the attack look premeditated, and that is why I proposed to introduce you in a public place; but nothing can be more natural than that I — an old ally of the family — should take a friend with me when I happen to call; and I should say nothing, if I were you, about the advertisement in the paper, which is not likely to have come from the Surbitons, and is most probably some joke concocted at Brighton with which they have nothing to do."

There was no end to the friendly attentions of Mr. Hardcastle. He suggested that, as they had nothing else to do after breakfast, they should have a ride in the Row; and when he found that Harry had no horse in town, he said it did not matter, he could mount him, and he did so in a most satisfactory manner, and told Harry always to consider the horse at his disposal as long as he remained in London. Harry was anxious, too, about another point. He told Mr. Hardcastle that he did not feel safe in such a public place as the Park, where he had not been for months; but his new friend told him to be quite easy on that score. "If anything happens," said he, "I will settle the thing for you; it is only for a short time that you need incur the danger. I hope very soon to see you a free man. Now no thanks; I assure you I take a selfish pleasure in obliging anybody to whom I take a liking, — it is my way."

The first person they met in the Row was a gentleman who was also fond of friendly attentions, — a gentleman in humble life who followed a pursuit not unknown in the neighborhood, — that of warning persons in Harry's predicament, with a view to half-crowns, of enemies being in the vicinity. He gave an intimation of the kind to Harry, which made that gentleman wince, especially when he heard that the enemy in question had "walked off with a swell only on Saturday, while he was riding with a lady." But Mr. Hardcastle treated the matter so lightly, and renewed his assurances of support with such evident sincerity, that Harry was soon reassured, and felt almost as free as he did on what Fielding calls "that happy day of the week when profane hands are forbidden to contaminate the shoulders of the unfortunate."

The next person they met was Miss Surbiton herself. She came upon Harry Doncaster like a vision, — only I doubt if any vision ever sat a horse half so well, or managed it with such ease and grace. A vision, I fancy, would ride more in the style of the lady in the picture advertisement, who sits sideways upon an agreeably rearing steed, holding the reins as if they were the handle of a tea-cup, while the skirt of her habit, which is about twelve feet long, meanders gracefully among the animal's legs. This was not Miss Surbiton's style you may be sure, or Harry would not have gone into such absurd raptures about her equestrian performance. He had never, too, he thought, seen anybody who looked half so well in a riding-dress, though it is perhaps the safest costume for all styles of beauty, and most styles which are not beauty for that matter.

Mr. Surbiton, who accompanied his daughter, could not ride, but he did. He pulled up upon seeing Mr. Hardcastle, and the two immediately entered into conversation upon some sordid business in which they were both concerned. Meanwhile the younger pair, having no social license to talk, felt rather in the way, until Mr. Hardcastle presently introduced his companion, and the rest was plain sailing. The party first rode abreast, and then in pairs, and after a canter or two together Harry Doncaster and Blanche Surbiton found themselves intimate friends.

Three days afterwards Captain Doncaster dined with Mr. and Mrs. Surbiton at their house in Hyde Park Gardens. Mr. Surbiton did not much care about asking him, but Mrs. Surbiton did, which was decisive. That lady never neglected an opportunity to cultivate fashionable and well-connected acquaintances; — they were such a relief, she said, from her husband's horrible City friends, — and she treated the latest on the list with great distinction, as being no more than the due of a person who was a possible viscount, — the present one being childless, — and who might — the lady had already great ideas in the way of an alliance for her daughter.

Among the guests bidden to the hospitable board of Mr. Surbiton was Mr. Shorncliffe. Harry Doncaster and he had not met since the memorable night at Brighton, and had their meeting, now taking place, been elsewhere, Harry would have quarrelled with him, for he could not doubt the means by which that gentleman had made the acquaintance of the Surbitons. It was clear that he must have dropped the glove in the coffee-room, and that Mr. Shorncliffe must have appropriated it. However, the house they were in was no place in which to settle a question of the kind; and having once let it pass, Harry thought he would say no more about it, contenting himself with the amiable revenge of making Mr. Shorncliffe particularly uncomfortable by taking no notice of him, and leaving him uncertain what kind of greeting he had to expect until the evening was wellnigh over.

Harry Doncaster indeed was far better employed; for he had Blanche Surbiton in charge at dinner, and enjoyed the lion's share of her society afterwards. Shorncliffe was powerless to interfere with this monopoly during the meal, for although placed opposite to the lady, there was a bar between them in the shape of a senseless contrivance of fruit and flowers, which, as he said afterwards, was all very well in its way, but a bore beyond bearing when it got in the way of one's observation. He could quite sympathize with the Frenchman who said that he detested the beauties of nature; and he hated the scent of roses as much as did Hood's flower-girl who associated them with so much sorrow. The object who filled his thoughts was almost shut out from his vision by these wretched representatives of grace and beauty. It was only, indeed, by a dive of a most undignified character that he could manage to address his vis-à-vis, and I need scarcely say that a remark across a dinner-table must be of a special character not always at command to warrant a process of the kind. From his proper position the young banker could obtain nothing more satisfactory than the sight of a bit of blue corsage — blue was evidently Miss Surbiton's color — and the glimpse of an occasional arm. This was the more exasperating as he was able to see and hear quite enough to know that Harry Doncaster was making his way in a triumphant manner, and thoroughly engrossing the girl's attention; while those more happily seated could place but one interpretation upon the manner in which, as she listened to or addressed her neighbor, the pink coral continually combated with the ivory of her complexion.

Poor Shorncliffe, too, had the additional mortification of being placed next to Miss Mankillen, a lady of undecided age but decided manners, arrayed for fascination in a style which ought to amount to conspiracy in law; who had no features to speak of, and thought therefore that her force lay in expression; who said the smallest things with the largest emphasis, and whenever she talked — which she always did — twisted her face into maniacal grimaces, and gave to her too agile form the contortions of a mermaid. She was called, indeed, the mermaid among the more ribald and insulting of her acquaintances; and one of these noticing the manner in which she was disporting herself towards Mr. Shorncliffe, remarked that if she carried her looking-glass and comb into connubial life, she would certainly give the most faithful reflection to her husband's least pleasant qualities, and comb his hair in a manner not contemplated by coiffeurs.

The neighbor tried to enter into her ideas of a pleasant conversation, but found himself so entirely opposed as to the required conditions that he contented himself at last by answering her at random; so they talked something in this manner: —

"You go everywhere, Mr. Shorncliffe. I have seen you at five hundred places this season."

"No, I think she is best in the 'Grande Duchesse.'"

"You are fond of dancing? I know you are."

"I prefer Patti of the two."

"Those are very beautiful flowers. I adore flowers."

"I hear that his last novel is a failure."

"Are you going to the Zoölogical next Sunday?"

"Yes. I heard her twice at Vienna, before she came here."

And so forth. But the worst of it — for Mr. Shorncliffe — was that the lady did not feel offended, but came to the conclusion that her neighbor was a little deaf, and that it was a well-bred thing to humor him.

It was a desperately long dinner; for Mr. Surbiton inclined to massive hospitalities, and thought there could never be enough of a good thing. But it came to an end, as even desperately long dinners must do; and when the ladies had all sailed out of the room, — like a fleet of flowers, — the gentlemen did what gentlemen always do on such occasions, — took a little more wine, and tried to bring together the scattered elements of conversation. As for Harry Doncaster, he seemed, for the first time, aware of their presence, — so engrossed had he been with his fair neighbor, who was not only by this time mistress of his heart, but of his head also; for his brain had gained new life from her beauty, and his fancies were exhilarated as if fresh from a feast of the gods. Mr. Hardcastle, who was on the other side of the table, nodded to him as he touched his glass with his lips, and his looks said as plainly as looks can say, "I congratulate you."

Shorncliffe was first in the drawing-room, and when Doncaster entered that apartment he found him engaged in conversation with Miss Surbiton, and pretending to take tea. To what extent he would have succeeded in interesting the young lady I cannot say; for he was cruelly treated shortly afterwards by his host, who drew him away to ask his opinion upon some important question connected with the city. Harry took the opportunity to slip into the vacant chair, and was once more master of the situation.

How they got there — by what pretence, and at whose suggestion — I know not; but in a few minutes the pair were miles away (drawing-room measure) in the conservatory.

There was no one near; and you may be sure that both were conscious of the fact. Miss Surbiton, indeed, so far appreciated it as to take the opportunity of asking a question which she would not have liked to ask with a chance of being heard.

"Pray excuse me, Captain Doncaster, for asking you; but where did you get that little turquoise ring you wear on your watch-guard?"

"Originally," answered Harry, "by the prosaic process of buying it, if I remember rightly; but how I came by it lately is more than I can tell. I thought I had given it away years ago. It seems, however, that I have been wearing it, for some little time, at least, next to my heart, for my servant found it in the side pocket of a coat. How it came there is a mystery to me, but I remember it as being my former property."

"You were at the Dragoon Guards' ball at Brighton last week, — I know you were, — I saw you there. It was there that I lost the ring. It must have come off with my glove, which I dropped going out."

A light broke in upon Harry Doncaster.

"I was an idiot," said he, "not to have connected the two circumstances before. It was I who found the glove. You were in the carriage, and had driven off before I could return it."

"You found the glove? I thought it was Mr. Shorncliffe. He brought it back very unnecessarily, and made a great fuss about it at the Zoological Gardens on Sunday. He was a stranger to us then, though it seems that papa banks with him."

"The fact is, I lost the glove by accident, and Mr. Shorncliffe appropriated it; but the ring, which I had not observed, was not then in it, and must have fallen out previously, and remained where I originally placed the glove. I ought to have quarrelled with Mr. Shorncliffe for his share in the proceeding, but have determined to forgive him in consideration of the temptation. His object was to use the glove for the purpose of getting an introduction to its owner."

The pink coral gained a decided advantage over the ivory as Harry said these words.

"I consider his conduct highly impertinent," said the lady; "but it does not alter my opinion of him, for I did not like him from the first."

"I will at any rate restore the ring," said Harry, disengaging it from his chain, and placing it in its owner's hand.

Blanche Surbiton looked curiously at her companion as she received the ornament.

"Have you any recollection," she asked, quietly, "of the person to whom you gave it so long ago?"

"I remember her perfectly as she was then; but it is ten years since, — just before I went into the service and to India, — and she was then a little girl. Can it be that —"

And Harry paused to examine the possibility which suggested itself.

"She was a child of seven or eight years of age, and you gave the ring to her upon the beach at Brighton," said Miss Surbiton, decidedly. "She had ventured out a little too far, looking for seaweed, and had stayed upon a piece of rock until the tide — then coming in — surrounded her. She was in great danger, for she was too frightened to help herself. You were walking upon the beach at the time, waded through the surf, and carried her on shore. She was nearly fainting; you were very kind to her, — revived and soothed her, — and ultimately gave her back to her servant, who had been talking to a soldier and came up at the last moment. On leaving the child you placed this little ring upon her finger, and she has always worn it since in remembrance of her deliverer."

"I remember every incident you mention," said Harry; "and now that you bring the child to my mind I can recall her face in your own. But time makes great changes in young ladies who are not grown up."

And here Harry Doncaster made an obvious remark or two about the influence of time being sometimes of a favorable character, which brought the pink coral to the surface again. Then he asked a question in his turn —

"Did you recognize me?"

"Immediately. At the ball I thought your face familiar to me, and soon remembered where we had met. You have changed very little, — scarcely at all, indeed."

Harry did not ask — and I dare say did not care — whether the tendency in his case had been favorable or otherwise; and the lady was not sufficiently gushing to volunteer the information. That the discovery of their old acquaintance gave pleasure to them both was easy to be seen; and when Mr. Shorncliffe — by the merest accident, of course — came presently into the conservatory, even that very assured gentleman arrived at the conviction that he was no welcome addition to the party.

IV. WHOM SHALL SHE MARRY?

"But how can I, as a man of honor, misrepresent my position, and conceal the fact of all these awful debts?"

Harry Doncaster asked this question of Mr. Hardcastle at breakfast next morning in the Albany, where, by the special desire of the occupier of A 1, the young officer had taken up his temporary quarters.

"As for your want of property, — which will not be always a want, for you must have some one of these days, even if your brother marries, and you do not get the title and estates, — I don't see that you need feel any embarrassment. Nothing can be more fair than a match of the kind. There is birth and position on the one side, there is money on the other. The Surbiton family, I am sure, will be charmed with the alliance. Your debts are awkward, of course; but a great many of them are of a kind which no man ought to pay in full if he can avoid it. If you will authorize me to arrange with the rascals, I will undertake to manage them, to make a compromise as to amount, and give you time besides; and moreover, I will explain the whole matter to Mr. Surbiton, who has the highest regard for me as a friend and a man of business, and will, I am sure, act upon my advice."

Harry was enchanted at the idea of such a satisfactory settlement, and threw his scruples to the winds. Mr. Hardcastle's generous proffers touched him to the heart; it would be foolish and ungrateful to refuse them. The result was that Harry placed himself entirely in the hands of his new friend, and thought how happy the world might be if friends of the kind were more common.

Released from sordid cares, Harry Doncaster could venture to declare his love. Indeed, to tell the truth, he had gone a great way in that direction on the previous evening while in the conservatory, and he was in no want of an opportunity for meeting Blanche Surbiton again, for he had learned that she intended to ride in the Row that morning, accompanied only, servant excepted, by Miss Mankillen. So Harry, mounted as before by Mr. Hardcastle, went into the Row also, and there the two met, quite by accident of course, and Miss Mankillen, not being the kind of person to ride with a lady if she could get a man instead, did not trouble them long with her company, a fact upon which I suspect Blanche Surbiton had calculated when she asked her to go.

Harry and Blanche, — you will excuse my familiarity with the young lady, — after seeing Miss Mankillen inflict herself upon a nervous gentleman who was riding for his health, and was too weak to make resistance, took a canter together, which had the effect of leaving everybody behind, and then walked their horses and began to talk as people do when they have a great deal to say and know not how soon they may be disturbed.

It was Harry who took the initiative in this decided course of action, and, resuming the conversation from the point at which it had broken off in the conservatory, made such rapid progress that he arrived at the "momentous question" with a celerity that surprised himself, to say nothing of his companion. However, he had not mistaken his ground, that was clear, and before anybody came up to talk to them, Harry had not only extracted as favorable an answer as a lady is likely to give who is agitated and has a horse to manage, but extorted a confession that for ten years past the childish fancy that mingled with her gratitude had been a sunny memory of her life, which had been lit up with the hope of meeting its object once more. So when they rejoined Miss Mankillen, or rather when Miss Mankillen rejoined them, they both looked so happy as to be decided objects of suspicion; indeed the pink coral in Blanche's face was sufficient evidence for conviction in any court of justice.

That afternoon, when Mr. Surbiton returned home, — although retired from business he haunted the City upon various pretences, — Mrs. Surbiton made to him an important communication, — that Captain the Hon. Harry Doncaster had made an offer for their daughter's hand. Mr. Surbiton's answer, I am sorry to say, was coarse. He said "Rubbish." But it was not rubbish for all that, and Mrs. Surbiton assured him that the match was one of which she highly approved, the connection was so good and would give them such an influential place in society, especially if her daughter should become a viscountess, of which there seemed every chance. The lady, in fact, was for accepting at once, and, what was more, celebrating the marriage as soon as possible to prevent accidents.

But Mr. Surbiton, strange to say, did not seem to see the advantage, especially compared with another offer which had been made to him in the City for the hand of the same young lady. This, it appeared, was from no less a person than Mr. Shorncliffe, who had formally asked for his consent in the event of his obtaining that of the lady. The worthy gentleman respectfully but firmly avowed his preference for the moneyed suitor. "What is rank to us?" he said; "I am a self-made man, and everybody knows it. With the money I can give to Blanche, and that which Shorncliffe has, their position will be second to nobody's. We don't want empty handles to names, and to be hanging on to poor, proud families that will scarcely own us. I like to have the sinews of war that I have always relied on, not the gold lace and the gloss, that nobody cares about if they can get the other thing." Mrs. Surbiton could not conceal her disgust at this commercial view of the question, and intimated to her husband, though in more polite and prosaic phrase, that however he might, on account of his wealth, have inherited some of the flowers of a social Eden, the trail of the City was over them all, and that she was ashamed of his mean way of looking at the position.

The position, indeed, was a very awkward one, for the harmony of the family, between whose heads nothing could more confidently be expected than a right royal row. But Mr. Surbiton had a fortunate preference for peace and quietness, and an idea occurred to him.

"I tell you what it is, my dear," said he; "it is of no use for us to quarrel about this business. People are never good judges of their own affairs. It is always better that they should take counsel's opinion, and I know of no man whose opinion I would rather take than that of Hardcastle. I have known him for these thirty years; he has always been my friend, and I have always found his advice put money in my pocket, and if by following it I have put some into his own, that is only fair. He is a clear-headed man of the world, and I promise you, if you agree, that I will be guided by his decision."

Mrs. Surbiton did not directly make her election; but on the following morning, after a careful consideration of Mr. Hardcastle's character, and the peculiar circumstances of the case, — the lady had considerable shrewdness and penetration, and saw into character rather more deeply than her husband, — she consented to the compact, reserving to herself mentally the right of playing false if the decision went against her. It was a reservation which I cannot defend, but I am only recording facts, and perhaps I have no right to expose the aberrations of so respectable a lady. So Mr. Hardcastle was bidden to a private dinner, and the two gentlemen had a long discussion on the subject after the ladies had gone up stairs.

The result may be soon told. Mr. Surbiton put the case to his friend as one in which it was impossible for them to have a difference of opinion, and he made it a question, he added, only for the sake of peace and quietness, that is to say, to please his wife. Mr. Hardcastle at first seemed to agree with him entirely, and then proceeded to urge, with an adroitness for which he was remarkable, a long series of qualifications, the upshot of which was that he ranged himself unreservedly upon the side of the wife, and advised his old and valued friend so strongly in favor of the Doncaster alliance that the old and valued friend was fairly carried off his feet. Mr. Hardcastle said a great deal about the young lady's preference, of which he was well aware, and the duty of parents — he was solemn and pathetic upon this subject — to forward the happiness of their children irrespective of sordid considerations. Mr. Surbiton, although an affectionate father in his own way, was not greatly impressed by these arguments; but when Mr. Hardcastle dwelt upon the advantage given to capital by connection, and showed how, for the highest aspirations of finance, social position was indispensable, Mr. Surbiton was visibly moved. And finally, remembering how he had for thirty years followed his old and valued friend's advice with advantage, — which advice he could not consider otherwise than disinterested, though the old and valued friend had always made something by it himself, — he decided to take it in the present instance.

"But the young man has no money" (Shorncliffe had told him that) urged Mr. Surbiton, as a last appeal; "and he has debts."

"That is quite true," replied Mr. Hardcastle, in his most smiling manner, and treating the question as if it were a mere bagatelle. "But you cannot give your daughter less than twenty thousand pounds down, whoever marries her, besides the fortune you leave her in your will; and that will be sufficient for them — and his pay is something remember — until he comes into money of his own, even if he does not get the title and estates, which he will in all probability. As for his debts, they are not very serious, and I shall be able to arrange for them. Leave that matter in my hands. I should add, by the way, that the twenty thousand pounds ought to be unfettered, — and I really think that the alliance is cheap at the price."

So Mr. Surbiton yielded, and the only uncomfortable feeling that he had when he rose from the table was the triumph that his compliance would give to his wife. He felt small, in fact, as a family man.

The marriage of Captain the Hon. Harry Doncaster with Blanche, daughter of John Surbiton, Esq. was duly celebrated at St. George's, Hanover Square. It was announced in the papers as a marriage in high life, and already the Surbitons felt themselves a part of the peerage.

V. AFTER THE HONEYMOON.

Never did bride and bridegroom return from their wedding tour more happy than did Harry and Blanche. It was then that their troubles were destined to begin.

A country seat of the viscount's had been placed at their disposal until they made arrangements of their own; and on the third morning after their arrival, when they were seated at breakfast envying nobody in the world, a letter arrived from Harry's solicitor. It announced that his creditors had all proceeded against him to the utmost extremity, — to executions, in fact, in every case, for the full amount of the several debts, and that he must immediately pay a sum of something over nineteen thousand pounds.

I need not say how hard the blow was to bear. But it was certainly harder when they learned that Mr. Hardcastle, the disinterested ally of Harry, and the old and valued friend of Mr. Surbiton, held all Harry's bills, and indeed every debt that the young officer had incurred, — obligations which that friend of humanity had been able to buy up, at a time when Harry's fortunes looked desperate, at a remarkably low figure. There was no help for it now. Harry had twenty thousand pounds — just a little dipped into — by right of his wife, and had to pay every farthing.

I need not say what Mr. Surbiton said; indeed, I should be sorry to repeat his language, even in a Latin note. The old and valued friend had been too much for him after all, and had made a profit of, I dare say, nine tenths of the nineteen thousand what the viscount said, and how he threatened to marry, and, as Harry had already lost so much, cut him off from all compensatory prospects. I need only record actual events. Mr. Surbiton would not give another farthing, though, to do him justice, he did not talk about altering his will; so there was nothing for it — as far as Harry was concerned — but to accommodate himself to his new condition of life. He sold his commission in the first place, — realizing its full value, as there were no claims upon him, — and with the sum thus obtained, he was able to go into the country and live in a quiet way while waiting for happier times.

His only consolation was in the devotion of his wife. Blanche did not care at all for their loss of the great world, and she made their little world perhaps pleasanter than it would have been had it been great. She would rather, she continually declared, — and she was a very veracious young lady, — be the wife of Harry without a sixpence, than have accepted Mr. Shorncliffe's offer with all its substantial advantages. And, as events turned out, it appeared that she would have been justified, even financially, in her choice; for a commercial crisis came, and Mr. Shorncliffe's bank broke, and left that gentleman considerably worse off than Harry himself. It was particularly unlucky, too, that by the breaking of the great house of Grampus, Shorncliffe, and Co., Mr. Surbiton lost another great slice of his splendid fortune. In fact, he came down greatly in the world, and had to remove from Hyde Park Gardens to the comparative obscurity of Notting Hill. This was a great source of satisfaction to Mr. Hardcastle, who moralized a great deal upon his friend's incautious disposition of his money, and claimed to have been his benefactor to the extent of twenty thousand pounds by having saved that sum out of the fire. "It would all have gone," said that disinterested gentleman, "if I had left it in his hands; he never had a knowledge of business, and all the money he made I made for him. But human nature is frail, and even my old friend Surbiton is ungrateful."

Mrs. Surbiton still had things her own way with her husband. His losses, she maintained, were all caused by his trusting to those commercial people; and, after all, the Doncaster alliance gave them dignity even in their reduced circumstances. Her husband did not see it; but he had learned the wisdom of silence when his wife pronounced. Mr. Shorncliffe, it should be recorded, was equal to the occasion. After casting about for a little time, he cast himself into the arms of Miss Mankillen, who was very much obliged to him, and repaired his shattered fortunes with her money, of which she had a considerable amount. It must be said for that lady that she was not mercenary, and had an abstract reverence for a man. I have not heard whether she makes the prophesied use of the mirror and the comb; but it is certain that Mr. Shorncliffe has lost the audacity which formerly distinguished him, and is a sadder, if not a wiser man.

As for Harry and Blanche, they vegetated for a considerable time, until expectations began to be realizations; and, at last, the title and estate — the latter not large but sufficient for their dignity — came to them, and then they began to live again. They were very happy throughout their troubles, and are very happy now. They are not proud, and they delight in nothing more than to talk about their impecunious days.

to politics, and it will be hard if his wife's social influence, and beauty combined, do not get him at least an under-secretaryship of state one of these days. Meanwhile, they are so contented, that, while carefully cutting him off from their acquaintance, they feel a secret sentiment of gratitude towards Mr. Hardcastle; for, after all, they say, it was he who brought them together by putting the advertisement into the South Down Reporter, and luring Harry into the pleasant meshes of matrimony.

ORIGINALITY.

THERE is at any rate this reason for pretty frequently discussing the subject of originality, that we are thus led repeatedly over the field of mental operations, and brought face to face with the weakness of the human intellect no less than with its strength. Whether such a thing as originality exists at all among men is a question which will depend chiefly upon the precise meaning which the word is allowed to convey. If originality is to signify absolute initiation of what is essentially new, — in science, in art, in action, in reflection, in method, in application, — there would seem to be a tolerably strong case against believing such a thing to be, or ever to have been since the first germs of human thought began to move in distant prehistoric ages. The germs quickened apace, and the intellectual debts from man to man accumulated so fast that originality became lost in antiquity. It is easy to carry this line of argument too far, but it involves some interesting reflections by the way.

There is in this sense, for example, — the sense of absolutely independent initiation, — no such thing traceable as national originality. No nation can lay an absolute claim to have initiated anything for mankind with complete independence. If any nation in remote antiquity could pretend to such an achievement, that nation would have been the Phœnicians. They were the first metallurgists. They had a brilliant genius for navigation and trade. They introduced the letters of the alphabet into Europe. But they were not original. The most recent critics pronounce them to have had a powerfully receptive nature; to have imbibed largely from earlier and more Oriental peoples; to have been keen and rapid assimilators. They were thus the great middlemen between east and west. They transferred thought admirably, but they did not originate. Many ages later there rose into prominence another nation which could apparently urge pretensions to originality as strong as any made on behalf of the Phœnicians, if not a great deal stronger. But the Arabians, with all their wonderful rapidity and muscularity of intellect, were the hierophants only, and not the oracle. They were the skilful and industrious exponents of science between ancient Greece and modern Europe, but they were not the prime originators of thought unborn before.

But were the Greeks themselves not original? In reply, it must be borne in mind that ethnology and the science of language illustrate more and more clearly, as they advance, the close bonds of connection that subsisted from time immemorial, — in intellectual as well as in other departments, — between Greece and the Oriental world. Still, to answer this question adequately, or rather to give the kind of answer which should come from the point of view thus far taken about originality, we must disregard entire communities or races, and look at individuals. If it were desired to base Greek pretensions to absolute originality on as firm a foundation as possible, it would not be an unwise decision to rest them upon Socrates. He is the recognized founder of ethical science; yet what does this import after all?

It means that he turned the lantern of inquiry supplied by the earlier physical philosophers in upon himself, and recognized there "the proper study of mankind." This was an innovation most important in its results, but in its essence it was not a very marvellous step to take. As to the great dialectical Elenchus, the conception of negative argument, — of upsetting a disputant and reducing him ad absurdum, without setting about any positive reconstruction in place of the demolished theory, — this was probably borrowed from Parmenides and Zeno. And the fundamental maxim of all the aims of Socrates, the ethical mainspring "Know thyself," was got from the Temple at Delphi.

If Socrates is not allowed to be original, the pretensions of Aristotle must be less imposing still. In a certain sense, it is true, he was the father of a new method. Mr. Lewes cannot praise him enough for having asserted the predominance of fact over all attempts at theological explanations. But to have originated the method of Aristotle in the fourth century B. C. was a less thing than to have originated the method of Socrates in the fifth. As an individual man, Aristotle had seen more and travelled more widely than Socrates. And the world had travelled on also. The development of the Macedonian influence was telling powerfully upon the Greeks, and they had become more completely familiarized with the manners and the thoughts both of the East and the West. The advocates of non-originality would go on to remind us that Homer himself was but a Triton among the Cyclic minnows, or else they would preach the separatist theory of the Homeric Poems, and deny the existence (for their production) of any one supreme poet at all. They would urge home every passage in the dramatists that points to Oriental legends and modes of thought, and would describe the friezes of the Parthenon as brilliant expansions of ideas suggested by earlier Eastern originals.

If pressed on the point of Shakespeare's original power, the disbeliever in originality pure and simple will run over a list of Shakespearian "sources," and remind you of Cinthio's Hecatommithi, Plutarch, Holinshed, "older plays on the same subject," and what not. And there can be no more favorable opportunity than this for suggesting and supporting a different, and a more rational, view of what originality is. The most incontestable evidence of the sovereignty of Shakespeare's genius is to be found in those parts of his works where he has seemed to borrow most. Compare his dramatic result with the chronicle or the "Italian original," and the magic spell of creative power is felt with rare distinctness. Originality is here seen in its true aspect. It is found to be, what it always has been since men have been able to note it and reflect upon it, not an isolated act of bare initiation, but an act or process of adaptation or moulding so perfect as to resemble a new creation, and in fact to be one. The creative feat is then most impressive when the unworked or partially moulded materials have lain about in greatest abundance, awaiting the viola vis that makes them live and move.

To glance backward for a moment with this altered light on the subject of original intellectual force, we shall be inclined to think that Aristotle was, after all, a man of supreme originality. We shall recollect more readily that the difficulty of creating, at that early date, any scientific method deserving the name is very easily criticised and talked about, but is with the utmost difficulty conceived. And we shall find that not by the arts of a usurper nor by a stroke of fortune did Aristotle rise to the intellectual throne occupied by him through so many subsequent ages. As for Socrates, our homage may be even more complete. We shall be prepared to admit that, in all ages, and certainly not least in the fifth century B. C., to have given a new direction to philosophy is, in the truest sense, to have originated thought. And we shall understand something of that gigantic mental vitality that turned the curt injunction of the Delphian temple into a completely new idea of scientific treatment. About poets we shall ask, not whether they have written things absolutely new, but in what degree they have vitalized the materials which are common to us all. And, not to run over the countless fields of mental operation, we shall abstain from injustice even towards the much maligned but most useful race of critics, nor think that the genius even of lesser men than Bentley and Porson and Lachmann has been employed simply and solely in the task of dishing up —

"What Gellius and Stobæus hashed before."

The essence of originality, then, is not that it shall find out new material, or even necessarily new combinations of material, but that it shall impart new life to whatever it discovers or combines, whether of new or old. It is sometimes a forming, it is always an in-forming, spirit. This definition, or description, of originality will be found sufficiently elastic to suggest all necessary limits and guaranties. The much vexed question of dramatic originality is set at rest by it. Thus, however injurious it may be that one nation should be very largely dependent on another for the prime materials of its current drama, especially when neither nation is aiming very high in that division of art, yet it is clear that adapted plays may individually show originality now as truly (though no doubt in a different manner and degree) as the similar process showed it in Shakespeare's time. The same definition would seem also to guaranty originality against an uncritical and unwise attempt to narrow it. Originality, in creative art as well as in science, may be of method not less than of subject-matter.

It is thus a rather ungenerous thing to depreciate the genius of a poet who, like Mr. Tennyson, has devoted himself scrupulously and laboriously to method and style of composition, only because some other poets, whether of the past or the present, have seemed to strike deeper and more directly at the bases of thought. Not to go minutely into the question there is at any rate this to be said, that, even without immediate reference to his subject-matter, which can be left to stand on its own merits, by virtue of style and manner alone Mr. Tennyson has succeeded in originating a very powerful intellectual influence over an entire generation. If he has carefully restricted his aims, and abstained from wandering for that hap-hazard over promiscuous fields of thought and emotion and sensation, he need not, according to this view of originality, be refused the credit of being original at all, or have that credit docked and lopped by a niggardly and purblind criticism. Even if by no deeper intellectual force he had made thought and fancy live, he has by style and manner alone conveyed to it a fresh vitality which has of itself been a generative power. Even translations, and imitations in the manner of Pope, may show proof of originality. Pope himself exhibits the extremes of merit and demerit. He is sometimes, as in the Imitations of Horace, genuine and original; and sometimes, as in the "versified" rendering of Donne's Satires, very amusingly the reverse. Two books of more recent years — the Odyssey by Worsley, and the Republic by Davies and Vaughan — are examples of how much native force may be thrown into the work of translation.

The causes that tend to diminish original power, whether in the nation or the individual, are faulty education, a distracted mode of life, and too rapid production. Education simple and sound in quality, and not forced or hurried, is the most favorable prime condition of independence and vitality of intellect. If that can be followed up by a life tolerably free from the feverish intellectual desire to be encyclopædic, and from the two common excesses of social occupation or anxiety, so much the better. Entanglement in these two kinds of malaise has stifled a vast amount of genuine original power.

It may be gathered from what has been said that originality and genius are here regarded as synonymous terms. This would not be a true inference. Genius, when it works at all, will for the most part be original according to the definition. Except under very unfavorable conditions, is must and will impart new vitality to whatever it works upon. But originality may be recognized on lower levels than those to which the name of genius is rightly confined. The terms are therefore cognate, but not coextensive. Genius involves originative power, but originality does not necessarily imply the presence of genius. Ingenuity (a word formed by a curious twist, — it should be "ingeniosity") is in common usage nearly the same thing as originality, but with the implied idea, perhaps, of a tendency to narrowness and mere dexterity in operation.

TOURIST GIRLS OF THE PERIOD.

WE met, — 't was in a crowd, — that is to say it was in a boat, and very inconveniently crowded that wherry was. Two of the Messageries steamers had just come into Marseilles: one from Naples (she was a passenger in that argosy), the other from Algiers. I had shipped myself on board that ship. There was the usual maritime "block" at the Quai de la Joliette; and, the Indian mail being just on the point of going out, we experienced the usual difficulty in getting in; at least the Marseilles boatmen, who are as thorough-paced rascals as their congeners of Vera Cruz, and not half so picturesque, were unanimously of opinion that it was impossible for us to land at the Custom-house save by the means of a boat and the expenditure of two francs fifty per head, the distance to be traversed being about twenty yards of muddy water. So, after our respective vessels had amicably ground the paint off each other's sides for some twenty minutes, an arrangement was concluded with a maritime varlet in a striped nightcap, and seventeen pilgrims from Naples were hustled into an unsightly craft with fifteen wayfarers from Africa, the entire "embarkation" being calculated to hold with comfort about a dozen persons. Then, with the usual flood of bad language in Provençal patois and corrupted Catalan from the boatmen, they shoved off towards the quay. The scoundrels! I love sailors and their ways; but I do most cordially detest boatmen all the world over, from the "jolly young watermen" of Chelsea Reach to the mahogany-faced Indians in blanket coats, who paddle you in birch-bark canoes across the St. Lawrence, and demand extra cents under pretence of the peril of "snags" near shore. "Silent rows the songless gondolier" in Venice, but he can speak the language of extortion in prose very loudly and very fluently; and, for the most flagitious sample of a daughter of the horseleech command me to a corpulent German vraum, who condescends to ferry you across a stream in Pomerania when floods are rife, and who, resting on her oars in mid-stream, declares that she won't pull another stroke under eight additional silbergroschen.

We met, 't was in a crowd, and I thought she would shun me; for, if the truth must be told, I had breakfasted at five o'clock that morning — it was now eight — on perhaps the nastiest and most evil-smelling Algerine cigar ever turned out of a government tobacco manufactory. But she did n't shun me, and was quite affable and conversational. Pointing to the white muslin veil encircling my dusty wide-awake, and the ends of which floated over my shoulders, she said, inquiringly, "India?"

I hastened to inform her that I had only come from the Desert of Sahara, and apologized for my involuntary resemblance to the Prophet of Khorasan with his veil up; for the days I speak of were long anterior to those of Wimbledon, and long before cads, commissionaires, cabmen, and clerks to attorneys in John Street, Bedford Row, took to sporting puggrees.

"You need n't apologize," she remarked graciously; "I have seen puggrees on the pier at Jersey in October."

I was half reassured and half discouraged by this observation, for there was a touch of satire in it; and I own that I am nervous in the presence of satirical girls. How very seldom you find a schoolmaster marrying a schoolmistress. I think that she suspected my uneasiness, and adroitly changed the conversation, saying that she liked Brittany better than Jersey, qualifying the ancient Armorica by the epithet "jolly." "And then," she added, "there's Carnac. The Eleven Thousand Virgins all in stone, like ninepins. Such fun!" Why, when she mentioned those mysterious Druidical remains, did the thought occur to me that she was just the kind of girl to play leapfrog over the stones of Carnac?

"You see that bundle of rugs," she went on, "in the stern-sheets. That's my lady's-maid. Her name's Bockles: is n't it a droll one? She was sent with me from Naples to take care of me; but the poor thing's been dreadfully ill, and wanted one of the sailors to throw her overboard in the harbor of Porto Ferrijo. I've left Pa and Ma at Naples. They're coming home by the Mont Cenis route, they're so awfully afraid of the sea. I prefer the steamer, because there's the rigging, you know, so nice" (what is there nice about a ship's rigging?), "and my uncle Hugh's to meet me at Marseilles to take me to Paris. And then I'm going to school."

If she had told me that she was on her way home to command the Second Life Guards, I should have been infinitely less astonished. What on earth did she want to go to school for? She must have been at least nineteen; tall and shapely, and as straight as an arrow, with an abundance of golden hair — her own, I will go bail — floating in a mutinous manner over her neck. Any further allusion to her personal charms, which were as numerous as the sands of the sea, I forego; for the reason that I have not yet ceased to be susceptible, and that way madness lies. The bare idea, however, of this fairest of creatures being immured in a dingy pensionnat in the Avenue Marigny or at the Porte Maillot, — of her being made to wear a black calico pinafore with a bib, — of her being subjected to the despotism of cross old governesses continually beginning harangues with "Mademoiselle, voici la troisième fois que je vous défends" — of her being made to listen to snuffy professors while they prosed about the proscription of Sylla and the banishment of Aristides: all this so unhinged me, mentally, that I relapsed into my normal state, which is one of blatant idiocy, and asked her, feebly, how she had liked Italy.

"I adore the Alps and those dear old monks of St. Bernard," she replied; "but Italy itself I don't care about. There are no mountains except the nasty Apennines and Abruzzi, which are full of brigands, and fleas, and things. Give me Switzerland, or Savoy, or the Tyrol. You can climb them. Oh! I'm so fond of climbing."

It was then that, looking upon her with admiration not unmingled with fear, I beheld that she carried an alpenstock in her lily hand. It was a lily hand; only it struck me that it was likewise one which, when clenched, and with the aid of the extensor muscles of its forearm, could have hit out very straight indeed from the shoulder.

"You may laugh at me now," she said, seeing that I had marked her walking-staff, — and she had been laughing at me, then, about the puggree, — "for carrying an alpenstock about the Mediterranean; but I can't bear to part with the dear old thing. I've had it these four years, and it did me good service this spring, crossing the Col di Tenda."

Four years! Had she been climbing since the age of fourteen? If such were the case, it was perhaps time for her to go to school and be finished.

But our delightful colloquy was brought to an end by the arrival of the boat at the quay side. I am delighted to say that I had the opportunity of threatening to kick one of the boatmen for knocking off the corner of her portmanteau against the side of a ladder; and she repaid me with a look that has played ever since the dickens with my spinal marrow. Be still, beating heart! Stay, the heart is not situated in the midst of the dorsal vertebra. My happiness was of short duration. Her uncle Hugh was waiting for her on the Quai de la Joliette. He looked much more like her cousin Hugh than her uncle, being a thin, wiry, sunburnt man with a tawny mustache, and the back of his neck as red as a lobster. "Madras Light Cavalry," I murmured to myself. "Haughty, supercilious, never read Gibbon's 'Decline and Fall'; smokes cheroots, drinks brandy and soda, belongs to a club in St. James's Square, and is the pet of the flower-shows. Malicious upon thee, Uncle Hugh. A day may come; and, oh! if at that moment I could only have been a Pindaree warrior (there were Pindaree warriors, n'est-ce pas?), with my good scimitar and my unerring matchlock, there would have been wailing among the Madras Light Cavalry, and this round earth would have been all too small for thee and me to have dwelt together, Uncle Hugh. Her uncle — paha!"

We met — 't was in a crowd; and we parted in a crowd; she shouldering her alpenstock like the halberdier in Victor Hugo's poem. I caught one last glimpse of her on the staircase of the Grand Hôtel du Louvre et de la Paix in the Cannebière, and I noticed that she ascended the stairs two at a time. Brave girl! Of such stuff were Boadicea and Joan of Arc, and Catherine Gordon, and Madame Saqui made. I have always been a poor man; but willingly would I have mortgaged my earnings for a year to see that fair-haired heroine at Marseilles dancing on the tight-rope, with her alpenstock as a balancing-pole.

I never saw her again; but should the GIRL OF THE PERIOD MISCELLANY ever fall into her hands, she may perchance recall the fragile and slender youth with auburn locks curling like the young tendrils of the vine,* and his brow sicklied o'er with the pale east of thought, who in the year 18—, in a boat at Marseilles, asked her how she liked Italy. Perhaps she has married Hugh — stop, she could n't if he was her uncle. Perhaps she is the blooming mamma of many climbing boys. Perhaps her old passion is still strong within her, and she is toiling up Chimborazo or scaling Popocatepetl, or haply — as I heard an American lady once phrase it — shining up the White Mountains."

It is only of late years, and since the development of the pleasant "Peaks, Passes, and Glaciers" mania, that one branch of the Girl of the Period family has taken, as a special pursuit, to climbing, just as other branches have taken to private theatricals, to croquet (combined with the ensnaring of curates), to ritualism, to novel-writing, to hunting, or to betting. The Climbing Girl of the Period, as she is at present apparent, is a marked and salient type of femininity easily fixed by the artist's graphic pencil. Her drapery is preferably short, her boots preferably stout. In remote latitudes, and where the climbing work is of the roughest, she does not disdain to supplement her attire by a pair of those garments which derive their name from a sage of Manhattan, yclept Diedrich Knickerbocker, and which in hue recall the salamandrine vestments of the French Zouaves. The Queen of Spain, we all know, should have no legs; but the Climbing Girl of the Period is not in the least disposed to disavow her possession of those limbs, and is often heard to remark that "she has been on her legs since five o'clock in the morning."

The Climbing Girl rather likes freckles than otherwise. To her they are as honorable as scars to a veteran. She finds her cosmetics among the wild-flowers in the mountain gorges; her "Dew of Sahara" is distilled from cataracts and mountain rills; and she never heard of violet-powder. She is creditably broad in the chest and strong in the arms, and, upon occasion, can collar a knavish guide and threaten to hurl him over a precipice if he does not mend his ways. She despises luxury; and a breakfast of brown bread and goat's milk, a dinner of roast chamois and boiled nettletops, are to her more succulent repasts than any to be found at the weary and wiredrawn continental tables d'hôte. She does n't object to a table d'hôte, however, from a conversational point of view, since it affords her an opportunity of exchanging experiences with other Climbing Girls of the Period; ay, and sometimes with the climbing young men thereof, whom I should like much better if they were not so frequently insufferably conceited prigs. About the Climbing Girl, however, there is no nonsense, no affectation. She climbs because she likes it, because the exercise does her good; because she feels her life in every limb; and, perchance, because, if she did n't climb, she might be found writing to Bell's Life and offering, as "Pa's novice," to fight the Horsleydown Hammerer for two hundred and fifty pounds a side. One must get rid of one's exuberant animal spirits somehow. Katherine, in the play, gets rid of hers by cuffing her sister and banging her lute about her music-master's head. Aurora Floyd relieved her pent-up energies by horsewhipping her groom. Some ladies "take it out" of their children; others write furious articles in weekly reviews against their own sex. The Spanish ladies are too lazy to climb, but they are passionately fond of the edifying sports of the bull-ring. The Russian ladies cannot climb, — they leave that exercise to the bears; but they will drive a sledge along the course of a frozen river. Juvenal tells us how the Roman ladies were accustomed to indulge their fondness for athletic exercises. The girls of his period were accustomed to turn gladiators. They fenced. They draped themselves in Tyrian rugs, and anointed their limbs with oil. They covered one arm with a buckler. They wore helmets, and, with a wooden sword, they banged away at a post, until it was dented all over. We live in as vigorous but in a more decorous era. It is better to climb than to fight.

Malevolent persons — I hate malevolent persons — may insinuate that the Climbing Girl of the Period is only an adult development of the juvenile tomboy. I see so little of children that I don't know whether there are any tomboys nowadays; but I still hope that all the little girls of the period are not such monsters of vanity and impertinence as Fanfan Benoiton, or that intolerable little Cissy in Mr. Thackeray's "Lovel the Widower," or such perplexing metaphysicians as the small demoiselles in Miss Yonge's novels. When I was young, romps and tomboys abounded, even in the politest circles. They tore their frocks out of the gathers. They inked their pinafores. They destroyed the frills round their "pantalettes." They trod on old gentlemen's gouty toes, and sometimes maliciously disturbed the equilibrium of their wigs. They shod the cat with walnut-shells. They made apple-pie beds. They ran races with their brothers, and not unfrequently fought with them. Their misdeeds occasionally subjected them to that chastisement which befell the nursery heroine Gill for the offence of "laughing at Jack's disaster." They skipped; they swung; they clomb apple-trees, rifled birds' nests, and rode the colt bare-backed round the paddock. They made "cheeses" in the parlor by means of the expansion of their skirts caused by rapid gyrations. But all this was so very long ago, and I have known so many staid matrons, so many starched old maids, who in their youth were renowned as tomboys!

I very much doubt whether a daughter of Columbia often shines as a Climbing Girl. You meet shoals of young Yankee ladies, the prettiest imaginturesque supplement to their costume, they may carry an alpenstock; but they won't climb, as a rule, if they can help it. The business of a pretty Yankee Girl of the Period is to look pretty, and nothing else. She succeeds admirably in her vocation, and she sticks to it. She detests bodily exertion; until very recently, even, she has not cared much for horse exercise. She likes Switzerland because it is full, during the season, of good-looking cavaliers, fully appreciative of the merits of pretty girls. If she must needs ascend a mountain, she prefers being carried, — in the arms of an obedient and devoted swain, if convenient, or on the shoulders of a guide, if the supply of swains run short. It is not through any affectation of fine ladyism that she eschews climbing. Her forte is in her head, not in her heels. She talks admirably, — so admirably and so fluently, indeed, that more than once I have seen an active, jovial, athletic English maiden, unapproachable in her own pursuit of climbing, but not quite conversant with the more recondite passages in Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations," Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason," and Schopenhauer's "Essay on the Categorical Imperative," quite posed and "shut up" by the brilliant discourse of a Tourist Girl of the Period from New York or Massachusetts. The poor English lass listened awhile to the voluble dialectics of her transatlantic sister, and then, perhaps, shrugged her shoulders and marched off to bed, pleading fatigue after a long day's climbing as a reason for retirement. But if you happened to be in the confidence of that brave British damsel, she would probably own to you that she had been driven from the salon de conversation of the hotel by "the intolerable tongue of that Yankee girl."

As for a French lady, if you asked her if she climbed, she would probably regard you with a look of blank amazement, or inquire, "Suis-je une singe, que je dois grimper?" Climbing she leaves to monkeys and acrobats.

I imagine that the Climbing Girl of the Period must be, if not a new species, a new adaptation of femininity. For basis you must take an active, courageous English girl. Let her have plenty of health. Let her have a hearty hatred of all kind of humbug. Let her have a wholesome love of change, movement, and adventure. She should not possess a very poetical temperament. Reading Tennyson or Browning among the Alps is all very well; but reading and sentimentalizing are a mere loss of time when the Mer de Glace or the Grands Mulets are before you. Again, I don't think that the genuine Girl of the Period should be very fond of sketching. A girl may have a hearty appreciation of the beauties of nature, and yet prefer climbing a mountain to making a drawing of it. As for her keeping a diary of her travels, she may please herself in that respect; but she is usually too fatigued, after a day's alpine gymnastics, to make elaborate entries in her commonplace book, even if it be eked out by copious extracts from Murray's Guide-Book. The alpenstock is the real diary of the Climbing Girl of the Period; and as our ancestors were wont to keep their accounts by means of notched tallies, so does she preserve the record of her climbing achievements by indentations on her trusty walking-pole.

What is the "Final Cause" of the Climbing Girl of the Period? Beshrew the meticulous age which insists on a final cause for anything! "The final cause of bread," said a philosopher to me the other day, "is to be eaten." "No, sir," I retorted, "it is not. It is to be sued in the County Court by the baker." If the Climbing Girl of the Period must needs have a final cause, it is, I take it, this: "To get her neck broken by tumbling into a crevasse?" the cynic may cry: Not at all; it is to marry the Climbing Young Man of the Period when he has got rid of his conceit and his priggishness, and has settled down as tutor of Trapeze-cum-Leapington, or as a barrister-at-law and standing counsel to the Alpine Club and the German Gymnastic Society.

THE EMPEROR'S FÊTE.

BEFORE entering into a detailed account of the Emperor's fête I must remind you that the 15th of August is not only a political festivity, but a religious one, inasmuch as it is the celebration of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary, on which day true Catholics implore, according to an ancient custom, blessings upon herbs, plants, and fruits. As regards the other fête, that of the Emperor, Louis Napoleon was not the originator of it. More than 200 years ago Louis XIII. fixed upon the 15th of August as the day to place himself and his kingdom under the protection of the Virgin. A hundred years later, Louis XV. renewed the vow made by Louis XIII. The First Emperor, when in the full tide of his glory, also fixed upon that date for the celebration of his fête; his nephew, of course, has followed his example.

The celebration of the fête of the present sovereign opens by charity, prayers, and Te Deums, after which the public rejoicings commence, which terminate by general illuminations and fireworks.

Let us follow up the fête according to the order I have just stated. I said it was ushered in by charity; and so it is. The Emperor authorizes every poor family in France who during the course of the year have been obliged to pawn articles of household use, such as blankets, sheets, clothing, &c., to redeem these pledges gratis. He furthermore issues orders to every mayor in France to deliver to the poor in every town and village a "bon," or ticket by means of which they can obtain from any pork-shop, baker, and wine merchant a certain quantity of pork, a loaf of bread, and a bottle of wine. A pleasant sight it is, I assure you, to witness the happy faces of those who, having thus made their little provision for the day, and carefully stowed it in a hand-basket, immediately repair to the Barrière du Trône or to the Place des Invalides, there to enjoy with their children a little picnic which has not cost them a penny, and await the performances which take place in the open air. Thousands of families are thus afforded the means of taking a hearty share in the festivities of the day.

The Bureaux de Bienfaisance, of which there are twenty in Paris, viz., one in every arrondissement, are also requested to afford relief to the aged, infirm, and indigent, in the form of bread, meat, and wine. More than 100,000 poor in Paris take part in these liberalities and bounties of Government. "To forgive" is also an act of charity much practised by Louis Napoleon on this his fête-day. Thus it is that he has this time commemorated the First Emperor's Centenary by a general amnesty for press offences, political misdemeanors, &c.

Charity having accomplished its work, Religion is invited to perform hers. Precisely at one, Grand Mass was celebrated at the cathedral church of Notre Dame, and a most imposing sight it was to witness the nave, choir, double aisles, and lateral chapels of this ancient edifice crowded with deputations of all the grand corps d'état, with the marshals, generals, and admirals of France, as well as by ministers and great officers of the Crown. Similar services took place at the same hour in all the other churches of the metropolis, as well as throughout the whole of the empire.

Precisely at the same hour the doors of every theatre in Paris were thrown open gratuitously to the public, and the Parisian playgoers, who had for hours been standing patiently in single file, now invaded the opera-houses and theatres of the capital. On no occasion in the year can one so well judge of the innate appreciation of the Parisians for true art. So well aware is the municipality of Paris of the keen appreciation of the working classes as regards theatrical pieces, that nothing but classical or modern chefs-d'œuvre are offered on this occasion to the "blousy" population of the faubourgs. This year, Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots" at the Grand Opera, at the Français the "Mariage de Figaro" of Beaumarchais, at the Opéra Comique "Vert, vert," at the Lyrique "Don Quichotte," "Les Rêves de Marguerite" at the Vaudeville, "Riche-lieu à Fontainebleau" at the Ambigue, "La Chatte Blanche" at the Gaité, &c. At all of these theatres a cantata in honor of the Centenary was executed by the artists. Specially remarkable was that sung at the Français, the one selected having been composed by Persuis in honor of the First Emperor's victories, and executed for the first time in 1806. Fifty of the pupils of the Conservatoire, the whole Choral Society of the children of Paris; M. Rives, the barytone laureate of the year; M. Senechal and Mlle. Lloyd, of the Théâtre Français; and Philippe, of the Conservatoire, sang this ancient cantata sixty-three years after its composition in honor of him for whom it was originally written. I give you the first chapter, which will convey a fair idea of the style of the cantatas performed at the eleven theatres, opened gratuitously:

"Amante des Français, le rapide victoire
Revient toujours plus belle escorter ses drapeaux;
Et l'enfante à nos yeux des miracles nouveaux,
Et, rival de lui-même, il a vaincu sa gloire!"

"Et! qui suivrait le vol des guerriers qu'il dirige?
Sans cesse réveillant le bruit de ses exploits,
Des échos fatigués il ranime la voix:
Par lui la vérité surpasse le prodige."

"Favori du destin si le ciel l'a fait naître,
C'est pour voir l'univers asservi sous sa loi,
Et le peuple français, guidé par un tel maître,
Sera toujours le peuple-roi!"

Besides these extraordinary performances at the opera and theatres, several impromptu theatres were erected on such open places as the Barrière du Trône and the Champs de Mars, the properties being furnished by Government. Five hundred privates are supplied by the War Office, who volunteer to act in the military pieces represented, the contractors having only to supply the costumes worn by their respective troupes. On an average thirty clowns were engaged for each of these booth-like theatres, and were paid from 12 f. to 18 f. for their performances. Those who failed to secure a seat at the regular theatres had to console themselves by these impromptu performances. Two of the four erected on the Champs de Mars were devoted to military pieces, whilst the two others were funambules. The same arrangement was made for du Trône. Climbing poles were another attraction to these spaces. Each measured from 60 feet to 70 feet in height; from the top of each were suspended such tempting prizes as silver watches, meerschaum pipes, spoons, forks, &c., which became the property of the workmen or boys who reached them,—those who almost attained the desired prize and suddenly slipped down the pole, were invariably greeted by the lazzis of the crowd beneath.

As I drove to the Champs de Mars, early in the day, I noticed crowds anxiously gazing at the rowing and sailing matches, as well as other aquatic sports, which took place on the Seine. The morning, which had looked threatening, kept up, and, with the exception of a slight shower at midday, the sports were not interrupted by unwelcome rain, and the evening, though cold and windy, was fine, till the last light died out and darkness and silence settled on the vast metropolis, which for sixteen hours had been one prolonged scene of festivity and mirth.

Paris was never more tastefully decked in light of every hue and of every degree of radiance than last night. The city certainly has not been chary of its expenditure for the amusement of its inhabitants or its numerous visitors. By nine o'clock the illuminations were in their full beauty, and except for the mauvais quart d'heure during which we were threatened by sundry gusts of wind, the whole was a complete success. The Palace was not lighted, but much care was bestowed on the decoration of the Tuileries Gardens. Banners of colored lamps, measuring twenty feet in height, were placed at intervals along the broad walk which runs parallel with the Rue de Rivoli, throughout the alleys of venerable trees, which form the central massif; girandoles of graceful design shed a deep orange light on the scene, in strong contrast to the soft radiance emanating from chains of pearly globes, festooned from posts placed at intervals along the walks of the reserved garden, each post surmounted by a bouquet of eighteen of these opaque balls of light. These festooned chains were continued along the central walk to the Place de la Concorde, where they formed a perfect labyrinth traced in rows of pearls. Mysterious and sibylline appeared the colossal statues typifying the French cities which keep watch and ward on the eight plateaux into which that vast space is divided, and weird-like was the effect of immense banners placed around the obelisk, which, waving in the night air, were suggestive of spirits hovering over the dense crowd below.

A central festoon caught up by bouquets of pearly globes encircled the Longsor, and continued in double chains as far as the Arc de l'Etoile surrounded by an imperial crown of fabulous dimensions, measuring twenty-five feet in height, itself a blaze of golden light, relieved by ruby, emerald, and amethyst flames, which variegated tints flashed a thousand lovely hues on the marble basso-relievos incrustated in that superb arch. Beneath the crown, "Napoleon," in fiery letters, each six feet high, blazed in splendid radiance. The names of the Emperor's decisive victories in letters of light appeared between tricolor standards of colored lamps, the whole framed, as it were, with garlands of laurel leaves of the brightest emerald green. Beneath this gorgeous band of color fell at intervals on the arch itself, which appeared dark and gray in the gloom of night, gigantic stars of the Legion of Hon-nine o'clock somewhat dimmed their radiance. Still, the Arc de Triomphe has never been illuminated in such perfect taste as this year. The effect from the rond-point of the Champs Elysées was exquisite, and, perhaps, enhanced by the fact that the whole of the lower part of the monument was lost in darkness. Therefore the illuminated spandrils and frieze appeared suspended in the night air. The feu d'artifice fired from the Trocadero was magnificent, but not more splendid than last year, when I recorded the various chefs-d'œuvre accomplished by Ruggieri. The bouquet went off precisely at the moment when that of the Hotel de Villa shed its showers of pale yellow fire and mauve and green stars on the dense crowd of enthusiastic fire-worshippers massed on the Place, who heartily cheered each fresh blaze of colored fire as though the great majority had not on each succeeding fête witnessed the same spectacle.

As I proceeded along the Champ Elysées, on my way to the Tuileries, I was surprised by an unusual sight. The gardens around the four jets d'eau which adorn the rond-point were crowded by women and children seated on the shorn grass, on which no foot is allowed to tread on any other less solemn fête than that which celebrates the Centenary; their attraction to the soft greensward not being the perfume or beauty of the flowers, but the illuminated water, encircled by a ring of fire, from the centre of which the jets d'eau shot upwards in a snowy cloud of foam. It was a scene of magic beauty, and one of the loveliest of last night's kaleidoscope. The outlines of the Palais d'Industrie were traced in lines of fire, as though its architect had drawn his plan with a pen dipped in liquid flame. The Madeleine, surmounted by a Greek cross of pale yellow fire, and occasionally flashed by roseate flames, burnt beneath its wide open portico, and the dome and upper architecture of the new church of St. Augustin, traced in lines of fire, were special objects of attraction.

The great peculiarity of the day is not only that it was the Emperor's Fête, but the hundredth anniversary of the birth of the founder of the dynasty. Napoleon I. would yesterday have reached one hundred years of age; he who fulfilled his destiny in forty-five years, would now be a centenarian, a privilege enjoyed by some few of the invalides and officers who followed him on the field of battle. The new gilding of the dome of the Invalides, beneath which the great captain lies, was hurried to its completion, and was uncovered in time to add its lustre to the brilliance of the fête enacting 323 feet beneath the glittering surface. This said regilding has cost, £ 80,000, and as it has been calculated that every twenty-five years the gold must be renewed, it may be asserted that the dome of the Invalides costs the country eight millions of francs per century. The groups in alto-relievo which adorn the front of the new opera house were also unveiled in honor of this day. That typifying dance, due to the chisel of Carpeaux, is severely criticised on account of the delirious character of the movements of the figures, which convey to the spectator the impression that they are executing a tarantula rather than a ballet.

Statisticians can have remarkably little to do; however, lovers of detail will be obliged to them for the trouble one of that body must have taken to ascertain that 241 posts in the Tuileries Gardens supported 205 bouquets of 19 opaque globes, and 219 festoons of 45 globes, making a total of 13,750 mauffed glasses. As persons are to be found who take an interest in details, I transcribe for their edification that on the Place de la Concorde there were 450 bouquets, each of 19 globes, and 359 festoons of 45 globes, — sum total, 24,705 globes. Add both sums together, and the reader will be pleased to learn that our visual organs have been dazzled by the light of 38,455 gas jets.

HEAT FROM THE MOON.

A LONG-VEKED question — one which astronomers and physicists have labored and puzzled and even quarrelled over for two centuries at least — has at length been set at rest. Whether the Moon really sends us any appreciable amount of warmth has long been a moot point. The most delicate experiments had been tried to determine the matter. De Saussure thought he had succeeded in obtaining heat from the moon, but it was shown that he had been gathering heat from his own instruments. Melloni tried the experiment, and fell into a similar error. Piazzi Smyth, in his famous Teneriffe expedition, tried the effect of seeking for lunar heat above those lower and more moisture-laden atmospheric strata which are known to cut off the obscure heat-rays so effectually. Yet he also failed. Professor Tyndall, in his now classical "Lectures on Heat," says that all such experiments must inevitably fail, since the heat rays from the moon must be of such a character that the glass converging-lens used by the experimenters would cut off the whole of the lunar heat. He himself tried the experiment with metallic mirrors, but the thick London air prevented his succeeding.

The hint was not lost, however. It was decided that mirrors, and not lenses, were the proper weapons for carrying on the attack. Now, there is one mirror in existence which excels all others in light-gathering, and therefore necessarily in heat-gathering, power. The gigantic mirror of the Rosse telescope has long been engaged in gathering the faint rays from those distant stellar cloudlets which are strewn over the celestial vault. The strange clusters with long out-reaching arms, the spiral nebulae with mystic convolutions around their blazing nuclei, the wild and fantastic figures of the irregular nebulae, all these forms of matter had been forced to reveal their secret under the searching eye of the great Parsonstown reflector.

But vast as are the powers of this giant telescope, and interesting as the revelations it had already made, there was one defect which paralyzed half its powers. It was an inert mass well poised; — indeed, so that the merest infant could sway it, but possessing no power of self-motion. The telescopes in our great observatories follow persistently the motions of the stars upon the celestial vault, but their giant brother possessed no such power. And when we remember the enormous volume of the Rosse Telescope, its tube, — fifty feet in length, — down which a tall man can walk upright, and its vast metallic speculum weighing several tons, the task of applying clock-motion to so cumbersome and seemingly unwieldy a mass might well seem hopeless? Yet without this it was debarred from taking its part in a multitude of processes of research to which its powers were wonderfully adapted. Spectroscopic analysis, as applied to the stars, for example, requires the most perfect uniformity of clock-motion, so that the light from a star, once received on the jaws of the slit which forms the entrance into the spectroscope, may not move off them even by a hair's breadth. And the determination of the moon's heat required an equally exact adaptation of the telescope's motion to the apparent movement of the celestial sphere. For so delicate is the inquiry, that the mere heat generated in turning the telescope upon the moon by the ordinary arrangement would have served to mask the result.

At enormous cost, and after many difficulties had been encountered, the Rosse reflector has at length had its powers more than doubled, by the addition of the long-wanted power of self-motion. And among the first-fruits of the labor thus bestowed upon it, is the solution of the famous problem of determining the moon's heat.

The delicate heat-measurer, known as the thermopile, was used in this work, as in Mr. Huggins's experiments for estimating the heat we receive from the stars. The moon's heat, concentrated by the great mirror, was suffered to fall upon the face of the thermopile, and the indications of the needle were carefully watched. A small but obvious deflection in the direction signifying heat was at once observed, and when the observation had been repeated several times with the same result no doubt could remain. We actually receive an appreciable proportion of our warmth-supply from "the chaste beams of the wat'ry moon." The view which Sir John Herschel had long since formed on the behavior of the fleecy clouds of a summer night under the moon's influence was shown to be as correct as almost all the guesses have been which the two Herschels have ever made.

And one of the most interesting of the results which have followed from the inquiry confirms in an equally striking manner another guess which Sir John Herschel had made. By comparing the heat received from the moon with that obtained from several terrestrial sources, Lord Rosse has been led to the conclusion that at the time of full moon the surface of our satellite is raised to a temperature exceeding by more than 280° (Fahrenheit) that of boiling water. Sir John Herschel long since asserted that this must be so. During the long lunar day, lasting some three hundred of our hours, the sun's rays are poured without intermission upon the lunar surface. No clouds temper the heat, no atmosphere even serves to interpose any resistance to the continual down-pour of the fierce solar rays. And for about the space of three of our days the sun hangs suspended close to the zenith of the lunar sky, so that if there were inhabitants on our unfortunate satellite, they would be scorched for more than seventy consecutive hours by an almost vertical sun.

There is only one point in Lord Rosse's inquiry which seems doubtful. That we receive heat from the moon he has shown conclusively, and there can be no doubt that a large portion of this heat is radiated from the moon. But there is another mode by which the heat may be sent to us from the moon, and it might be worth while to inquire a little more closely than has yet been done whether the larger share of the heat rendered sensible by the great mirror may not have come in this way. We refer to the moon's power of reflecting heat. It need hardly be said that the reflection and the radiation of heat are very different matters. Let any one hold a burnished metal plate in such a way that the sun's light is reflected towards his face, and he will feel that with the light a considerable amount of heat is reflected. Let him leave the same metal in the sun until it is well warmed, and he will find that the metal is capable of imparting heat to him when it is removed from the sun's rays. This is radiation, and cannot happen unless the metal has been warmed, whereas heat can be reflected from an ice-cold plate. There has been nothing in the experiments conducted by Lord Rosse to show by which of these two processes the moon's heat is principally sent to us; nor do we know enough of the constitution of the moon's surface to estimate for ourselves the relative proportions of the heat she reflects and radiates towards us.

We do not mention this point from any desire to cavil at the results of one of the most interesting experiments which has recently been carried out. But the recent researches of Zollner upon the light from the planets, has shown how largely the surfaces of the celestial bodies differ as respects their capacity for reflecting and absorbing light, and there is every reason to infer that similar peculiarities characterize the planets' power of absorbing and reflecting heat. The whole question of the heat to which the moon's surface is actually raised by the sun's heat depends upon the nature of that surface, and the proportion between its power of absorbing heat or reflecting it away into space.

LIFE AND DEATH AT ST. BREACA'S.

IN EIGHT CHAPTERS. — CHAPTER I.

THE Gray House stands fifty feet above the sea, on Penmaur Cliff, and looks as if it had been flung there. It is built of granite, and consists of two wings, three stories high, united by a centre one third of their depth, and one story lower. In it is the principal entrance, and on either side of that are four small-paned sash windows. Facing the bay, the space between the wings is filled by a plain strong stone colonnade, raised two steps above the semi-natural terrace on which the house is situated. From thence, black rocks descend to a noble sea. They stretch a quarter of a mile away to the south, and a mile to the west, where they give way to the small fishing-town of St. Breaca's in Cornwall.

In the year 1795, a picturesque old native, by name Dan Quick, returned from forty years' wandering, no one knew where, and, with money which every one believed to have been amassed irregularly, built the Gray House. It was large enough to accommodate ten persons. He took two to live with him, an ancient sister, his only surviving kin, and Sam Williams, an active orphan lad, who hit his fancy. After his own fashion, he settled himself comfortably: filled a large kitchen with domestic conveniences, and made a parlor quaint with curiosities, savage and civilized; provided his sister Peggy with a tent bedstead with printed linen hangings; and slung hammocks for the boy and himself. He was an object of curiosity, and fear even, to the townspeople; and of suspicion to the coastguard; but for twenty years he baffled the former, and did not infringe the laws which the latter were appointed to enforce. The keeping the house as neat and clean as a man-of-war, shooting sea-fowl, managing a couple of boats, and fishing, filled his time. Peggy died in the eighteenth year of their residence: he buried her in the garden, in a coffin made by himself and Sam; paid her trim grave a visit before breakfast every morning, and smoked his last pipe there the night before he died, two years after her. Sam missed his early football, and found that he had passed quietly, while sleeping, into the unseen world. The curate of the parish had called on him once, and been, as he conceived, discouraged. The Wesleyans, more zealous, or more persevering, had paid him many visits, and addressed to him many stirring exhortations, which had elicited only sarcasms. The sole clew found by his fellow-men to the state of his conscience was in his will. He provided for being laid decently by Peggy; left one hundred pounds, his boats, furniture, curiosities, and clothes to Sam; and bequeathed his remaining property—the Gray House and three thousand pounds in the funds—to the king, with the remark that he had the best right to it.

The Gray House was shut up, the site of the garden graves lost, the wind and sea-fowl broke most of the windows; and as no railways gave facilities to tourists, and Cornwall was then very much off the world's highway, Dan Quick's residence remained for many years as solitary as his inner life had been.

St. Breaca's had known better days. Architects point to striking beauties in the church, built in the thirteenth century; but as a piece of preferment, the incumbency cannot be called valuable, though its income has been augmented by a grant from Queen Anne's Bounty. This ecclesiastical promotion was obtained, about the year 1826, by the Rev. Marcus Secker. Three years previously, he had been appointed curate of St. Breaca's, St. Mary's in the Mines, and St. Ann's on the Moor. The three parishes lay wide of one another, so wide as to involve a hebdomadal walk of ten miles, in order to give, according to agreement, and for a stipend of seventy-five pounds, one full service in two each Sunday, and prayers in a third. Mr. Secker decided that this had been endured too long; and, being talented always, and occasionally judicious and conciliating, he worked upon the bishop and archdeacon to effect a change. St. Breaca's became a perpetual curacy, with one hundred and twenty pounds per annum: St. Mary's and St. Ann's fell to another laborer.

Mr. Secker was one among several officers in the army who, at the close of the Peninsular War, felt themselves called to spiritual leadership. Not that he was "serious," but that he was versatile. First a spoiled boy, and then a spoiled man, he had bought a commission in the line, after a fond widowed mother had prepared him liberally for the medical profession. Four years' experience of the delights of dépôts and garrison towns satisfied him that he was tired of the army, and fit for something better. He had made himself a favorite of Dr. Sophton, the Bishop of Merton, who believed that his penetration detected a theological bias in the handsome young soldier. He offered to ordain him without university education, on condition of his residing three years under his eye.

Mr. Secker was pleased with the proposition. It was complimentary; it commended itself to his taste and imagination. A bishop, who was a gentleman combined in himself all social perfections: blended refinement, dignity, and learning, with delicate zest for the indispensable duties of hospitality. Mr. Secker saw himself a bishop in no very remote future, accepted the offer, and developed gracefully into the clerical aspirant. He passed through his probation delightfully, and charmed a brilliant circle, assembled on the occasion at the palace, by the success of his début. His first sermon, adapted safely from an old Catholic divine, was delivered faultlessly; his melodious voice and fine ear made his reading perfect; and his splendid dark eyes were capable of every variety of expression. Nevertheless, equally to his annoyance and astonishment, he was appointed to the obscure curacy of Willowlea in Lincolnshire. There was no consolation but in believing that jealousy of his superior powers had banished him thither, and in perceiving that many regrets would follow him. The Misses Sophton indeed excused themselves, on various pretexts, from wishing him good by publicly; and avoided being seen by each other for some hours after his departure. When they met, they were all silent in his regard, for each pitied her sisters for their infatuation, believing that she was herself the object of his warm attachment, and that diffidence about his prospects alone prevented his declaring his passion.

He did not stay longer at Willowlea than to get his title. There was no society, and he could not exist without it. He must have died, he said he thought, but for the excitement of fighting the Wesleyans, who were numerous and respectable in his parish. He wrote pungent pamphlets at them; reviled them in his pulpit; and behaved otherwise so intemperately, that by the time he left Willowlea, the place had become "too hot to hold him." He thought himself fortunate in being chosen to be curate of Somerton, a parish adorned by the residence of a peer of the realm, and families likely to appreciate what he called his "knowledge of the pulses and passions of high life."

It was curious that Mr. Secker had all this time remained a bachelor. He might, over and over again, have made his fortune in the matrimonial market. Perhaps it was because of the easiness of the step that he was careless about it. At last, he pronounced himself actually in love with one of the half-dozen daughters of an old naval officer. They sat in the pew under the reading-desk, looking like a bunch of wild roses, and the youngest and shyest caught his eye and what heart he had; she drank in with wonder and admiration a sermon (a piracy) which he was delivering admirably. He, one of the most artificial of men, decided on the spot that he would, with as little delay as possible, marry Nannie Gray, a simple, modest country-girl, who thought it a tremendous thing to go out to tea in Somerton; who had no fortune, and was twenty years younger than himself. His income at the time was one hundred and twenty pounds; his respectable patrimony had melted away, he knew not how, for he was utterly ignorant of, and indifferent to the value of money; and he owed about two hundred pounds, which he had not the remotest prospect of paying. It was, however, alas! easy to blind honest Captain Gray, who had never deceived anybody. He and his wife thought Nannie fortunate. They had not a penny to give her; and, by their humble standard one hundred and twenty pounds, and the vicarage, to live in, seemed ample provision. They had no debts; they practised self-denial and were industrious; and it did not occur to them that a clergyman, a gentleman, and one who evidently stood well in society far above their own, could stoop to deceive them. It is but justice to Mr. Secker to say that he did not think he was deceiving them; he meant to cherish their daughter, to improve her immensely, and to fit her to share with him that preference for which he felt himself as surely destined as—in his own estimation—he was undeniably qualified.

Nannie was not in love, and probably she never would have been; she was one of the women whose deepest affections are all reserved for their children; but she thought Mr. Secker the most gifted and perfect of men, and accepted his offer as great promotion, and the earnest of sure protection for life. She only sighed to think how unworthy she must always be of such a husband, and marvelled honestly what he could see in her. Poor little thing! When she had been married a month, she knew that he was in difficulties, that he despised and was ashamed of her family, that her ignorance of conventional usages irritated him, and that his violent suspicious temper made him sometimes positively cruel. And she was hardly seventeen when this "iron entered into her soul."

It was not long before Mr. Secker became so obnoxious to his vicar, that he was dismissed from Somerton, and the fact involved exposure of the real state of his affairs. A few old friends, and some persons who admired and pitied his pretty, gentle, young wife, paid his debts, and obtained another curacy for him. It was, however, less valuable, for the vicar resided; and the curate, with the same stipend as at Somerton, had to provide himself with a dwelling. He, however, scouted economy. When poor Nannie, trembling, remonstrated, he desired her, savagely, to be silent. "What could she, the daughter of a beggarly half-pay officer, know of the wants,—the absolute necessities required by a gentleman? She would be glad—he saw through it all—to pull him down to the true quarter-deck level; but it would not do. He would have wine, and clean linen every day,—twice a week, indeed!—and he should continue to order the Quarterly and Edinburgh, and to have a weekly paper. It was all very fine for her—she had not a soul above saucepans—to hint at doing without this and that and the other. He desired to have it distinctly understood that he would brook no interference."

But it is hard for an empty bag to stand upright; and as year succeeded year, and preference did not come, and creditors clamored, and Mr. Secker felt privations in spite of himself, he sank socially, and made his wife, while her soul sickened, give evasive answers to tradespeople; and sometimes, worse even, compelled her to write pitiful letters, asking help from people whom they knew but by name. Perhaps the answers were harsh, or reproachful; they implied that a wife who knew her duty, was self-denying, and a good manager, would make Mr. Secker's income sufficient; and that she ought not to make appeals derogatory to her husband's position. And she had half-starved herself, and been often, often cold from insufficient clothing. She said nothing, but prayed a great deal, read comforting passages in the Psalms and Gospels, and hid weeping eyes in her lovely little children's plump shoulders, and wondered what was to become of them all. Mr. Secker was essentially touchy and quarrelsome. No consideration of expediency or gratitude could prevent his expressing, as offensively as possible, his conviction that he had been ill used or insulted. No one had experienced this more frequently than his diocesan, who had been specially kind to him. Mr. Secker's conduct to him became at length so insolent, that self-respect, on the bishop to punish him. On his throwing up his curacy in a fit of pique, Dr. Verity refused to license him to another, or to countersign his testimonials; but he stated that he would not put any obstacle in the way of his giving temporary assistance to clergymen willing to employ him. His sentiments on the occasion were conveyed in the following note:—

"MY LORD,—In submitting to the sentence your lordship has been pleased to pronounce on me, I have the lofty satisfaction of knowing that it is not in any man's power to deprive me of my claim to be considered a gentleman; and I do not disguise from myself the fact that I should have been more acceptable to your lordship if destitute of pretensions to social standing and good descent. There are men so essentially low that they cannot forgive another for possessing superior advantages. I shall not avail myself of the permission to exercise my sacred calling in the way your lordship indicates. The consequences to my unoffending wife and children, I lay at the door of your lordship's conscience; and I am, my lord, your lordship's most obedient servant,

"MARCUS SECKER."

Mr. Secker read this astounding document to his bewildered wife, who dared not express her opinion of it; and, looking like one who had relieved his mind of a heavy burden, or settled a vexed question, went blithely to post it. It was by no means the most intolerable letter he had inflicted on the bishop, a learned, kind-hearted man, and perfectly innocent of any assumption that could palliate an attack on his origin. He read it quietly, and handed it to his secretary, remarking, "Now, that man is not mad enough to be placed in confinement, and yet it would be, in the fullest sense, uncharitable to treat him as of sound mind; in fact, he is certainly not. For the sake of gratifying his malignity,—which really I cannot charge myself with having provoked,—he throws up all his prospects for life and makes his family paupers." The good old gentleman had it intimated to Mrs. Secker that if she could work on her husband to apologize, or to let her apologize for him, he would recommend him into another diocese,—where, possibly, he might do better,—and contribute towards the payment of debts and the expenses of removal. When Mr. Secker had relieved himself of an atrocious letter, as well as when his ebullitions of temper had wrung his wife's heart, and terrified his little children into shrieks, he overflowed with amiable emotions. He accepted Dr. Verity's benevolence, and wrote:—

"MY LORD,—You have 'heaped coals of fire on my head.' I cannot lie as low in your lordship's eyes as I am in my own; but you can exercise a vast benignity, and preferring mercy to justice, forgive, my lord, your lordship's most grateful and devoted humble servant, MARCUS SECKER."

So, in the year of our Lord 1823, Mr. Secker arrived at St. Breaca's, and took the small shabby house at the corner of High Street and Water Lane, at a rent of twelve pounds, rates and taxes not included, and was in a few weeks settled in it, with his wife, seven children, and a scrub of a local servant-girl at a shilling a week; and he remarked complacently and truly that, the poverty notwithstanding, there was a certain something about the estab-there were a gentleman's family. It did not occur to him that this was mostly due to the industry and exquisite domestic skill of the patient, loving wife and mother, who sat up late and rose early, and did "him good and not evil all the days of her life."

CHAPTER II.

"I'm the most unfortunate man in the world," said Sir Geoffrey Monsey to his wife. "No one hates trouble more than I do; no one interferes less with others. I hate politics, I hate business, I hate family troubles, and they are all thrust upon me." Sir Geoffrey was a handsome man of sixty, with a fine unencumbered property; and, save annual liability to hay-fever, excellent health; but he uttered this lamentation at breakfast in his grand old country-house, on a lovely June morning.

"Never mind the politics," returned Lady Monsey; "you have decided not to stand again for North-shand."

"Yes; thank Heaven! But I shudder at the bare recollection of the canvassing and noise, and dining and bills. I never would have borne it, but for you; and how I did bear it, and why you made me submit to it, I have never understood."

"What makes you think of so many grievances this morning?"

"My letters"; and he sighed so sadly, that the wife, who had all the energy and purpose that he had not, and who had understood and loved him for five-and-twenty years, felt that he had a real vexation, and looked at him kindly and questioningly.

"Yes; here they are. By the by—it is not to the purpose, but Honoria is to be married next week, and they want me at the wedding. I asked Thompson if I had any clothes fit to go in, and he said, 'No, Sir Geoffrey; you have hardly any clothes fit for a gentleman.'"

"You have spoiled him. — What did you say?"

"Say! I said, 'Then why don't you order me some? You don't expect me to take the trouble to order my own clothes, do you?'"

It was told in such simplicity that Lady Monsey could not help smiling; but he did not perceive it, and went on.

"I have a letter from my unfortunate brother Arthur."

"Where is he?"

"At Baden, but coming to England directly. He says he cannot live abroad any longer, — that he is tired of it, — that his children want education, — that he cannot afford to give it them, — that his income must be increased, — and that he looks to me, as the boy is my heir. Of course, he cares nothing about the children; he is dunned, and he wants to make sure of cigars and brandy, and a cook. He talks of bringing his family to Dover, and leaving them there, while he comes here to see what I mean to do for him."

"That must be prevented."

"Certainly, he might have delirium tremens in the house; and, besides, his conduct to me has been invariably so atrocious that I will hold no personal communication with him."

"How soon can the yacht be ready?"

"I believe she is ready now. Dare wanted to start next week: he thinks the weather is settled; but as I had had no hay-fever, I thought of waiting."

"Do you not think we had better go at once?"

Your brother could not follow you. Tell him that your letters will be forwarded."

"Yes; but I must have some plan."

"True; I have been expecting this; and I think you had better promise to double his income, and send the boy to Eton; provided that he, Arthur, will live where you choose, — in England, if he will."

"I can do that," said Sir Geoffrey; "but I am certain he will try to force himself here. He has lost all self-respect, all gentlemanlike feeling."

"He may not. His wife has, at any rate, behaved well since her marriage; and whatever her faults have been, she no doubt loves her children, and she may try to make him do what is best for them. She must have some sort of influence over him."

Lady Monsey sighed. It seemed to her so hard that the reckless, worthless younger brother had children, and she had none; hard that those children had a bad father, when Sir Geoffrey would have been such a good one; hard that they had a mother whose name had been breathed on, while she was unimpeachable.

The schooner-yacht Zephyr was ready. Sir Geoffrey had said that he knew every nook of the Mediterranean, and would cruise off the Cornish and Devonshire coast, which he had never seen, and Captain Dare knew well. Off Land's End, the vessel suffered material injury in a squall, and there was no resource but to put into St. Breaca's for repairs. Sir Geoffrey availed himself of the occasion to grumble. He did not dispute the beauty of the little harbor, but he was certain that St. Breaca's smelled of fish; that there could be no decent inn; that there was nothing for it but to post home as fast as possible, and rush, perhaps, into his brother Arthur's arms.

Lady Monsey represented that the accommodation could not possibly be worse than they had often put up with on the Continent; that if they could only get rooms, they had on board wherewith to make them habitable; that he would infallibly have hay-fever if he left the coast; that they could amuse themselves very well there for a fortnight; and that it had been often the unexpressed desire of her heart to become acquainted with Cornwall and the Cornish. So, as usual, he groaned, and yielded, and regretted the concession ultimately so little that he stayed a month, and commenced negotiating for the purchase of the old Gray House. He thought it capable of being made a very pleasant temporary seaside residence, and that if he were disappointed in it, he could let his brother Arthur have it.

St. Breaca's had never been so stirred. The yacht was a gem, and the clever shipwrights were enthusiastic about her. Mrs. Rowe of The George had "real people of quality in the house, and so affable, to be sure." All the women admired Sir Geoffrey; and the men said they felt they could do anything for Lady Monsey. Mr. Secker cannot be classed. His imagination had been fluttered. Next day would be Sunday. He selected two of his best sermons. They would be at church once at least, probably in the morning, and come to the vestry after service, and ask him to dinner: he should go of course. Poor Nannie would fidget about his cotton pocket-handkerchiefs, clumsy shoes, and so on. It was impossible to make any one, born and brought up as she—dear creature!—had been, understand that a perfect gentleman could afford to be shabby. If her poor father had been going to dine with a baronet, he would have dressed himself so as to look quite new, and have felt that he had no social standing but what he owed to his clothes. The little-great people of the town would see how the Sir Geoffreys regarded Mr. Secker, the poor parson, though he had not their mine-and-fish bought finery. How he should enjoy being once more in good society! How had he dragged on for weary years, away from the polished men, the fascinating, perfectly feminine women, with whom he had been born to be familiar! Sir Geoffrey and Lady Monsey would understand it all and feel for him. Perhaps they had church preferment in their gift. Here nature welled up, and his eyes grew moist and he said aloud, "My blessed, blessed, patient wife, you should not then be such a slave, and my precious darlings should have all the advantages they ought to have; and they would know how the fond, foolish, passionate father loved them." And he went into the parlor, and played with the baby — no one could do that better than he — and talked innocent nonsense to all, building vicarages in the air, till Mrs. Secker said, "I have often and often wondered if I should ever go up that hill again" (St. Breaca's is in a deep valley): "it seems impossible, we are so completely out of the world; but as long as we have the dear children, it does not signify where we live."

Sir Geoffrey and Lady Monsey did ask Mr. Secker to dine on that Sunday, and often afterwards. All his dormant social talents woke under congenial influences. Sir Geoffrey said, "It is really a pity that man is buried here. He is a gentleman; he reads well, preaches well, and, a few crotchets apart, talks well. He should have had St. Cuthbert's, if I had not given it away; I am sorry for it. He must be half-starved here. The loaves and fishes of the Establishment are very unequally distributed."

HALF AN HOUR WITH HORACE WALPOLE.

It has been very justly observed that "contemporaries appreciate the man rather than the merit, but posterity will regard the merit rather than the man." In the time of Horace Walpole — it comes more naturally to us so to speak of him, seeing that he did not succeed to the earldom of Orford till some six years ere the close of his long life — those of his contemporaries whom he admitted to his intimacy probably were unduly biassed in favor of his talents by the charm of his manner. In the present day a reader has to take him for what he is worth, — forming the estimate from a host of Walpole's published letters, from an indifferent romance, from his "Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors," and from his "Anecdotes of Painting in England." Whatever the conclusion arrived at as to the breadth of his literary acquirements, it will not, we think, be denied that he is by no means the least readable of a race of letter-writing fine gentlemen, whose correspondence, written ostensibly in the ease of private confidence, but all the while intended one day for publication, may be compared — in the words of the Rev. Caleb Colton, alluding to some of Pope's prose writings in that vein — to the "dis-habille in which a beauty would wish you to believe you have surprised her, after spending three hours at her toilet."

As a son of that powerful and unscrupulous statesman, Sir Robert Walpole, afterwards the first

Earl of Orford, Horace had many social advantages. To the active pursuit of politics our letter-writer personally had a rooted aversion — preferring rather to divide his time between literature and art, and private intercourse with some of the most noteworthy men of his day. As an M. P. he was a failure; and it was when he joyfully retired from public affairs to his villa at Strawberry Hill, near Twickenham, to his picture buying, dilettante authorship, letter-writing, and bric-a-brac hunting, that he was in the sphere he loved. A refined, cynical, chatty looker-on, from a cosy little distance at the events of his time, he lived on to old age amidst a pretty general opinion in good society that, had he cared to emerge from his cultured semi-seclusion, he might have left a far more solid reputation.

Letter-writing, in his sense, is nowadays almost entirely a thing of the past. With quick and cheap postal communication, rapid railway facility for visits, and the last increase of printed media for news, — to say nothing of the fiery, every-day haste of modern civilization, — gentlemen do not, as a rule, now labor either at turning periods or chronicling jeux d'esprit in their letters to their friends, — letters which in Walpole's time were written with the knowledge that one epistle would pass through many admiring hands. For the price of a penny you may now learn the cream of the world's news over your breakfast-table. "Our own correspondents" and an army of reporters and chit-chat manufacturers almost render anything more than a mere record of purely private matters between friends superfluous; and so, though more letters than ever are now written by England's bustling children, the tone of letter-writing has almost entirely changed.

It is not here proposed to do much more than gossip about the man Walpole, some of his contemporaries, and more particularly some letters of his to one of his many correspondents, — George Montagu, M. P., who, among several other offices, held that of private secretary to Lord North, when that nobleman was Chancellor of the Exchequer. The pen-and-ink intercourse between the two friends was pretty frequent from 1736 to 1770; which, at any rate, says much either for Walpole's love of scribbling, or for the constancy of his friendship. As you read these light records of the brave men and fair women, of the butterflies of fashion, and the notabilities of the period's tittle-tattle, the "dry bones," as in Ezekiel's vision, seem to live again, and the bones of forgotten reputations "come together, every bone to his bone." You see these people as they were in the flesh, jesting, loving, scandal-mongering, flirting, flaunting, lying, intriguing for place and precedence. You see them, too, not in the garb in which grave history chooses to robe some of them, but in their every-day clothes, so to speak, — as they were, or as they appeared to the sharp, never too charitable eye of the keen, if somewhat "finicking," Horace Walpole, who mixed with them in the world of fashion, and then sat down slyly to show up their foibles for George Montagu's laughing eye.

There may be nothing much, some may think, in Walpole's little bits of ill-natured observation. Many of his anecdotes lose their possible former force by reason of the remoteness of his sphere of action and feeling from our own. Still, some of our readers, knowing, by miscellaneous reading, the men and women he rattles on about, may care to have their memories jogged afresh.

For the Duke of Newcastle, the opponent of Sir Robert Walpole, Horace entertained a contemptuous, life-long hatred. In August, 1745, when that nobleman was grasping at power, our letter-writer hits off his Grace's moral and physical peculiarities in a vein of graphic spite. "The disposition of the drama is in the hands of the Duke of Newcastle, — those hands that are always groping, and sprawling, and fluttering, and hurrying on the rest of his precipitate person. If one could conceive a dead body hung in chains, always wanting to be hung somewhere else, one would have a comparative idea of him."

In the August of the next year, Walpole had a good deal to say about the unhappy Scotch rebel lords. Hardly a particle of right feeling does he show, — probably looking upon the sentence to death of those gallant, if mistaken, gentlemen as a capital excuse for gossip. As poor, bluff, brave old Lord Balmerino returned to the Tower, after being sentenced to lose his head for his love for the Jacobite cause, our chatty friend tells us he — Balmerino — "stopped the coach at Charing Cross to buy honey-blobs, as the Scotch call gooseberries." Horace's friend, the witty but morbid George Selwyn, was, we may be sure, agog with bustling expectation that gloomy while. No doubt the pair of acquaintances cracked their joke freely at the St. James's coffee-houses, and wagered how the doomed men would meet death on Tower Hill, — George Selwyn, no doubt, between the deals at cards, inwardly resolving to see that execution, after his ugly fashion of seldom missing such sights. You remember perhaps, by the way, an old story about Selwyn — whose love of the horrible was notorious — once sending to inquire after a noble friend who lay at the point of death? The return message was, "Give my compliments to Mr. Selwyn, and tell him I shall feel greatly obliged if he will wait on me to-morrow. If I am alive then, I shall be glad to see him; and if I am dead by that time, I know he will be glad to see me."

Writing August 5, 1746, Walpole says: "Old Balmerino keeps up his spirits to the same pitch of gayety. In the cell at Westminster he showed Lord Kilmarnock how he must lay his head; bade him not winch (sic) lest the stroke should cut his skull or his shoulders, and advised him to bite his lips. As they were to return, he begged they might have another bottle together, as they should never meet any more till — and then pointed to his neck. At getting into the coach he said to the jailer: 'Take care, or you will break my shins with this d—d axe,' which was, you know, after condemnation carried with the edge towards the prisoners." Lord Kilmarnock's poverty doubtless had much to do with his rebellion. His mother forces him into it — so at least Walpole says — on pain of disinheriting him; and he was so wretchedly poor, that "in one of his wife's intercepted letters she tells him she has plagued their steward for a fortnight, and can get but three shillings."

On the 16th, we find Mr. Horace Walpole tripping along eastward "under the new heads" (i. e. those of some lately decapitated Jacobites of minor rank) "at Temple Bar, where people make a trade of letting spying glasses at a halfpenny a look." Meanwhile, he goes jauntily on to the Tower, and there sees other rebels, not yet turned into "new heads," looking out of their windows. One of poor old Balmerino's windows was stopped up, because he talked to the people outside; and another was left open, and that looked directly on to the scaffold where his gray head was soon to roll.

Then our dandy man about town — for he at one time of his life played that rôle — rattles away briskly, with a sneer at my Lady Townshend's absurd affectation in "gushing" — as we young men of this period call it — about Lord Kilmarnock, "whom she never saw but at the bar of his trial, and was smitten with his falling shoulders." She has been under his windows, sends messages to him, has got his dog and his snuff-box, has taken lodgings out of town for to-morrow and Monday night, forswears conversing with the "bloody English, and has taken a French master." And so on, — with more of this heartless half-laughter in which no doubt scores of well-bred gentlemen joined, — at a time when this land was red with blood, and "Charlie is my darling" was something more to brave Jacobite hearts than the stirring tune is now to drawing-room warblers.

We suppose in those days coronets — like the proverbial kissing — went by favor; for we turn over a page or two and come to this pithy little announcement, which speaks volumes for the shameless corruption of George the Second's time: "I suppose we shall have more lords. The countess" (probably one of German George's Hanoverian light o' loves is here intended) "touched twelve thousand for Sir Jacob Bouverie's coronet." This Sir Jacob Bouverie was an ancestor of the present Earl of Radnor.

It was in the year 1753, that irregular marriages without license or banns in the Fleet Prison and other places were finally stopped by a special Act of Parliament. Walpole tells us a characteristic story about a "marriage-broker" of that day, — one Keith. "So," said Keith, "the bishops, — they will hinder my marrying. Well, let 'em, but I'll be revenged: I'll buy two or three acres of ground, and I'll under-bury 'em all." The evil, which the legislature at last abolished, must have attained gigantic proportions, when it is a matter of history, that in the Fleet, between the 19th of October, 1704, and February 12, 1705, there were celebrated 2,954 marriages of the above kind.

ENGAGEMENTS.

A CERTAIN crabbed old pass-tutor at Oxford, who had grown hoary in the unprofitable service of getting Fourth-Form Etonians and Harrovians through their different public examinations, used to say, in illustration of one of Aldrich's dark mysteries, that the word Engagement is always, when used by a lady, a word of the second intention. When, he would say, a man talks of making, breaking, forgetting, or keeping an engagement, no one can tell what sort of an engagement is meant, because men use the word in its first or general intention of any obligation by contract. But when a lady speaks of "an engagement" she employs the word in a technical or secondary sense, and you may be quite certain that she means an agreement to marry. When Amanda tells Lucetta that she is "engaged," you have no more doubt of the precise signification of the word than you have when you see it stuck up by a porter on a wooden label over a railway carriage. You are as sure that in one case there has been an offer to marry, as that in the other there has been a proposal to bribe. Whether the old tutor was correct or not in his logic, whether he rightly or wrongly interpreted Aldrich's definition of a predicable, his illustration was no doubt well adapted to catch and fix the wandering attention of his hearers; and it will serve to explain what we mean when we say that the word placed at the head of this paper is to be taken in the second intention, or ladies' sense.

Endless classifications might be made of the different kinds of engagements. For example, there is the classification by what lawyers call "the consideration." Some engagements are made for love's sake, others for the sake of something less divine. Among this latter class are the engagements arranged or invented for the purpose of staving off creditors, or of getting another five hundred pounds' worth of jewelry from a fashionable firm. Sometimes, but this is high art, these two species of engagements are made to dovetail into one another, — as in the case of the founder of a noble house, who got admission as a partner into a great firm by hinting that he was going to marry a rich heiress, and simultaneously secured the consent of the young lady's father by holding out the prospect of the partnership, — thus using his engagement to further his speculation, and his speculation to secure his engagement.

But the two commonest methods of classifying engagements are, first, by the degree to which they are sanctioned; and secondly, by their duration. Thus engagements, when classified according to their sanction, are divided into two principal sorts, — the authorized or regular, which have received the approval of parents, guardians, and other legitimate authorities; and the unauthorized, or irregular, which have no such sanction. So, again, these irregular engagements naturally subdivide themselves into the forbidden, which, having been announcement to the proper authorities, and discountenanced by them, are nevertheless cherished in the imaginative souls of poetical Edwins and Angelinas as things which have a real and substantive existence, though the world ignores them, — and the clandestine, which are not brought to light at all. An engagement of the clandestine type hardly ever lasts long in that phase. As the life of a young girl is much more domestic than that of a young man, the burden of concealment presses much more heavily upon her than upon her lover. On this account, and also because of the greater tenderness of a girl's conscience, the almost invariable end of a clandestine engagement is, that after lasting a few weeks it is announced by the girl to a sister or mother, and passes either into the regular or the forbidden phase. Most fortunately for the authority of parents, there are few girls who would not rather run the risk of sacrificing a lover than keep such a secret six weeks with absolute integrity. Any one who has noticed the amazing rapidity with which the news of an engagement spreads among the host of female friends, relations, and acquaintances, will feel how keen a pleasure must be taken by them in circulating such a tit-bit of gossip, and, conversely, what a severe deprivation it would be to them not to be permitted to announce it. Parents sometimes, from reasons of mortified pride or mental indecision, desire that the news of an engagement, though sanctioned, should be confined to as few persons as possible. But this is always found to be an untenable position. The eagerness of each last recipient of the secret to communicate it to a specially privileged friend soon puts an end to the parents' fond hope of a limited liability to congratulation, and cannot be published for private circulation only. It is, in fact, one of those confidential communications which are sometimes called "shouting secrets."

The classification of engagements according to their duration gives us several interesting types. Some engagements are of a short but rapturous kind; others are of a protracted and Platonic character. Some are contracted for a fixed term of years, as the engagement of a minor to marry when he attains his majority, or of a widow to wed after two years' inconsolability. Others are terminable after an indefinite period, as where a Fellow of a College engages to marry as soon as he gets a living, or where a young lady promises to make her lover happy when he can show that he is able "to maintain her in the style to which she has always been accustomed, and to supply her with the comfort and refinements which she has a right from her position in society to expect." Other engagements may be considered as terminable at pleasure, such as those projected between officers of small means and the notorious flirts of a garrison-town, which, it is pretty well understood, are only designed to last until the regiment is moved to fresh quarters, or till Providence provides the fair coquette with a more handsome or more substantial lover. These, with many others, which it is unnecessary to enumerate, are various species of engagements differentiated according to the nature of their duration. But the division of engagements with which society is most familiar, and the one which will occur to all parental minds as the most important, is the simple division of them into Long and Short. The genuine old-fashioned Long Engagement, of that life-long type with which our grandmothers and great-aunts were familiar, has happily almost ceased to exist. Any woman belonging to the professional ranks of the middle-class, who is more than fifty years old, will be able to recall several instances of men, generally Fellows of Colleges, who, when young, contracted engagements which they were unable to fulfil until they had reached that time of life at which it is not very usual, or very seemly, either to marry or to be given in marriage. Such instances of life-long engagements were by no means rare fifty years ago. The College Fellow of twenty-five, having engaged himself to a young girl of twenty, and having no sure expectation of patronage outside of his College, could not then, as now, cut himself adrift from his academical ties, and start forth to make his fortune independently by tuition, journalism, or the public service. Such extra-academical means of making use of an academical education were then comparatively unknown or unpromising. The avenues whereby a gentleman of liberal education could enter the salaried sphere of existence were then comparatively few, and still almost confined to the "three liberal professions." The really well-paid schoolmasterships were then very few; there was no Haileybury, no Radley, no Bradfield; there were no professorships at King's College, London; and no inspectorships of schools. The young Fellow who had taken orders had nothing to look to but a College living; so he waited on, perhaps for ten, perhaps for twenty, or even thirty years, until his youthful ardor had cooled down into a quiet, bookish sort of attachment, and his betrothed had come to look forward to her marriage rather with pride than with passion, as the event which would one day give her the privilege of at least secure her the monopoly of nursing his declining years.

Such long engagements as this are now extremely rare; one scarcely ever hears of a couple being engaged twenty years, and the friends of a young fiancée are generally rather disgusted if she remains unmarried so many months. Any engagement which lasts over two years is now called a long engagement; and one which extends to five years is reckoned a melancholy and very middle-class affair. Long engagements, in fact, even in the modern sense of the term, are confined almost entirely to the middle ranks of the community. They are nearly as much a middle-class institution as early dining or Dissent. A superhuman assiduity, a dragon-like watchfulness and wonderful tact on the part of the mothers of May Fair, co-operating with the pride that a poor young man feels, or with the love of his luxuries that a moderately rich young man cherishes, will generally prevent matters from coming to such a pass that a girl in this rank of life entangles herself with a man who cannot offer her an adequate establishment. But, as a rule, there is no need for such influences. The daughters of May Fair are, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, almost as keen as their mothers in the competition for good partis. Unless some strange oversight has been made in the choice of their companions and instructors, or unless opportunities of inculcating the Belgravian code have been scandalously neglected, these young ladies, by the time they have been presented, are as determined not to offend against those precepts of the code which relate to love and matrimony as to observe those which relate to dress and conversation. And even in the hundredth case, the mother of May Fair is not checkmated or dragged into suffering a long engagement. If the girl is young, and her chances of making a good match are still favorable, the proposal is peremptorily forbidden, and some of the thousand available measures are taken to prevent the fox and goose from meeting again. But if she is becoming passée, and the suitor is tolerably well connected, a virtue is made of necessity. Either an allowance is made to the girl, or else, more ingeniously, the wire-pullers are set to work, and it is hard if some commissionership or other public office cannot be obtained, and thus the deficiencies of the suitor's purse remedied out of the Consolidated Fund. And thus it happens that long engagements are almost unknown in the upper ranks, and are more commonly found in a somewhat lower stratum of society.

HERRICK.

THERE are few poets who are more loved when known, and few of equal power who are less widely known than Robert Herrick. Antiquarians find large gleanings of obsolete customs and old-world folk lore among his pages. The music of his verse has drawn out answering melodies from musical composers. And the poets of England have never failed to express their sense of the charm that hangs about his fanciful and graceful lyrics.

"Herrick," says Hartley Coleridge, "was the laureate of flowers and perfumes." "Herrick,"—and this is praise from Elizabeth Barrett Browning,—"the Ariel of poets, sucking 'where the bee sucks' from the heart of Nature, and reproducing the fragrance idealized." What can describe more happily than these words, the sweet breath of the "Hesperides"? Herrick himself gives its argument:

"I sing of Brooks, of Blossoms, Birds, and Bowers,
Of April, May, of June, and July-Flowers:
I sing of May-poles, Hock-carts, Walsalls, Wakes,
Of Bride-grooms, Brides, and of their Bridall-Cakes,
I write of Youth, of Love, and have Access
By these, to sing of cleanly-Wantonness.
I sing of Dewes, of Raines, and piece by piece,
Of Balme, of Oyle, of Spice, and Amber-Grace:
I sing of Times-translating; and I write
How Roses first came Red, and Lillies White:
I write of Groves, of Twilights, and I sing
The Court of Mab, and of the Faerie-King.
I write of Hell; I sing (and ever shall)
Of Heaven, and hope to have it after all."

But Ariel has sucked not only of the honey-dew of Paradise, but from any nearest flower, however poisonous, and hence the reason that he has now only a partial fame. Herrick's collected poems are not a book for the drawing-room table; and a suggestion, made by Miss Mitford years ago, for a popular selection has yet to be carried out.

Nevertheless, we think that Mr. Hazlitt, in this new edition,* speaks more prudently than there is any need to speak, and does his author less than justice. "After all deductions which it is possible to make, what a noble salvage remains!" "A noble salvage," indeed! Why, the "salvage" is four fifths or more of the "Hesperides," and the whole of the "Noble Numbers." Again, he says Herrick "wrote almost as much as Carew, Lovelace, and Suckling united; and how much is there in his weed-choked garden which is comparable with their best compositions!" No Englishman is likely to forget Lovelace's "Althea" and "Lucasta," or Carew's "Disdain Returned," or Suckling's "Ballad upon a Wedding"; but, with these exceptions, how much have these poets ever written to compare with some fifty of the best of Herrick's songs? Mr. Hazlitt is a better editor than advocate. But fortunately Herrick can defend himself, and hold his own against them all.

Robert Herrick was born in London in the year 1591. His father, who died a year afterwards, was a goldsmith, but was sprung from a good old Leicestershire stock. Herrick was, as a boy, bound 'prentice to the goldsmith's trade, but was afterwards sent to Cambridge, was ordained, and, thanks to the patronage of Lord Exeter, received the living of Dean Prior in Devonshire. He was about as fit for the life of a country clergyman as Lawrence Sterne was a hundred years later. He hated the life, and he hated Devonshire:—

"More discontents I never had Since I was born than here;
Where I have been, and still am, sad,
In this dull Devonshire."

And then he had another hatred; he hated the Puritans,—and they, having as little love for him, ejected him from his living in 1648. There is one singular fact, of which Mr. Hazlitt does not seem aware, that at this very time the leading spirit among the Puritans of Lancashire was Richard Herrick (or Heyricke), a cousin of the poet's, and Warden of Manchester. "Crudelitas pro Christo pietas est" was one of his amiable sayings; and his cousin's ejection, if he ever heard of it, would then have seemed to him (he afterwards himself turned Royalist) a measure only too lenient for his sins. Meanwhile, the poet was leading a happier life in London than he ever did in Devonshire. He speaks of his return to London as to a home from "long and irksome banishment." He was poor, indeed, but he could earn bread by publishing his poems, and he had society and a sense of freedom, and "those lyric feasts" made with Ben Jonson "at the Sun, the Dog, the triple Tunne." Twelve years afterwards, however, and the times change, and the old vicarage is again at his disposal; so he goes back there, and there he dies in a ripe old age. Beyond these bare facts we know little of Herrick's outer life. It has even been matter of question whether he was ever married, and the date of his death is not precisely known.

Of the man himself, — his tastes and fancies, his hopes and passions, — his poems are the best and fullest expression. There is a gayety about them which scarcely ever fails. Nothing that is pleasurable comes amiss to him. He is fond of the classics, and translates or adapts his favorite passages from Anacreon, Horace, or Catullus. He delights in the rural sports and pastimes of the country folk among whom he lives. All flowers are dear to him, and he draws gallantries from rosebuds, and the tenderest of morals from the fading daffodil. He is more familiar with the world of fairies than any one since Shakespeare. He can string together complimentary conceits like the best courtier of the time; and, though it is too true that an unchastened fancy draws him down at times into miry paths, and leaves stains upon his minstrel's robes, yet often he soars upwards into the purest heights of faith and piety, and ranks among the sacred poets of his country. Pleasure might lead him astray, but he could always find pleasure in what was good.

The spirit of the age and of his party may share some little of the blame. His own best nature was the source of his noblest religious poems. Nor can we forget his own touching "Prayer for Absolution" :—

"For those, my unbaptized rhymes,
Writ in my wild unhallowed times;
For every sentence, clause, and word,
That's not inlaid with thee, my Lord;
Forgive me, God, and blot each line
Out of my book, that is not Thine.
But if amongst all, Thou find'st here one Worthy Thy benediction;
That one of all the rest shall be
The glory of my work and Thee."

Herrick's poems are as various in metre as in subject. Sometimes he confines himself to a single heroic couplet, more or less epigrammatic and expressive. Sometimes he uses mixed metres common to many of his contemporaries. Sometimes the music seems to flow from the words and to belong to them alone. How perfect, for instance, is this, — and we shall choose rather from among the graver poems :—

"Fair daffodils, we weep to see
You haste away so soon;
As yet the early rising sun
Has not attained his noon:
Stay, stay
Until the hastening day
Has run
But to the even-song;
And, having prayed together, we Will go with you along."

or, — and we quote from another poem of most tender beauty, — "To Primroses filled with morning dew" :—

"Speak, whispering younglings, and make known
The reason why
Ye droop and weep;
Is it for want of sleep
Or childish lullaby?
Or that ye have not seen as yet
The violet?
Or brought a kiss
From that sweet heart to this?"

No, no; — this sorrow shown
By your tears shed

Would have this lecture read, —
That things of greatest so of meanness worth,
Conceived with grief are, and with tears brought forth."

How exquisite is the fancy, — that the primroses may be weeping, because they "Have not seen as yet

The violet!"

But indeed these delicate fancies spring up constantly through Herrick's verses. His "Cherry Ripe" we all know, with its compliments to Julia; and, again, "The Captive Bee," and "The Funeral Rites of the Rose." Here, again, "To the Water Nymphs drinking at the Fountain" :—

"Reach with your whiter hands to me
Some crystal of the spring,
And I about the cup shall see
Fresh lilies flourishing.

"Or else, sweet Nymphs, do you but this;
To the glasses your lips enclose;
And I shall see by that one kiss
The water turned to wine."

Some lines "On Himself" have a singularly happy touch :—

"Weepe for the dead, for they have lost this light;
And weepe for me, lost in an endless night,
Or mourne, or make a marble verse for me
Who writ for many. Benedicite."

In the "Noble Numbers," or "Pious Pieces," as Herrick calls them, we miss, indeed, some of the grace of the "Hesperides," but we are without the faults which too often have disfigured that group of poems. If we have fewer golden apples, we are at least untempted by any forbidden fruit. There are many short sententious verses, but among them are poems of the greatest beauty and most earnest religious feeling. Of all George Herbert's poems, which can compare with Herrick's "Letanie to the Holy Spirit"? It is less fantastic, and, therefore, more pathetic than even Herbert's best :—

"In the houre of my distresse,
When temptations me oppress,
And when I my sins confesse,
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!"

Again, what a touching simplicity there is in his thanksgiving to God for his house :—

"Where thou my chamber for to ward
Hast set a guard
Of harmless thoughts, to watch and keep Me, while I sleep."

Again, what nobility of thought is thrown in his "To keep a true Lent," — which is not to be a mere outward fast, — but

"No: 't is a fast to dole
Thy sheaf of wheat
And meat
Unto the hungry soule.

"It is to fast from strife,
From old debate,
And hate;
And circumcise thy life.

"To show a heart grief-rent;
To starve thy sin
Not bin;
And that's to keep thy Lent."

Here, too, are some fine lines in conclusion of his little poem "To finde God" :—

"Tell me the motes, dust, sands and speares
Of corn, when Summer shakes his eares;
Show me that world of Starres, and whence
They noiselesse spill their influence:
This if thou canst; then show me Him
That rides the glorious Cherubim."

The two collections of the "Hesperides" and the "Noble Numbers" are here supplemented by an Appendix containing some pieces of but little interest, but others which we are glad to reclaim for Herrick. Some of these poems are undeniably Herrick's, but have not been included in any previous edition of his works; some are different versions of poems already printed; and some are poems attributed to him on various grounds. Of these last, the best is "The Fairy Queen," or "The Fairies Fegaries," as it has been variously called. It appears among the Percy Reliques and in other collections, and the author has never as yet been named. Certainly it is in Herrick's manner, and though there is no external evidence to support this theory of its authorship, it may perhaps not unfairly be attributed to him till any one else appears to claim it.

This edition, then, we may safely say is the most complete that has yet appeared of Herrick's poems. But the full collection once made, a careful selection is the next thing to be desired. Who will introduce Robert Herrick into a wider circle and enable him to share the popularity which is freely given to many a feebler poet, and less true a man?

CRABB ROBINSON'S DIARY.

If the late Mr. Crabb Robinson had contemplated these three goodly volumes, his breast would have heaved with gentle emotion, and he would have felt that he had not lived in vain. He always used to say of himself that in his long career he had done nothing. The point of the remark was that it contained an immense deal of truth. His long, leisurely life of ninety years has left little records beyond these jottings of diary and reminiscence. There are many persons now living who could write even a much better diary, only they are hardly likely to do so. Very few men care to preserve diaries for publication. Mr. Robinson had not a productive mind, but he had one of rare receptivity, with a precious vein of genuine Boswellism in it, and he was a master in the art, now nearly lost, of conversation. He was a man of limited means, and he moved within a limited range of society, but within these limits he achieved a high social position.

He was a man of great moderation and good sense. He went to the bar late in life because he had not enough money, and quitted it comparatively early, when he thought he had as much as he wanted. Still, he modestly admits, that though a barrister he was no lawyer. Though he made an opening on the Times and the Quarterly Review he did nothing in literature. Accident and good fortune and his own merit drew him while in active life into contact, and, in some cases, into close intimacy with many distinguished persons. Later in life he joined the Athenæum Club, assigning at the time no importance to the step, and he found that it immensely increased the circle of his acquaintance. A bachelor of simple tastes and of a generous disposition, he was able to do many kind things, and when money came to him at last largely by inheritance he was able to do munificent things. He was always a Liberal of the Liberals both in politics and theology, and with the bonhomie of his party he clung close to his friends, and his friends clung closely to him. Every one knew something more or less about Crabb Robinson, and his "Diary" has been received with the greatest avidity. In his ninety years he seems hardly ever to have made an omission of any remarkable incident, personage, or good saying that came to his knowledge. If such a rule were generally followed biography would be wealthy indeed; we almost shudder to think how wealthy. Dr. Sadler has gone very carefully and judiciously over the vast mass of papers that came into his hands, and forms a perfect repertory and magazine of good things. Mr. Robinson is a most amusing old Herodotus, and has, like that father of history, an infinite collection of stories. We shall not give much attention to his life beyond indicating its leading landmarks, and shall make a florilegium from its records.

He came of an humble stock, but claimed some affinity with the poet Crabbe. He entered an attorney's office and became clerk to Cowper's friend, Hill. Coming into a little property of a hundred a year, he determined to improve his mind and to travel. He spent some years in Germany, and made himself thoroughly master of the German language at a time when this was an intellectual distinction. Here he made also, though after a somewhat distant and stately fashion, his acquaintance with Goethe. His first English literary acquaintance of note was Mrs. Barbauld, who wrote those lines which Wordsworth wished were his, and which some people have repeated every night of their lives:—

"Life, we've been long together,
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather;
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear;
Perhaps 't will cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time;
Say not good night, but in some brighter clime Bid me good morning."

He got a brief engagement as foreign correspondent to the Times at Altona, and afterwards in Portugal, and for a short time he was their foreign editor. He became acquainted with Charles Lamb, who brought him into connection with Coleridge, Hazlitt, Wordsworth, and all that set. In fact, he comes in contact with an immense number of eminent people, and has always something noteworthy to say about them; but in a very large number of cases,—of course there are many exceptions,—he merely comes in contact with them and there is no lasting intimacy. With the Lake poets there was a sincere and prolonged friendship, though neither in poetry nor in religion had he much real community of feeling with them. Most years, also, he went abroad, but his descriptions of travel, which did not extend beyond the beaten track, are not so good as his personal sketches of the foreigners whom he met. We have a description of O'Connell in his Irish home highly favorable to the Liberator, of whom Robinson was an undisguised admirer. In Italy he became acquainted with "Walter Savage Landor,—half an eagle, half a gander," and his portraiture may be compared with Mr. Forster's elaborate work, being not quite so favorable. After his retirement from the bar he devoted himself with increased earnestness to society. He was fond of companionship, and he was himself most companionable, but he had little serious aim in life, and on the most important subjects his mind was always halting in a fog. His own views, concerning which he manifested some ambiguity, appear to have been distinctly Unitarian; latterly, he regularly attended one of their chapels. He was, however, fond of Anglican clergy of "Liberal" views, what he calls "clerical free-thinkers"; and their "liberalism" in conversation appears to have considerably transcended what they manifested in print.

He knew Robertson, of Brighton, very well, and his great friend, Lady Byron, the widow of the poet. Fully allowing the many noble and excellent qualities that Lady Byron possessed, from all we hear respecting this lady we shall think she possessed an eccentricity, self-will, and unwomanliness (not using the word in any extreme or unfavorable sense) which rendered her as bad a wife for the poet as the poet was a bad husband to her. We have here one very remarkable letter which Lady Byron writes respecting her husband, in which she seems to break that remarkable silence which she otherwise uniformly preserved. The following extract contains more original matter than all the Countess Guiccioli's two elaborate volumes. "Not merely from casual expressions but from the whole tenor of Lord Byron's feelings, I could not but conclude he was a believer in the inspiration of the Bible, and had the gloomiest Calvinistic tenets. To that unhappy view of the relation of the creature to the Creator I have always ascribed the misery of his life. It was impossible for me to doubt that, could he have been at once assured of pardon, his living faith in a moral duty and love of virtue ('I love the virtues which I cannot claim') would have conquered every temptation. Judge, then, how I must hate the creed which made him see God as an avenger, and not as a father. My own impressions were just the reverse, but could have little weight; and it was in vain to seek to turn his thoughts for long from that idée fixe with which he connected his physical peculiarity as a stamp. Instead of being made happier by any apparent good, he felt convinced that every blessing would be 'turned into a curse' to him. Who, possessed by such ideas, could lead a life of love and service to God or man? I may be pardoned for referring to his frequent expressions of the sentiment that I was only sent to show him the happiness he was forbidden to enjoy. You will now better understand why 'The Deformed Transformed' is too painful to me for discussion."

Mr. Robinson has also a very interesting anecdote of Wordsworth coming to him one day at Charles Lamb's, a number of the Edinburgh Review in his hand, and being exceedingly angry at the unfair attack on a young lord's poem, and prophesying that the young poet would do something. "Ah! if Byron had known that," said Lady Byron, "he would never have attacked Wordsworth."

There is something melancholy in reading of the last days of this life, prolonged to the ninety-second year. The "Diary" goes down to the year 1867, discussing an immense variety of matters, which are only as of yesterday in point of date, but which are here presented to us in an historical point of view and from a dead man's record, as if a whole chasm of time were interposed, — talk about our judges, such as Sir F. Pollock, Byles, Channell; talk of Miss Countess's breakfast parties and the men whom he met at the Athenæum, such as Dean Stanley, the Bishop of Oxford, Mr. Grote, and others; about poor Robson at the Olympic; very much talk about London University, to which he left a good deal of money. On every side his friends were dropping away from him through death; and though he made new ones, they were hardly equal in intellectual calibre to those of his youth. He could not go about in the streets without an attendant for fear of an accident or of garroters. Some of his last entries indicate mortification and dispiritedness; he was haunted by the ill-founded suspicion that he was "no longer a desirable companion." His concluding entry of these many manuscript volumes is, "But I feel incapable to go on"; and before another week he passed away.

Here are about a score of passages, which we quote from a larger selection, as well worth transplanting.

First Interview with Goethe. — "Goethe lived in a large and handsome house, that is, for Weimar. Before the door of his study was marked in mosaic SALVE. On our entrance he rose, and with rather a cool and distant air beckoned us to take seats. As he fixed his burning eye on the friend who took the lead, I had his profile before me, and this was the case during the whole of our twenty minutes' stay. He was then about fifty-two years of age and was beginning to be corpulent. He was, I think, one of the most oppressively handsome men I ever saw. My feeling of awe was heightened. . . . Goethe sat in precisely the same attitude, and I had precisely the same view of his side face. The conversation was quite insignificant. My companions talked about themselves, — one about his youth of adversity and strange adventures. Goethe smiled with, as I thought, the benignity of condescension. When we were dismissed, and I was in the open air, I felt as if a weight were removed from my breast. Goethe has often been reproached for his hauteur. I believe, however, that this demeanor was necessary for self-defence. It was his only protection against the intrusion which otherwise would have robbed him and the world of a large portion of his life."

Horne Tooke. — "Anthony Robinson related an anecdote of Horne Tooke, showing the good-humor and composure of which he was capable. Holcroft was with him at a third person's table. They had a violent quarrel. At length Holcroft said, as he rose to leave the room, 'Mr. Tooke, I tell you you are a — scoundrel, and I always thought you so.' Tooke detained him and said, 'Mr. Holcroft, some time ago you asked me to come and dine with you; do tell me what day it shall be.' Holcroft stayed."

Anecdote of a Dancing-Master. — "Fraser related a humorous story of his meeting in a stage-coach with a little fellow who was not only very smart and buckish in his dress but also a pretender to science and philosophy. He spoke of having been at Paris, and of having read Helvetius, Voltaire, &c., and was very fluent in his declamation on the origin of ideas, self-love, and the other favorite doctrines of the new school. He said, 'I have no objection to confess myself a materialist.' On this an old man, who had listened for a long time to the discourse, and had more than once betrayed symptoms of dissatisfaction, could not contain himself any more, 'D——n, that's too bad! You have the impudence to say you are a materialist when I know you are a dancing-master.'"

Anecdote of the late Lord Cranworth. — "My immediate senior on the circuit was Henry Cooper. He was very far my superior in talent for business, indeed, in some respects he was an extraordinary man. His memory, his cleverness were striking; but so was his want of judgment, and it often happened that his clever and amusing hits told as much against as for his client. One day he was entertaining the whole court when Rolfe (afterwards Lord Chancellor) whispered to me, "How clever that is! How I thank God I am not so clever!"

Hume on Shakespeare. — "On my noticing

Hume's obvious preference of the French tragedians, Coleridge exclaimed, 'Hume comprehended as much of Shakespeare as an apothecary's phial would, placed under the Falls of Niagara.'

Waterloo. — "A more uninteresting country or one more fit for 'a glorious history,' being flat and almost without trees, than that round Waterloo cannot be imagined. I saw it some years afterwards, when ugly monuments were erected there; and I can bear witness to the fact of the great resemblance which the aspect of the neighborhood of Waterloo bears to a village a mile from Cambridge on the Bury road."

The Saying of a Busy Man. — "He who calls on me does me an honor; he who does not call on me does me a favor."

Wordsworth in his own Neighborhood. — "I may here mention a singular illustration of the maxim, 'A prophet is not without honor save in his own country.' Mr. Hutton, a very gentlemanly and seemingly intelligent man, asked me, 'Is it true as I have heard reported, that Mr. Wordsworth ever wrote verses?'"

"Your Obedient Servant." — "Hamond went to France, having declined an offer by Sergeant Rough, who would have taken him as his private secretary to Demerara. He assigned as a reason that he should be forced to live in the daily practice of insincerity by subscribing himself the humble servant of those towards whom he felt no humility."

Duke of Wellington. — "The Duke of Wellington was there, and I saw him looking at a portrait of the Duke of Marlborough. A lady was by his side. She pointed to the picture, and he smiled. The Duke of Wellington's face is not flexible or subtle, but is martial, that is, sturdy and firm."

Rome. — "'Sir,' said a king's messenger to me one day, 'don't believe what travellers tell about Rome: it is all a humbug. Rome is more like Wapping than any place I know.' 'That man is no fool,' said Flaxman, who laughed on my repeating this. 'Of course he could not understand, perhaps he did not see, the antiquities; but some of the finest are in places that resemble Wapping in general appearance.'"

Sir Thomas Lawrence. — "Jacob being restless, Mrs. Patterson said, 'I fear, Mr. Lawrence, Jacob is the worst sitter you ever had.' 'O no, ma'am, I have had a worse.' 'Ay, you mean the king,' said the lady. (Lawrence had been speaking of George III. as a bad sitter.) 'O no!' said Lawrence; 'it was a Newfoundland dog!' The lady was not a little affronted."

Lord Jeffrey. — "At seven I dined with Rolfe. An interesting party, — in all twelve. Among them was Jeffrey, once editor of the Edinburgh Review. Jeffrey is a sharp and clever-looking man; and, in spite of my dislike to his name, he did not on the whole displease me. His treatment of Wordsworth would not allow me to like him, had he been greater by far than he was. And therefore when he said, 'I was always an admirer of Wordsworth,' I could not repress the unseemly remark, 'You had a singular way of showing your admiration.'"

Clarkson. — "I asked Clarkson whether he thought of the fate of his soul hereafter. He said he had no time; he thought only of the slaves in Barbadoes."

Anecdote. — "I have heard of a lady, by birth, being reduced to cry 'Muffs to sell' for a subsistence. She used to go out a-nights with her face hid up in her cloak; and then she would in the faintest voice utter her cry. Somebody passing heard her cry, 'Muffs to sell! — muffs to sell! Oh! I hope nobody hears me.'" Southey. — "I walked out with Wordsworth. We met with Dr. Arnold. We talked of Southey. Wordsworth spoke of him with great feeling and affection. He said, 'It is painful to see how completely dead Southey is become to all but books. He is amiable and obliging; but when he gets away from his books he seems restless, and as if out of his element. I therefore hardly see him for years together.' Now all this I had myself observed. Rogers also had noticed it. With Wordsworth it was a subject of sorrow, not of reproach. Dr. Arnold said afterwards, 'What was said of Mr. Southey alarmed me. I could not help saying to myself, 'Am I in danger of becoming like him? Shall I ever lose my interest in things and retain an interest in books only?'" 'H,' said Wordsworth, 'I must lose my interest in one of them, I would rather give up books than men.'"

Wordsworth. — "Mr. Wordsworth ought to have been at Buckingham Palace at the Queen's Ball, to which he received a formal invitation. 'The Lord Chamberlain presents his compliments. He is commanded by Her Majesty to invite Mr. William Wordsworth to a ball at Buckingham Palace, on Monday, the 24th July, — ten o'clock. Full dress.' To which he pleaded as an apology for non-attendance the non-arrival of the invitation (query command?) in time. He dated his answer from this place: 'The Island, Windermere'; and that would explain the impossibility. But a man in his seventy-fourth year would, I suppose, be excused by royalty for not travelling three hundred miles to attend a dance, even if a longer notice had been given. [He subsequently went to such a party, and enjoyed it much.]"

A Mot of one Sylvester. — "When people tire of business in town they go to retire in the country."

Mr. A. H. Layard as a Boy. — "Tuesday I had at breakfast Nineveh Layard, whom the others came to meet. You will remember your son's having spoken of this high-spirited lad whom he once dined with, and used to meet in my chambers. His uncle accused me of misleading him. I believe I did set his mind in motion, and excited in him tastes and a curiosity which now will not be matter of reproach, seeing that the issue has already been so remarkable. His adventures in Asia terminated in the discovery of the Nineveh antiquities, which have given him a place in the future history of art. But, more than that, he has had the means of developing such personal qualities that he has been put into a place which may lead to his one day occupying a prime position in our political institutions. He has been appointed Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs: he will now show what is in him. This is a start that of course delights his hopeful and alarms his timid friends."

Harriet Martineau. — "She can write a fair leader and plan something useful for her neighbors, while her voice is lost from debility."

Kenyon and the Brownings. — "John Kenyon has the face of a Benedictine monk and the joyous talk of a good fellow. From him Mr. and Mrs. Browning received legacies amounting to more than ten thousand pounds, and R. D. Porter between six and seven thousand."

Samuel Rogers.—"The acquaintance I have seen most of is Samuel Rogers. It is marvellous how well he bears his affliction. He knows that he will never be able to stand on his legs again; yet his cheerfulness and even vivacity have undergone no diminution. His wealth enables him to partake of many enjoyments which could not otherwise be possessed. Yesterday I took a drive with him through Lord Chichester's park. He has had a carriage made for him which deserves to be taken as a model for all in his condition. The back falls down and forms an inclined plane. The sofa-chair in which he sits is pushed in; the back is then closed, and a side door is opened to the seat in which his servant sits when no friend is with him."

These are select items from volumes which are exceedingly rich in literary ana, and which will be very helpful to the future historian in constructing a literary history of the century.

FOREIGN NOTES.

MR. T. W. ROBERTSON has a new comedy on the tapis.

ENGLISH critics are very severe on Mr. Boucicault's last play,—"Formosa."

THE question of erecting a theatre in Paris, where Shakespeare's works can be given in English is being discussed.

MR. DUNHAM's bust of Leigh Hunt is to be placed over the poet's grave with appropriate ceremonies next month.

A NEW volume of poems by Gerald Massey, who has long been silent, will be very welcome on both sides of the Atlantic.

THE excitement in England over the international boat-race has died away before the greater excitement produced by Mrs. Stowe's "True Story of Lady Byron" in the September number of Macmillan's Magazine.

THE last number of "The Lady's Own Paper," a London journal of considerable literary pretension, contains the following delicious announcement, "The Hon. John Bigelow, author of the 'Biglow Papers,' has been appointed editor in chief of the New York Times. Mr. Bigelow was American Minister in Paris during Mr. Lincoln's presidency, and previous to that he had been editor of the New York Evening Post."

THE Belgian papers speak of a curious wager made the other day by a young man of Antwerp. He engaged to swim on his back in the Scheldt for a quarter of an hour with his spectacles on. Scarcely, however, had he swum a few yards when the sun, came out, and acting on the spectacles as on a magnifying-glass, gave him such pain that he was obliged to swim to shore before completing his task. It is said (though that might have been expected) that the unfortunate swimmer has not only lost his bet, but his eyesight as well.

A NEW specimen of the numerous eccentricities of Richard Wagner, the inventor of "the music of the future," is given in a book lately published by Herr Mendes, under the title of "Wagner at Home." There is a room in Wagner's house, says the author, with a gorgeously decorated ceiling and tapestry of leather embroidered with gold. On the walls are portraits of Goethe, Schiller, and Beethoven. The two hovers there is nothing but a looking-glass. On turning to Wagner for an explanation, the musician placed himself in front of the glass, in which his face was reflected, thus supplying the deficiency. It is added that this is the only kind of portrait of himself that Wagner allows to be kept in his house.

THE Russian papers announce the death in Siberia of John Gorbaczewski, the last of the "decabrists," or members of the conspiracy formed against the Emperor Nicholas in December, 1825. Gorbaczewski was one of the most active leaders of this conspiracy, and he was sentenced to death in 1826, but Nicholas commuted the sentence to hard labor in Siberia for life. In 1840 he was relieved from the more severe part of his punishment, and settled in Petrovsk, where he soon became universally popular among the exiles, whose sufferings he was frequently enabled to alleviate through the influence he had gained with the governor and other officials. In 1856 the "decabrists" were permitted to return to their homes, but Gorbaczewski had made so many friends in Siberia that he preferred to remain. The principal papers of St. Petersburg and Moscow all speak with great admiration of his abilities and character.

THE Gaulois publishes, à propos of the recent marriage of Prince Pierre Buonaparte, with the daughter of a brass-founder, a curious letter from Prince Lucien Buonaparte, his father, on being directed by Napoleon I. to divorce his wife. The letter is addressed to M^{de}me. Letitia Buonaparte, and is dated 29th of May, 1810. Lucien says that he married "because he had a right to do so, and before he to whose elevation he chiefly contributed became emperor." "It is ridiculous and improper," he proceeds, "for a statesman, a minister, and an ambassador to be treated like a street-boy; both my second and my first wife have deserved by their virtues not to have their misfortunes cast in their teeth. Jerome might have been required to divorce his wife, for he was a minor when he married. The Emperor might also, so long as he was childless, make a sacrifice for his people by dissolving his marriage; but I have seven children and an excellent wife, and therefore have no reason to do anything of the kind."

A FEW weeks since a party of excursionists from Chatham had been spending the day in the vicinity of Mr. Dickens's residence, Gad's Hill, near Rochester, when on their return in the evening, they fell in with a couple of dancing bears, which were going through their performances in the road in front of Mr. Dickens's house. The enjoyments of the day having had their customary effects on the excursionists, one of the men, more elated than his companions, insisted on joining the bears in their performances, and dancing with them, the keepers in vain attempting to prevent him. At length with the intention of causing him to desist, the keeper removed the muzzle of one of the bears, but this failed to stop the dance. By this time a great crowd had assembled, when Mr. Dickens, seeing the serious turn matters were assuming, appeared on the scene, and himself assisted in remuzzling the bear, at the same time good-humoredly addressing the crowd and restoring peace between the enraged keepers of the bears and the author of the too serious frolic.

AN invention has been produced in Paris for set-which seems to deserve attention. According to the account, the "compteur mécanique," or calculating machine, not only reckons the distance traversed, but indicates as well the exact sum of money due to the driver. "Two dials are fixed on the back of the driving-seat; one contains a clock, while on the other the distance travelled is indicated by a hand acted on by the wheels; it is entirely beyond the control either of cabby or his 'fare.' The apparatus is put in and out of gear by the lowering and raising of a lever bearing the word 'libre,' which is only visible when the cab is empty and the 'compteur' consequently unemployed. There is no danger of the driver omitting to lower this lever as soon as he is hired, it being evidently his interest to have the greatest possible distance paid for; while, on the other hand, it would be useless for him to try to make a fictitious fare by driving about with his 'compteur' in motion, for a card in the interior of the machine registers the distance traversed during the day, and the money to be accounted for to the cab owner. The great difficulty has hitherto been to find a means of marking the time spent in visits, shopping, blocks in the streets, &c., when the wheels and the telltale are necessarily at a standstill. M. Bruet, the inventor of the new register, has now overcome this difficulty by an ingenious contrivance, by means of which, as soon as the wheels cease to act on the indicator, the clock which forms part of the machine keeps the telltale hand moving at a rate which credits the driver with eight kilometres (about five miles) an hour, or 2 francs, according to the Paris tariff."

AN ingenious observation was made a short time since to the effect that until the invention of railroads mankind had made no real advance in locomotion since the days of the Pharaohs. The same thing, remarks the Pall Mall Gazette, may be said of the process of writing, which is carried on still in the same clumsy way that it was in the days of the scribe who heard all the words at the mouth of his master and "wrote them with ink in a book." Think seriously about it, and what can be more cumbrous or vexatious than our mode of writing? It involves the making of ink, the making of pens, the procuring of paper, and of blotting paper or pounce, the possession of a separate receptacle for the ink, the carrying of the pen over to dip it into the ink, the constant interruption of the flow of thought to replenish the flow of ink, the longer interruption at the end of each page to blot the writing or cover it with pounce. Then observe the varieties of torment that may be introduced into this already complex operation. The pen may be bad; the paper may be bad; the ink may be bad, — bad in color, or too thin or too thick, or may (like copying ink) have a vile smell, or (like copying ink again) may remain sticky and smeary for hours after it is written with. Each of these possibilities creates some fresh nuisance for the writer and interferes with his comfort, and therefore with the ease and effect of his composition. His pen leaves a pathway of blots on the table between the inkpot and the paper, or has to be shaken out by his side after each dip to the disadvantage of the carpet. If not, the writing suffers. Every i is surmounted by a round pond, and the tails of all l's, g's, and other caudate letters form little lakes of ink, to be dissipated into broad lagoons on the pressure of the blotting-paper. Then think of hairs in your pen of black smears on the side of your finger, of pens digging into the paper, or gliding innocuously over greasy spots. In a word, the pen and ink are thoroughly antiquated, and fit for a place in the Kensington Museum, near the antiquated Italian coaches. Who will rise up and give us a pencil which shall do all the good that the pen and ink do, with none of their drawbacks?

MARSHAL NIEL, whose death France is now mourning, was born in 1802. He entered the Polytechnic in 1821, which he quitted with the grade of sub-lieutenant in 1823, to enter the Engineer and Artillery School of Application at Metz. Young Niel took part in the African campaign of 1836, and was present at the siege of Constantina. At the early age of forty-one he attained the rank of Colonel of Engineers, and in 1849 was intrusted with the command of that branch of the service during the expedition to Rome and the siege of that capital. Niel had the gratification of effecting a breach in the ancient walls of the city without injuring a single relic of its past glory. In acknowledgment of that eminent service, General Niel was commissioned to take the keys of Rome to the Pope, then at Gaëta. In 1854 a corps d'armée under Baraguay d'Hilliers was despatched to the Baltic, for the purpose of destroying the Russian fortresses on the island of Aland. Niel commanded the Engineers, and it was to his skill and scientific tactics that the fall of Bomarsund after a few days' siege is to be attributed. In the following year the Emperor commissioned his recently appointed aide-de-camp to start for Sebastopol. Niel, after an accurate survey, recognized that no siege had ever been undertaken under such unfavorable circumstances. Not only had the fortress, ammunition, stores, and defences accumulated during seventy years, but the guns belonging to the fleet were served by fifteen thousand sailors admirably trained to the service of the artillery. Niel decided on the investment of the place, pointed out the bastion Kornikoff as the key of the fortress, which bastion, since known as the Malakoff, has acquired historic renown. In 1857 General Niel was raised to the rank of senator, and was further honored by being designated to represent his sovereign at the marriage of Prince Napoleon with the young daughter of the future King of Italy. At Magenta, Niel took a prominent part in the honors of the day, and at Solferino it was due to his initiative that at a moment when the overwhelming numbers of the enemy appeared to menace the right wing of the French, by adopting a favorite movement of the first Emperor, he consolidated his forces on the centre of the Austrian army, and by this brilliant charge turned the wavering fortunes of the day, and carried off a decisive victory. On the field, Napoleon III. addressing Niel as Maréchal de France, promptly rewarded a service which he fully acknowledged in his despatch to the Empress published in the Moniteur of the following morning. From Toulouise, where Marshal Niel commanded the 6th Corps d'Armée, the emperor summoned him, in January, 1867, to his Cabinet as Minister of War, in order to carry out the vast scheme he had planned, of reorganizing the army and creating the Garde Mobile. It is due to his prodigious activity that the French army, supplied with a newly invented weapon, and doubled in number, has in the space of eighteen months been completely transformed, and now placed in a condition to meet the increased forces of its formidable neighbors and rival

MRS. MERRIDEW'S FORTUNE.

I.

THERE are two houses in my neighborhood which illustrate so curiously two phases of life, that everybody on the Green, as well as myself, has been led into the habit of classing them together. The first reason of this of course is, that they stand together; the second, that they are as unlike in every way as it is possible to conceive. They are about the same size, with the same aspect, the same green circle of garden surrounding them; and yet as dissimilar as if they had been brought out of two different worlds. They are not on the Green, though they are undeniably a part of Dinglefield, but stand on the Mercot Road, a broad country road with a verdant border of turf and fine trees shadowing over the hedgerows. The Merridews live in the one, and in the other are Mrs. Spencer and Lady Isabella. The house of the two ladies is as perfect in all its arrangements as if it were a palace: a silent, soft, fragrant, dainty place, surrounded by lawns like velvet; full of flowers in perfect bloom, the finest kinds, succeeding each other as the seasons change. Even in autumn, when the winds are blowing, you never see a fallen leaf about, or the least symptom of untidiness. They have enough servants for everything that is wanted, and the servants are as perfect as the flowers, — noiseless maids and soft-voiced men. Everything goes like machinery, with an infallible regularity; but like machinery oiled and deadened, which emits no creak nor groan. This is one of the things upon which Mrs. Spencer specially prides herself. The two ladies of the house are not related; they are united only by that closest bond of friendship which often, in despite of all popular fallacies, binds two women. Mrs. Spencer is very well off; Lady Isabella not so rich. They never make any great demonstration of their attachment for each other, but are as sisters in their house. Yet, perhaps, not precisely as sisters; rather — if the reader will not laugh — like husband and wife.

And just across two green luxuriant hedges, over a lawn which is not like velvet, you come to the Merridews'. It is possible, if you passed it on a summer day, that, notwithstanding the amazing superiority of the other, you would pause longer, and be more amused with a glance into the enclosure of the latter house. The lawn is not the least like velvet; probably it has not been mown for three weeks at least, and the daisies are irrepressible. But there, tumbled down in the midst of it, are a bunch of little children in pinafores, — "all the little ones," as Janet Merridew, the eldest daughter, expresses herself, with a certain soft exasperation. I would rather not undertake to number them or record their names, but there they are, a knot of rosy, round-limbed, bright-eyed, living things, some dark and some fair, with an amazing impartiality; but all chattering as best they can in nursery language, with rings of baby laughter, and baby quarrels, and musings of infinite solemnity. Once tumbled out here, where no harm can come to them, nobody takes any notice of the little ones. Nurse, sitting by serenely under a tree, works all the morning through, and there is so much going on indoors to occupy the rest.

Mr. and Mrs. Merridew, I need not add, had a large family, — so large that their house overflowed, and when the big boys were at home from school, was scarcely habitable. Janet, indeed, did not hesitate to express her sentiments very plainly on the subject. She was just sixteen, and a good child, but full of the restless longing for something, she did not know what, and visionary discontent with her surroundings, which is not uncommon at her age. She had a way of paying me visits, especially during the holidays, and speaking more frankly on domestic subjects than was at all expedient. She would come in, in summer, with a tap on the glass which always startled me, through the open window, and sink down on a sofa and utter a long sigh of relief. "O Mrs. Musgrave!" she would say, "what a good thing you never had any children": taking off, as she spoke, the large hat which it was one of her grievances to be compelled to wear.

"Is that because you have too many at home?" I said.

"O yes, far too many; fancy, ten! Why should poor papa be burdened with ten of us, and so little money to keep us all on? And then a house gets so untidy with so many about. Mamma does all she can, and I do all I can; but how is it possible to keep it in order? When I look across the hedges to Mrs. Spencer and Lady Isabella's, and see everything so nice and so neat, I could die of envy. And you are always so shady, and so cool, and so pleasant here."

"It is easy to be neat and nice when there is nobody to put things out of order," said I; "but when you are as old as I am, Janet, you will get to think that one may buy one's neatness too dear."

"O, I delight in it!" cried the girl. "I should like to have everything nice, like you; all the books and papers just where one wants them, and paper-knives on every table, and ink in the ink-bottles, and so dust anywhere. You are not so dreadfully particular as Mrs. Spencer and Lady Isabella. I think I should like to see some litter on the carpet or on the lawn now and then for a change. But O, if you could only see our house! And then our things are so shabby: the drawing-room carpet is all faded with the sun, and mamma will never have the blinds properly pulled down. And Selina, the housemaid, has so much to do. When I scold her, mamma always stops me, and bids me recollect we can't be as nice as you other people, were we to try ever so much. There is so much to do in our house. And then those dreadful big boys!"

"My dear," said I, "ring the bell, and we will have some tea; and you can tell Jane to bring you some of that strawberry jam you are so fond of—and forget the boys—"

"As if one could," said Janet, "when they are all over the place,—into one's very room, if one did not mind; their boots always either dusty or muddy, and O, the noise they make! Mamma won't make them dress in the evenings, as I am sure she should. How are they ever to learn to behave like Christians, Mrs. Musgrave, if they are not obliged to dress and come into the drawing-room at night?"

"I dare say they would run out again and spoil their evening clothes, my dear," I said.

"That is just what mamma says," cried Janet; "but is n't it dreadful to have always to consider everything like that? Poor mamma, too,—often I am quite angry, and then I think—perhaps she would like a house like Mrs. Spencer and Lady Isabella's as well as I should, if we had money enough. I suppose in a nice big house with heaps of maids and heaps of money, and everything kept tidy for you, one would not mind even the big boys."

"I think under those circumstances most people would be glad to have them," said I.

"I don't understand how anybody can like boys," said Janet, with reflective yet contemptuous emphasis. "A baby-boy is different. When they are just the age of little Harry, I adore them; but these great long-legged creatures, in their big boots! And yet, when they're nicely dressed in their evening things," she went on, suddenly changing her tone, "and with a flower in their coats,—Jack has actually got an evening-coat, Mrs. Musgrave, he is so tall for his age,—they look quite nice; they look such gentlemen," Janet concluded, with a little sisterly enthusiasm. "O, how dreadful it is to be so poor!"

"I am sure you are very fond of them all the same," said I, "and would break your heart if anything should happen to them."

"O, well, of course, now they are there one would not wish anything to happen," said Janet. "What did you say I was to tell Jane, Mrs. Musgrave, about the tea? There now! Selina has never the time to be as nice as that,—and Richards, you know, our man—Don't you think, really, it would be better to have a nice clean parlor-maid than a man that looks like a cobbler? Mrs. Spencer and Lady Isabella are always going on about servants,—that you should send them away directly when they do anything wrong. But, you know, it makes a great difference having a separate servant for everything. Mamma always says, 'They are good to the children, Janet,' or, 'They are so useful, and don't mind what they do.' We put up with Selina because, though she's not a good housemaid, she is quite willing to help in the nursery; and we put up with nurse because she gets through so much sewing; and even the cook—O dear, dear! it is so disagreeable. I wish I was—anybody but myself."

Just at this moment my maid ushered in Mrs. Merridew, hastily attired in a hat she wore in the garden, and a light shawl wrapped round her. There was an anxious look in her face, which indeed was not very unusual there. She was a little flushed, either by walking in the sunshine or by something on her mind.

"You here, Janet," she said, when she had shaken hands with me, "when you promised me to practise an hour after luncheon? Go, my dear, and do it now."

"It is so hot. I never can play in the middle of the day; and O mamma, please, it is so pleasant here," pleaded Janet, nestling herself close into the corner of the sofa.

"Let her stay till we have had some tea," I said. "I know she likes my strawberry jam."

Mrs. Merridew consented, but with a sigh; and then it was that I saw clearly she must have something on her mind. She did not smile, as usual, with the indulgent mother's smile, half disapproving yet unwilling to thwart the child. On the contrary, there was a little constraint in her air as she sat down, and Janet's enjoyment of the jam vexed her, and brought a little wrinkle to her brow. "One would think you had not eaten anything all day," she said, with a vexed tone, and evidently was impatient of her daughter's presence, and wished her away.

"Nothing so nice as this," said Janet, with the frank satisfaction of her age; and she went on eating her bread and jam quite composedly, until Mrs. Merridew's patience was exhausted.

"I cannot have you stay any longer," she said, at length. "Go and practise now, while there is no one in the house—"

"O mamma!" said Janet, beginning to expostulate; but was stopped short by a look in her mother's eye. Then she gathered herself up reluctantly, and left the paradise of my little tea-table with the jam. She went out pouting, trailing her great hat after her; and had to be stopped as she stepped into the blazing sunshine, and commanded to put it on. "It is only a step," said the provoking girl, pouting more and more. And poor Mrs. Merridew looked so worried, and heated and uncomfortable, as she went out and said a few energetic words to her naughty child. Poor soul! Ten different wills to manage and keep in subjection to her own, besides all the other cares she had upon her shoulders. And that big girl who should have been a help to her, standing pouting and disobedient between the piano she did not care for, and the jam she loved.—Sometimes such a little altercation gives one a glimpse into an entire life.

"She is such a child," Mrs. Merridew said, coming in with an apologetic, anxious smile on her face. She had been fretted and vexed, and yet she would not show it to lessen my opinion of her girl. Then she sank down wearily into that corner of the sofa from which Janet had been so unwillingly expelled. "The truth is, I wanted to speak to you," she said, "and could not when she was here. Poor Janet! I am afraid I was cross, but I could not help it. Something has occurred to-day which has put me out."

"I hope it is something I can help you in," I said.

"That is why I have come: you are always so kind; but it is a strange thing I am going to ask you this time," she said, with a wistful glance at me. "I want to go to town for a day on business of my own; and I want it to be supposed that it is business of yours."

The fact was, it did startle me for the moment, — and then I reflected like lightning, so quick was the process (I say this that nobody may think my first feeling hard), what kind of woman she was, and how impossible that she should want to do anything that one need be ashamed of. "That is very simple," I said.

Then she rose hastily and came up to me and gave me a sudden kiss, though she was not a demonstrative woman. "You are always so understanding," she said, with the tears in her eyes; and thus I was committed to stand by her, whatever her difficulty might be.

"But you shan't do it in the dark," she went on; "I am going to tell you all about it. I don't want Mr. Merridew to know, and in our house it is quite impossible to keep anything secret. He is on circuit now; but he would hear of 'the day mamma went to town' before he had been five minutes in the house. And so I want you to go with me, you dear soul, and to let me say I went with you."

"That is quite simple," I said again; but I did feel that I should like to know what the object of the expedition was.

"It is a long story," she said, "and I must go back and tell you ever so much about myself before you will understand. I have had the most dreadful temptation put before me to-day. O, such a temptation! Resisting it is like tearing one's heart in two; and yet I know I ought to resist. Think of our large family, and poor Charles's many disappointments, and then, dear Mrs. Musgrave, read that."

It was a letter written on a large square sheet of thin paper which she thrust into my hand: one of those letters one knows a mile off, and recognizes as lawyers' letters, painful or pleasant, as the case may be; but more painful than pleasant generally. I read it, and you may judge of my astonishment to find that it ran thus: —

"DEAR MADAM, — We have the pleasure to inform you that our late client, Mr. John Babington, deceased on the 10th of May last, has appointed you by his will his residuary legatee. After all his special bequests are paid, including an annuity of a hundred a year to his mother, with remainder to Miss Babington, his only surviving sister, there will remain a sum of about £10,000, at present excellently invested on landed security, and bearing interest at four and a half per cent. By Mr. Babington's desire, precautions have been taken to bind it strictly to your separate use, so that you may dispose of it by will or otherwise, according to your pleasure, for which purpose we have accepted the office of your trustees, and will be happy to enter fully into the subject, and put you in possession of the legacy, as soon as you can favor us with a private interview.

"We are, Madam, your obedient servants,
"FOGEY, FEATHERHEAD, & DOWN."

"A temptation!" I cried; "but, my dear, it is a fortune; and it is delightful: it will make you quite comfortable. Why, it will be nearly five hundred a year."

I feel always safe in the way of calculating interest when it is anything approaching five per cent; five per cent is so easily counted, and of course four and a half cannot be much different: it took away my breath.

But Mrs. Merridew shook her head. "It looks so at the first glance," she said; "but when you hear my story you will think differently." And then she made a little uncomfortable pause. "I don't know whether you ever guessed it," she added, looking down and doubling a new hem upon her handkerchief, "but I was not Charles's equal when we married: perhaps you may have heard —?"

Of course I had heard: but the expression of her countenance was such that I put on a look of great amazement, and pretended to be much astonished, which I could see was a comfort to her mind.

"I am glad of that," she said, "for you know, — I could not speak so plainly to you if I did not feel that, though you are so quiet now, you must have seen a great deal of the world, — you know what a man is. He may be capable of marrying you, if he loves you, whatever your condition is, — but afterwards he does not like people to know. I don't mean I was his inferior in education, or anything of that sort," she added, looking up at me with a sudden uneasy blush.

"You need not tell me that," I said; and then another uneasiness took possession of her, lest I should think less highly than was right of her husband.

"Poor Charles!" she said; "it is scarcely fair to judge him as he is now. We have had so many cares and disappointments, and he has had to deny himself so many things, — and you may say, Here is his wife, whom he has been so good to, plotting to take away from him what might give him a little ease. But, O dear Mrs. Musgrave, you must hear before you judge!"

"I do not judge," I said; "I am sure you must have some very good reason; tell me what it is."

Then she paused, and gave a long sigh. She must have been about forty, I think, a comely, simple woman, not in any way a heroine of romance; and yet she was as interesting to me as if she had been only half the age, and deep in some pretty crisis of romantic distress. I don't object to the love-stories either: but middle age has its romances too.

"When I was a girl," said Mrs. Merridew, "I went to the Babingtons as Ellen's governess. She was about fifteen and I was not more than twenty, and I believe people thought me pretty. You will laugh at me, but I declare I have always been so busy all my life, that I have never had any time to think whether it was true; but one thing I know, that I was a very good governess. I often wish," she added, pausing, with a half-comic look amid her trouble, "that I could find as good a governess as I was, for the girls. There was one brother, John, and one other sister, Matilda; and Mr. Merridew was one of the visitors at the house, and was supposed to be paying her attention. I never could see it, for my part, and Charles declares he never had any such idea; but they thought so, I know. It is quite a long story. John had just come home from the University, and was pretending to read for the bar, and was always about the house; and the end was that he fell in love with me —"

"Of course," said I.

"I don't know that it was of course. I was so very shy, and dreaded the sound of my own voice; but he used to come after us everywhere by way of talking to Ellen, and so got to know me. Poor John! he was the nicest, faithful fellow, — the sort of man one would trust anything to, and believe in, and respect, and be fond of, — but not love. Of course Charles was there too. It went on for about a year, such a curious, confused, pleasant, painful — I cannot describe it to you, — but you know what I mean. The Babingtons had always been kind to me; of course they were angry when they found out about John, but then when they knew I would not marry him, they were kinder than ever, and said I had behaved so very well about it. I was a very lonely poor girl; my mother was dead, and I had nowhere to go; and instead of sending me away, Mrs. Babington sent him away, — her own son, which was very good of her, you know. To be sure I was a good governess, and they never suspected Charles of coming for me, nor did I. Suddenly, all at once, without the least warning, he found me by myself one day, and told me. I was a little shocked, thinking of Matilda Babington; but then he declared he had meant nothing. And so — When the Babingtons heard of it, they were all furious; even Ellen, my pupil, turned against me. They sent me away as if I had done something wicked. It was very, very hard upon me; but yet I scarcely wonder, now, I think of it. That was why we married so early and so imprudently. Mrs. Musgrave, I dare say you have often wondered why it was?"

I had to put on such looks of wonder and satisfied curiosity as I could; for the truth was, I had known the outlines of the story for years, just as every one knows the outlines of every one else's story; especially such parts of it as people might like to be concealed. I cannot understand how anybody, at least in society, or on the verge of society, can for a moment hope to have any secrets. Charles Merridew was a cousin of Mr. Justice Merridew, and very well connected, and of course it was known that he married a governess; which was one reason why people were so shy of them at first when they came to the Green.

"I begin to perceive now why this letter should be a temptation to you," I said; "you think Mr. Merridew would not like —"

"O, it is not that," she said. "Poor Charles! I don't think he would mind. The world is so hard, and one makes so little head against it. No, it is because of Mrs. Babington. I heard she lost all her money some years ago, and was dependent on her son. And what can she do on a hundred a year? A hundred a year! Only think of it, for an old lady always accustomed to have her own way. It is horribly unjust, you know, to take it from her, his mother, who was always so good to him; and to give it to me, whom he has not seen for nearly twenty years, and who gave him a sore heart when he did know me. I could not take advantage of it. It is a great temptation, but it would be a great sin. And that is why," she added, with a sudden flush on her face, looking at me, "I should rather — manage it myself — under cover of you, — and — not let Charles know."

She looked at me, and held me with her eye, demanding of me that I should understand her, and yet defying me to think any the worse of Charles. She was afraid of her husband, — afraid that he would clutch at the money without any consideradecision. She would have me understand her without words, and yet she would not have me blame Mr. Merridew. She insisted on the one and defied me to the other: an inconsistent, unreasonable woman! But I did my best to look as if I saw, and yet did not see.

"Then you want to see the lawyers?" I said.

"I want to see Mrs. Babington," was her answer. "I must go to them and explain. They are proud people, and probably would resist, — or they may be otherwise provided for. If that was the case I should not hesitate to take it. O Mrs. Musgrave, when I look at all the children, and Janet there murmuring and grumbling, don't you think it wrings my heart to put away this chance of comfort? And poor Charles working himself out. But it could not bring a blessing. It would bring a curse; I cannot take the bread out of the mouth of the old woman who was good to me, even to put it into that of my own child."

And here two tears fell out of Mrs. Merridew's eyes. At her age people do not weep abundantly. She gave a little start as they fell, and brushed them off her dress, with, I don't doubt, a sensation of shame. She to cry like a baby, who had so much to do! She left me shortly after, with an engagement to meet at the station for the twelve-o'clock train next day. I was going to town on business, and had asked her to go with me, — this was what was to be said to all the world. I explained myself elaborately that very evening to Mrs. Spencer and Lady Isabella, when I met them taking their walk after dinner.

"Mrs. Merridew is so kind as to go with me," I said; "she knows so much more about business than I do." And I made up my mind that I would go to the Bank and leave my book to be made up, that it might not be quite untrue.

"Fancy Mrs. Musgrave having any business!" said Lady Isabella. "Why don't you write to some man, and make him do it, instead of all the trouble of going to town?"

"But Mrs. Merridew is going with me, my dear," I said; and nobody doubted that the barrister's wife, with so much experience as she had, and so many things to do, would be an efficient help to me in my little affairs.

II.

The house we went to was a house in St. John's Wood. Everybody knows the kind of place. A garden wall, with lilacs and laburnums, all out of blossom by this time, and beginning to look brown and dusty, waving over it; inside, a little bright suburban garden, full of scarlet geraniums, divided by a white line of pavement, dazzlingly clean, from the door in the wall to the door of the house; and a stand full of more scarlet geraniums in the little square hall. Mrs. Merridew became very much agitated as we approached. It was all that I could do to keep her up when we had rung the bell at the door. I think she would have turned and gone back even then had it been possible, but, fortunately, we were admitted without delay.

We were shown into a pretty shady drawing-room, full of old furniture, which looked like the remnants of something greater, and at which she gazed with eyes of almost wild recognition, unconsciously pressing my arm, which she still held. Everything surrounding her woke afresh the tumult of recollections. She was not able to speak when the them simply, and had already named my own, when she pressed my arm closer to her, and interposed all at once,—

"Say two ladies from the country anxious to speak with her about business. She might not—know—our names."

"Is it business about the house, ma'am?" said the maid, with some eagerness.

"Yes, yes; it is about the house," said Mrs. Merridew, hastily. And then the door closed, and we sat waiting, listening to the soft subdued sounds in the quiet house, and the rustle of the leaves in the garden. "She must be going to let it," my companion said, hoarsely; and then rose from the chair on which she had placed herself, and began to move about the room with agitation, looking at everything, touching the things with her hands, with now and then a stifled exclamation. "There is where we used to sit, Ellen and I," she said, standing by a sofa, before which a small table was placed, "when there was company in the evenings. And there Matilda,—O, what ghosts there are about! Matilda is married, thank Heaven! but if Ellen comes, I shall never be able to face her. O Mrs. Musgrave, if you would but speak for me!"

At this moment the door was opened. Mrs. Merridew shrank back instinctively, and sat down, resting her hand on the table she had just pointed out to me. The new-comer was a tall, full figure, in deep mourning, a handsome woman of five-and-thirty, or thereabouts, with bright hair, which looked all the brighter from comparison with the black depths of her dress, and a colorless, clear complexion. All the color about her was in her hair. Though she had no appearance of unhealthiness, her very lips were pale, and she came in with a noiseless, quiet dignity, and the air of one who felt she had pain to encounter, yet felt able to bear it.

"Pardon me for keeping you waiting," she said; and then, with a somewhat startled glance, "I understood you wanted to see—the house."

My companion was trembling violently; and I cleared my throat and tried to clear up my ideas (which was less easy) to say something in reply. But before I had stammered out half a dozen words Mrs. Merridew rose, and made one or two unsteady steps towards the stranger.

"Ellen," she cried, "don't you know me?" and stopped there, standing in the centre of the room, holding out appealing hands.

Miss Babington's face changed in the strangest way. I could see that she recognized her in a moment, and then that she pretended to herself not to recognize her. There was the first startled, vivid, indignant glance, and then a voluntary mist came over her eyes. She gazed at the agitated woman with an obstinately blank gaze, and then turned to me with a little bow.

"Your friend has the advantage of me," she said; "but you were saying something. I should be glad, if that was what you wanted, to show you over the house."

It would be hard to imagine a more difficult position than that in which I found myself; seated between two people who were thus strangely connected with each other by bonds of mutual injury, and appealed to for something meaningless and tranquillizing, to make the intercourse possible. I did the best I could on the spur of the moment.

"It is not so much the house," I said, "though if you wish to let it, I have a friend who is looking for a house; but I think there was some other business Mrs. Merridew had; something to say—"

"Mrs. Merridew!" said Miss Babington, suffering the light once more to come into her eyes; and then she gave her an indignant look. "I think this might have been spared us at least."

"Ellen," said Mrs. Merridew, speaking very low and humbly,—"Ellen, I have never done anything to you to make you so hard against me. If I injured your sister, it was unwittingly. She is better off than I am now. You were once fond of me, as I was of you. Why should you have turned so completely against me? I have come in desperation to ask a hearing from you, and from your mother, Ellen. God knows I mean nothing but good. And O, what have I ever done?—What harm?"

Miss Babington had seated herself, still preserving her air of dignity, but without an invitation by look or gesture to her visitor to be seated; and in the silent room, all so dainty and so sweet with flowers, with the old furniture in it, which reminded her of the past, the culprit of twenty years ago stood pleading between one of those whom she was supposed to have wronged and myself, a most ignorant and uneasy spectator. Twenty years ago! In the mean time youth had passed, and the hard burdens of middle age had come doubled and manifold upon her shoulders. Had she had done nothing in the mean time that would tell more heavily against her than that girlish inadvertence of the past? Yet here she stood—not knowing, I believe, for the moment, whether she was the young governess in her first trouble, or the mother of all those children, acquainted with troubles so much more bitter—among the ghosts of the past.

"I would much rather not discuss the question," said Miss Babington, still seated, and struggling hard to preserve her calm. "All the grief and vexation we have owed to you in this house cannot be summed up in a moment. The only policy, I think, is to be silent. Your very presence here is an offence to us. What else could it be?"

"I should never have come," said Mrs. Merridew, moved by a natural prick of resentment, "but for what I have just heard—I should never have returned to ask for pardon where I had done no wrong,—had it not been for this,—this, that I feel to be unjust. Your poor brother John—"

"Stop!" cried the other, her reserve failing. "Stop, O, stop, you cruel woman! He was nothing to you but a toy to be played with,—but he was my brother, my only brother; and you have made him an undutiful son in his very grave."

The tears were in her eyes, her colorless face had flushed, her soft voice was raised; and Mrs. Merridew, still standing, listened to her with looks as agitated—when all at once the door was again opened softly. The aspect of affairs changed in a moment. To my utter amazement, Mrs. Merridew, who was standing with her face to the door, made a quick, imperative, familiar gesture to her antagonist, and looked towards an easy-chair which stood near the open window. Miss Babington rose quickly to her feet, and composed herself into a sudden appearance of calm.

"Mamma," she said, going forward to meet the old lady, who came slowly in, "here are some ladies come upon business. This is—Mrs. Merridew." She said the name very low, as Mrs. Babington made her way to her chair, and Mrs. Merridew sank trembling into her seat, unable, I think, to bear up longer. The old lady seated herself before she spoke. She was a little old woman, with a pretty softly colored old face, and had the air of having been petted and cared for all her life. The sudden change of her daughter's manner; the accumulation of every kind of convenience and prettiness, as I now remarked, round that chair; the careful way in which it had been placed out of the sun and the draught, yet in the air and in the sight of the garden, told a whole history of themselves. And now Mrs. Merridew's passionate sense that the alienation of the son's fortune from the mother was a thing impossible was made clear to me at once.

"Whom did you say, Ellen?" said the old lady, when she was comfortably settled in her chair. "Mrs. —? I never catch names. I hope you have explained to the ladies that I am rather infirm, and can't stand. What did you say was your friend's name, my dear?"

Her friend's name! Ellen Babington's face lightened all over as with a pale light of indignation.

"I said — Mrs. Merridew," she repeated, with a little emphasis on the name. Then there was a pause; and the culprit who was at the bar trembled visibly, and hid her face in her hands.

"Mrs. Merridew! Do you mean — Turn me round, Ellen, and let me look at her," said the old lady, with a curious catching of her breath.

It was a change which could not be done in a moment. While the daughter turned the mother's chair, poor Mrs. Merridew must have gone through the torture of an age; her hands trembled in which she had hidden herself. But as the chair creaked and turned slowly round, and all was silent again, she raised her white face, and uncovered herself, as it were, to meet the inquisitor's eye. It might have been a different woman, so changed was she; her eyes withdrawn into caves, the lines of her mouth drawn down, two hollows clearly marked in her cheeks, and every particle of her usual color gone. She looked up appalled and overcome, confronting, but not meeting, the keen critical look which old Mrs. Babington fixed upon her; and then there was again a pause; and the leaves fluttered outside, and the white curtains within, and a gay child's voice, passing in the road without, suddenly fell among us like a bird.

"Ah!" said the old lady, "that creature! Do you mean to tell me, Ellen, that she has had the assurance to come here? Now look at her and tell me what a man's sense is worth. That woman's face turned my poor boy's head, and drove Charles Merridew out of his wits. Only look at her; is there anything there to turn anybody's head now? She has lost her figure too; but to be sure that is not so wonderful, for she is forty if she is a day. But there are you, my dear, as straight as a rush, and your sister Matilda as well. So that is Janet Singleton, our governess; I wonder what Charles thinks of his bargain now? I never saw a woman so gone off. O Ellen, Ellen, why didn't she come and show herself, such a figure as she is, before my poor dear boy was taken from us? My poor boy! And to think he should have gone to his grave in a delusion about such a creature! Ellen, I would rather now that you sent her away."

"O mamma, don't speak like this," cried Ellen, red with shame and distress; "what is about her figure? if that were all! — but she is going away."

"Yes, yea, send her away," said the old lady. "You liked her once, but I don't suppose even you can think there could be any intercourse now. My son left all his money to her," she added, turning to me, — "past his mother and his sister. You will admit that was a strange thing to do. I don't know who the other lady is, Ellen, but I conclude she is a friend of yours. He left everything past us, everything but some poor pittance. Perhaps you may know some one who wants a house in this neighborhood? It is a very nice little house, and much better furnished than most. I should be very glad to let it, now that I can't afford to occupy it myself, by the year."

"Mamma, the other lady is with Mrs. Merridew," said Ellen; "I do not know her —" and she cast a glance at me, almost appealing to my pity. I rose up, not knowing what to do.

"Perhaps, my dear," I said, I confess with timidity, "we had better go away."

"Unless you will stay to luncheon," said the old lady. "But I forgot, — I don't want to look at that woman any more, Ellen. She has done us enough of harm to satisfy any one. Turn me round again to my usual place, and send her away."

Mrs. Merridew had risen to her feet, too. She had regained her senses after the first frightful shock. She was still ghastly pale, but she was herself. She went up firmly and swiftly to the old lady, put Ellen aside by a movement which she was unconscious of in her agitation, and replaced the chair in its former place with the air of one to whom such an office was habitual. "You used to say I always did it best," she said. "O, is it possible you can have forgotten everything! Did not I give him up when you asked me, and do you think I will take his money now? O, never, never! It ought to be yours, and it shall be. O, take it back, and forgive me, and say, 'God bless you' once again."

"Eh, what was that you said? Ellen, what does she say?" said the old woman. "I have always heard the Merridews were very poor. Poor John's fortune will be a godsend to them. Go away! I suppose you mean to mock me after all the rest you have done. I don't understand what you say."

Yet she looked up with a certain eagerness on her pretty old face, — a certain sharp look of greed and longing came into the blue eyes, which retained their color as pure as that of youth. Her daughter towered above her, pale with emotion, but still indignant, yielding not a jot.

"Mamma, pay no attention," she said; "Mrs. Merridew may pity us, but what is that? surely we can take back nothing from her hands."

"Pity! I don't see how Janet Merridew can pity me. But I should like," Mrs. Babington went on, with a little tremble of eagerness, "to know at least what she means."

"This is what I mean," said Mrs. Merridew, sinking on her knees by the old lady's chair: "that I will not take your money. It is your money. We are poor, as you say; but we can struggle on as we have done for twenty years; and poor John's money is yours, and not mine. It is not mine. I will not take it. It must have been some mistake. If he had known what he was doing he never would have left it to any one but you."

"So I think myself," said the old lady, musing, and then was silent, taking no notice of any one, — looking into the air.

"Mamma," said Ellen, behind her chair, "I can work for you, and Matilda will help us. It cannot be. It may be kind of — her — but it cannot, cannot be. Are we to take charity; to live on charity? Mamma, she has no right to disturb you —"

"She is not disturbing me, my dear," said the old lady; "on the contrary. Whatever I might think of her, she used to be a girl of sense. And Matilda always carried things with a very high hand, and I never was fond of her husband. But I am very fond of my house," she added, after a pause; "it is such a nice house, Ellen. I think I should die if we were to leave it. I shall die very soon, most likely, and be a burden on nobody; but still, Ellen, if she meant it, you know —"

"Mamma, what does it matter what she means? You never can think of accepting charity. It will break my heart."

"That is all very well to say," said Mrs. Babington. "But I have lived a great deal longer than you have done, my dear, and I know that hearts are not broken so easily. It would break my heart to leave my nice house. Janet, come here, and look me in the face. I don't think you were true to us in the old times. Matilda did carry things with a very high hand. I told her so at the time, and I have often told her so since; but I don't think you were true to us, all the same."

"I did not know—I did not mean—" faltered Mrs. Merridew, leaning her head on the arm of the old lady's chair.

It was clear to me that the story had two sides, and that my friend was perhaps not so innocent as she had made herself out to be. But there was something very pitiful in the comparison between the passion of anxiety in her half-hidden face, and the calm of the old woman who was thus deciding on her fate.

"My dear, I am afraid you knew," said Mrs. Babington. "You accepted my poor boy, and then, when I spoke to you, you gave him up, and took Charles Merridew instead. If I had not interfered, perhaps it would have been better; though, to be sure, I don't know what we should have done with a heap of children. And as for poor John's money, you know you have no more real right to it, no more than that other lady, who never saw him in her life."

"She has the best possible right to it, mamma,—he left it to her," said Ellen, anxiously, over her shoulder. "O, why did you come here to vex us, when we were not interfering with you? I beg of you not to trouble my mother any more, but go away."

Then there was a moment of hesitation. Mrs. Merridew rose slowly from her knees. She turned round to me, not looking me in the face. She said, in a hoarse voice, "Let us go," and made a step towards the door. She was shaking as if she had had a fever; but she was glad. Was that possible? She had delivered her conscience,—and now might not she go and keep the money which would make her children happy? But she could not look me in the face. She moved as slowly as a funeral. And yet she would have flown, if she could, to get safely away.

"Janet, my dear," said the old lady, "come back, and let us end our talk."

Mrs. Merridew stopped short, with a start, as if a shot had arrested her. This time she looked me full in the face. Her momentary hope was over, and now she felt for the first time the poignancy of the sacrifice which it had been her own will to make.

"Come back, Janet," said Mrs. Babington. "As you say, it is not your money. Nothing could make it your money. You were always right-feeling when you were not aggravated. I am much obliged to you, my dear. Come and sit down here, and tell me all about yourself. Now poor John is dead," she went on, falling suddenly into soft weeping, like a child, "we ought to be friends. To think he should die before me, and I should be heir to my own boy,—is n't it sad? And such a fine young fellow as he was! You remember when he came back from the University? What a nice color he had! And always so straight and slim, like a rush. All my children have a good carriage. You have lost your figure, Janet; and you used to have a nice little figure. When a girl is so round and plump, she is apt to get stout as she gets older. Look at Ellen, how nice she is. But then, to be sure, children make a difference. Sit down by me here, and tell me how many you have. And, Ellen, send word to the house-agent, and tell him we don't want now to let the house; and tell Parker to get luncheon ready a little earlier. You must want something if you have come from the country. Where are you living now? and how is Charles Merridew? Dear, dear, to think I should not have seen either of you for nearly twenty years!"

"But, mamma, surely, surely," cried Ellen Babington, "you don't think things can be settled like this?"

"Don't speak nonsense, Ellen; everything is settled," said the old lady. "You know I always had the greatest confidence in Janet's good sense. Now, my dear, hold your tongue. A girl like you has no right to meddle. I always manage my own business. Go and look after luncheon,—that is your affair."

I do not remember ever to have seen a more curious group in my life. There was the old lady in the centre, quite calm, and sweet, and pleasant. A tear was still lingering on her eyelash; but it represented nothing more than a child's transitory grief, and underneath there was nothing but smiles, and satisfaction, and content. She looked so pretty, so pleased, so glad to find that her comforts were not to be impaired, and yet took it all so lightly, as a matter of course, as completely unconscious of the struggle going on in the mind of her benefactress as if she had been a creature from a different world. As for Mrs. Merridew, she stood speechless, choked by feelings that were too bitter and conflicting for words. I am sure that all the advantages this money could have procured for her children were surging up before her as she stood and listened. She held her hands helplessly half stretched out, as if something had been taken out of them. Her eyes were blank with thinking, seeing nothing that we saw, but a whole world of the invisible. Her breast heaved with a breath half drawn, which seemed suspended half-way, as if dismay and disappointment hindered its completion. It was all over then,—her sacrifice made and accepted, and no more about it; and herself sent back to the monotonous struggle of life. On the other side of the pretty old lady stood Ellen Babington, pale and miserable, struggling with shame and pride, casting sudden glances at Mrs. Merridew, and then appealing looks at me, who had nothing to do with it.

"Tell her, O, tell her it can't be!" she cried at last, coming to me. "Tell her the lawyers will not permit it. It cannot be."

And Merridew, too, gave me one pitiful look,—not repenting, but yet— Then she went forward and laid her hand upon the old lady's hand, which was like ivory, with all the veins delicately carved upon it.

"Say, God bless us, at least. Say, 'God bless you and your children,' once before I go."

"To be sure," said the old lady, cheerfully. "God bless you, my dear, and all the children. Matilda has no children, you know. I should like to see them, if you think it would not be too much for me. But you are not going, Janet, when it is the first time we have met for nearly twenty years?"

"I must go," said Mrs. Merridew.

She could not trust herself to speak, I could see. She put down her face and kissed the ivory hand, and then she turned and went past me to the door, without another word. I think she had forgotten my very existence. When she had reached the door she turned round suddenly, and fixed her eyes upon Ellen. She was going away, having given them back their living, without so much acknowledgment as if she had brought a nosegay. There was in her look a mute remonstrance and appeal and protest. Ellen Babington trembled all over; her lips quivered as if with words which pride or pain would not permit her to say; but she held with both hands immovable, to the back of her mother's chair, who, for her part, was kissing her hand to the departing visitor. "Good by; come and see us soon," the old lady was saying cheerfully. And Ellen gazed, and trembled, and said nothing. Thus this strangest of visits came to an end.

She had forgotten me, as I thought; but when I came to her side and put my arm within her reach, she clutched at it and tottered so that it was all I could do to support her. I was very thankful to get her into the cab, for I thought she would have fainted on the way. But yet she roused herself when I told the man to drive back to the station.

"We must go to the lawyers first," she said; and then we turned and drove through the busy London streets, towards the City. The clerks looked nearly baked in the office when we reached it, and the crowd crowded on, indiscriminate and monotonous. One feels one has no right to go to such a place and take any of the air away, of which they have so little. And to think of the sweet air blowing over our lawns and lanes, and all the unoccupied, silent, shady places we had left behind us! Such vain thoughts were not in Mrs. Merridew's head. She was turning over and over instead a very different kind of vision. She was counting up all she had sacrificed, and how little she had got by it, and yet was going to complete the sacrifice, unmoved even by her thoughts.

I confess I was surprised at the tone she took with the lawyer. She said "Mr. Merridew and myself" with a composure which made me, who knew Mr. Merridew had no hand in it, absolutely speechless. The lawyer remonstrated as he was in duty bound, and spoke about his client's will; but Mrs. Merridew made very little account of the will. She quoted her husband with a confidence so assured that even I, though I knew better, began to be persuaded that she had communicated with him. And thus the business was finally settled. She had recovered herself by the time we got into the cab again. It is true that her face was worn and livid with the exertions of the day, but still, pale and weary as she was, she was herself.

"But, my dear," I said, "you quoted Mr. Merri-dew, as if he knew all about it; and what if he should not approve?"

"You must not think I have no confidence in my husband," she said, quickly: "far from that. Perhaps he would not see as I do now. He would think of our own wants first. But if it comes to his ears afterwards, Charles is not the man to disown his wife's actions. O no, no; we have gone through a great deal together, and he would no more bring shame upon me, as if I acted when I had no right to act — than — I would bring shame upon him; and I think that is as much as could be said."

And then we made our way back to the station; but she said nothing more till we got into the railway-carriage, which was not quite so noisy as our cab.

"It would have been such a thing for us," she said then, half to herself. "Poor Charles! O, if I could but have said to him, 'Don't be so anxious; here is so much a year for the children.' And Jack should have gone to the university. And there would have been Will's premium at once" (i. e. to Mr. Willoughby, the engineer). "The only thing that I am glad of is that they don't know. And then Janet; she breaks my heart when she talks. It is so bad for her, knowing the Fortises and all those girls who have everything that heart can desire. I never had that to worry me when I was young. I was only the governess. Janet's talk will be the worst of all. I could have made the house so nice too, and everything. Well! — but then I never should have had a moment's peace."

"You don't regret?" I said.

"No," said Mrs. Merridew, with a long sigh. And then, "Do you think I have been a traitor to the children?" she cried suddenly, "taking away their money from them in the dark? Would Charles think me a traitor, as they do? Is it always to be my part? — always to be my part?"

"No, no," I said, soothing her as best I could; but I was very glad to find my pony-carriage at the station, and to drive her home to my house and give her some tea, and strengthen her for her duties. Thus poor John Babington's fortune was disposed of, and no one was the wiser, except, indeed, the old lady and her daughter, who were not likely to talk much on the subject. And Mrs. Merridew walked calmly across to her house in the dusk as if this strange episode of agitation and passion had been nothing more solid than a dream.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE.*

BY MISS YONGE.

(Third Paper.)

CLASS LITERATURE OF THE LAST THIRTY YEARS.

JUST as the "Tracts for the Times" were moving the thinking world, there appeared a little book called "The Fairy Bower," ostensibly a mere child's story, but written with a peculiar suggestiveness of portraiture that rendered it a somewhat puzzling study to heads of families. The plot is briefly this: Grace Leslie, the only child of a widowed mother, is, at ten years old, taken to spend a month among a gay family named Ward, who have a large number of exceedingly strict and precise cousins called Duff. Grace chafes, in conversation about an intended Christmas party with Mary Anne Duff, to suggest decorating a little ante-room with paper flowers, and calling it a Fairy Bower; and this idea is taken up by Mary Anne, and announced as her own. The plan turns out a success: the grown people admire it extremely, and the inventor is called for and crowned Queen of the Fairy Bower; Grace, in consternation, and half incredulity of her companion's baseness, holding back while Mary Anne, in a sort of dull complacency, accepts the triumph. Suspicion that all is not right arises, but lights upon the innocent Grace, and finally the whole is cleared up by her godfather, a sort of original, who comes out with downright truths in the Johnsonian style. He forces a confession from Mary Anne, and rectifies the injustice. This is the plot, weak chiefly in the unnatural importance which this childish affair obtains in the neighborhood, but quite enough for the unfolding of much remarkable thought and character, with the more curious cleverness, because, with the exception of a few conversations among the elders, the whole is treated from among the children. The book does not, like most of those for the young, work out a proposition; it rather states a problem, and then leaves it. And that seems to be, "What are our systems of education making of our children?" So we have them all vividly set before us. The Evangelical governess who never punishes, but only touches the feelings, presents us with four pupils, — the callous, self-satisfied Mary Anne, dull of conscience, and impervious to treatment invented for finer natures; the model Constance, sincerely pious, pragmatical, and interfering; the romantic, sentimental Fanny, with her poetical instincts undirected; and quiet, good, undemonstrative, and therefore neglected, Charlotte. Besides these, there is the pretentious young lady from a fashionable boarding-school, and three boys, — the merry clever, unthinking George; Campbell Duff, for whom the real religion of his home has been redeemed from narrowness in the wholesome public-school atmosphere; and one sadly significant likeness of the good-for-nothing son of a pious mother whom he deceives. Then there is Emily, a bright, sweet picture of a well-natured school-girl, far from faultless, but with true instincts; and there is her thoughtful little sister Ellen, soundly brought up by a quiet, old, orthodox grandmamma in the country: with sparkling, sensitive little Grace, wondering among them all, as each acts and speaks according to his or her nature, and leaves us questioning — Who has found the right way? What will this come to?

Nor does the second part, the "Lost Brooch," fully answer the question. It is quite as clever, and as full of a certain restrained irony, as its predecessor, but in some measure less sparkling, and it concerns the same parties in the early years of youth instead of childhood. All are here met at Hastings for a month of holiday, and in a like manner develop their several characters.

Mary Anne is, perhaps, the cleverest picture of all, with her outward condemnation of everything fashionable as worldly, and her real worship of money; her caught-up phrases and genuine selfishness, her conceit and power of availing herself of other people's service, and altogether the thin varnish caught from her clever, strong, puritanical, consistent sister Constance, laid over a naturally slow selfish nature; Constance perfect up to her own standard as ever, rigid and tyrannical, and utterly blind to all that does not agree with her preconceived ideas; and Fanny, more and more alienated from her family by their utter want of sympathy for her imaginative nature, which runs further and further into sentiment and folly for want of guidance. While, on the other hand, the cousins Emily and Ellen Ward have grown up, — the one into a bright, clever, lively woman, the other into a wise, grave, pensive looker-on; and Grace Leslie, sunny and deep, and ready to love, sympathize with, and admire all, moves about them, as Emily says, as though her motto were, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."

The humor of the plot lies in the two great errors into which the Duffs fall. They meet with an adventurer, who succeeds in severally persuading Mary Anne and Fanny that he is deeply attached to each, and Constance that he has been converted and made a Christian through her instrumentality, while at the same time Constance's lost brooch becomes the occasion of a vehement persecution of an innocent servant-girl, who is beset with exhortations and threats, all with the beneficent intention of securing an inmate for a new reformatory. Even when the fascinating Osmond Guppy proves to be a thorough scapegrace, about to retrieve his fortunes by marrying a cheese-monger's widow, and the brooch comes to light in Constance's own dressing-box, that consistent lady and Mary Anne remain of the same opinion still, and contend that, the one being a converted character and the other unconverted, they have not been guilty of the slightest injustice in either instance. The whole sounds exaggerated, but in reality is brought about in such a manner that we believe in almost every step as we go, and are provoked just as we should be by real people.

The conversations, whether deep or gay, are wonderfully interesting, and contain many valuable little bits of thought, and remarks or queries not easily forgotten. There are humorous bits of description, too, such as when Mr. Duff's chief interest in Battle Abbey lies in turning up the cover of the table in the living rooms, and estimating the cost of the mahogany; such, too, as the Duffs' extremely heavy dinner-party; and the domineering power of Constance over her family and neighborhood. Altogether these two are memorable books, and though nowhere inculcating any distinctively High Church doctrines, yet there can be no doubt that they did their part towards the Church movement by manifesting the unloveliness and unsatisfactoriness of this particular phase of suburban Evangelicalism. Another work done by them was the creation of the class of literature now termed "books for the young," standing between the child's story and the full-grown novel. We do not mean that there were no such books before, but as a school they seemed to rise up either in imitation of, or almost in rivalry to, the "Fairy Bower," and "Lost Brooch." Most people who had any power of writing felt that though anything so curiously clever and covertly satirical as these was impossible, yet that something more distinctly improving could be produced upon the same field.

The worst of it is, that the multitude of "tales" certainly do prevent the reading of books requiring more attention. Young people grow up from the story-book to the tale period, and while there is undeniably harmless food within their reach, they are interdicted from the study of that which would stretch their minds lest they should meet with anything objectionable; and thus the mind absolutely becomes cramped, and there is no power of turning for recreation to reading that stretches the faculties.

No one has protested more strongly against this custom than Miss Sewell in her "Principles of Education." The system that keeps girls in the school-room reading simple, easy stories, without touching Scott, Shakespeare, or Spenser, and then hands them over to the unexplored recesses of Mudie's boxes, has been shown by her to be the most frivolizing that can be devised; and she has set forward the result of her experience that a good novel, especially a romantic one, read at twelve or fourteen, is a really beneficial thing.

We have said that children have no sympathy with the sentiment of love, but they have plenty with the romance, and these are very different things. The tender feelings of the hero and heroine are utterly uninteresting, but the adventures and disasters they undergo, their bravery and constancy, are delightful, and raise the whole tone of the mind. And there is infinitely less danger of putting foolish fancies into a girl's head by letting her enjoy the escapades of Catherine Seyton, or weep for Lucy Ashton, than by letting her turn over the good little book where a child like herself flirts with her brotherly first cousin, and marries him at last. Nay, even "the objectionable" characters that mothers shrink from leaving before girls' eyes are unlikely to do harm in creatures so unlike themselves. Brian de Bois Guilbert or Julian Avenel are as unlikely to taint their minds as Jupiter or Mars, Henry II. or Louis XIV.; and if a girl at eighteen can plunge into a book box, or meet on a drawing-room table with "Beatrice" or "Cometh up as a Flower," surely it is well that at sixteen she should have seen crime treated with loathing and abhorrence.

There is a prodigious amount of what may be called class literature.

Every one writes books for some one; books for children, books for servants, books for poor men, poor women, poor boys, and poor girls. It is not enough to say, "Thou shalt not steal," but the merchant must be edified by the tale of a fraudulent banker, the school-boy by hearing how seven cherries were stolen, the servant must be told how the wicked cook hid her mistress's ring in the innocent scullery-maid's box; the poor man has a pig stolen for his benefit, the poor boy a sovereign, the poor girl a silk handkerchief. Why is not one broad, well-taught principle better than so much application in detail?

We must not be misunderstood. It is well to picture any one class or way of life thoroughly; a vivid scene well-painted is sure to be worth having, and real likenesses are, generally speaking, useful studies; but it is the endeavor to hold up a mirror to each variety of reader of his or her way of life, as if there were no interest beyond it, and nothing else could be understood or cared for, that we think narrowing and weakening. If it be true that imagination is really needful to give the power of doing as we would be done by, surely it is better to have models set before us not immediately within our own range. A good book is a good book to whosoever can understand it, and there is often a power of grasping a part of the meaning when there is no power of explanation. Moreover, there is a habit now abroad in the world of supposing that any writing is good enough for children and for the poor. Never has this fallacy been better exposed than by the author of "My Life, and What shall I do with it?" She points out, that while the clever mechanic can borrow highly spiced newspapers and pamphlets adverse to all religion, he finds his wife and children supplied with meek, mawkish, ill-argued tracts and story-books, whose dulness and want of point he sets down to their subject instead of to their authors, and he becomes contemptuous when he might have been touched. Nothing ought to be more diligently selected than books sent forth among the town-poor, and nothing more diligently weeded from among them than the feeble little tales of seraphic children who regularly meet with an accident, or break a blood-vessel,—the whole genus of tales written because the author wanted the money for so good a purpose that no one had the heart to nip her aspirations in the bud.

As a rule, what poor people and servants really like is a story with what more educated persons think rather an over-amount of pathos, going to the verge—if not over it—of sentimentality. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is the type of the style they love. Attendrissement—to borrow a French word—must be a strong sensation with them. Miss Sewell's "Earl's Daughter," though far from the best of her works, is delightful to the maid-servant and the dressmaker class, who are the chief readers among the grown-up poor, excepting, of course, invalids, and the clever mechanics, of whom, having no knowledge, we say nothing. As to servants, it really is needless to try to select books for them, considering the cheapness of novels, and their easy access to all we have in the house. We believe the best treatment is to keep out of the way whatever we think absolutely deleterious, and to lend freely anything good or interesting, such, for instance, as Mrs. Craik's "Noble Life," which is exceedingly relished.

One or two of Mrs. Gaskell's lesser tales deserve mention, as standing out—as well they may—far above the average of the literature usually supposed appropriate to the Lending Library. They are to be found in a volume of her lesser works, so ingeniously put together by Messrs. Chapman and Hall as to make it impossible to give it to the intended readers of full a third of the stories. "Lizzie Leigh, and other Stories," is the title. The first is a piteous tale of the sin we most carefully keep from children's knowledge, and it is presently followed by a terrible ghost story from Household Words. Then comes "Mr. Harrison's Confessions," one of the author's most delicious bits of humor, but such as only true lovers of her delicate aroma can appreciate; and after this her unrivalled "Libbie Marsh's Three Eras," a most beautiful and touching Manchester story, fit for any rank, and almost any age; and the "Sexton's Hero," a grand sketch of the tide on the Morecombe Sands. N. B.—Whenever any of our readers chance to be pressed into the service of that distressing institution, a "Penny Reading," we recommend him the "Sexton's Hero," if he desires to be pathetic; or its companion, "Christian Storms and Sunshine," if he goes in for the comic. The two last stories, "Hand and Heart," and "Betsy's Troubles at Home," are capital for children; but they are no doubt early productions; they are not the real Mary Gaskell, but a clever pupil of the Edgeworth and Martineau style.

If, however, we were to dwell on the books about or for the poor, or their children, that we have a kindness for or have found successful, we should simply become a catalogue, and we will therefore only repeat our strong conviction that skim milk, innocent fluid as it may seem, is apt to turn sour, and that nobody ought to attempt to write for the poor (any more than for the rich) who cannot do so with sense and spirit, as well as with a good moral. As a pattern of what such a book ought to be, let us mention "Helpful Sam," a tale that first came out in Mozley's Magazine for the Young (which, by the by, wonderfully contrives to avoid flabby stories). The hero is a lad who makes his first appearance at a Sunday-school in such a gorgeous waistcoat as to distract the attention of his companions, and who turns out to be a workhouse-boy apprenticed to a brutal chimney-sweeper with a good, meek wife. The quaint contrasts and droll sayings of the actors in the story are so thoroughly life-like, that we believe no one could take up the little book without becoming interested; and the writer has been content, not to transgress all possibilities, by bringing in those dreadful long-winded, highly moral fathers and mothers, who are still extant in the cottages of the venerable S. P. C. K.

We remember our own youthful horror of such excellent mouthpieces of wisdom, though we used to consider them a necessary qualification in a story. "I believe the horrid old prosiness is the mother," said a young friend to us, while relating her hasty glimpse of a new story. And yet while we are sure that it is a mistake to put preachments such as no mortal can be supposed to make into the mouths of the dramatis personæ, we think that the notion that a book is really better as mere literature and more amusing for not having a moral is an error. Very brief sportive sketches without a purpose may be endurable, but if prolonged they need puh. The old fairy-tales were, as we know, remnants of mighty myths; the "Arabian Nights" are the growth of ancient fancies dealing with dreamily apprehended truths; and the very few modern inventions that can, even while in the forefront of the scene, class with such, have some earnestness and solidity in their mould, and are shadows of something greater. Such are "Undine" and "Sintram"; such are the best of Hans Christian Andersen's, a man who has immensely over-written himself, but whose "Ugly Duckling," "True Princess," "Emperor of China's Clothes," and "Lark," have already acquired a sort of force, like a proverb, by their wonderful terseness of irony and truth. Who recollects more than a queer phrase or two in such of his stories as have not a definite purpose, or are not, like "The Little Mermaid" and the "Seven Swans," graceful versions of old popular legends? Perhaps there have been three really original fairy-tales (we call them so for want of a better name) produced within the last twenty years, — we mean the "Water-Babies," "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland," and the "Light Princess," though we hesitate in naming the latter, because it dwells in the hackneyed world of kings and princesses and fairy godmothers; while the other two have the mark of originality, — they deal with creatures of our own day, and just dip them into the realms of Dreamland. Of these two, we confess that the latent though not consistent meanings that run through the "Water-Babies" seem to us to render it more attractive than even the exquisite bits of fun in "Alice." The one seems a book to chain the interest, the other one to take up by chance.

To be overdone with moral is a fatal thing. To force events, even imaginary, to illustrate some maxim is ruinous; yet it seems to us that a book so written has really a better chance of getting a permanent hold on the mind than the whipped syllabub of fiction. "Garry, a Holiday Story," is a little modern tale that boasts of no moral, and certainly it has none, for the child (a detestable, forward, saucy child) really acts the part of a dog-stealer, carries the creature to the sea-side in defiance of a much-bullied aunt, and finally gets it given to her. There is a good deal of a sort of facetiousness in the book, but we cannot believe it would gain the affections of any child.

And to take its very opposite, — "Uncle Peter's Fairy Tale." The idea is not novel; it is the oft-told story of the fulfilment of wishes; but in this case they are the wishes of a party of amiable, beneficent ladies and gentlemen, such as may be met with in any country house; and the literal accomplishment of them produces the most ludicrous and delicious situations, told with such humor that no one can help being amused, whether young or old. For instance, the amiable head of the family wishes all lawyers in Nova Zembla, and the respectable solicitor is instantly transported thither in shaving costume. The romantic young lady wishes to be borne aloft on a cloud, and finds herself in a dismal bank of fog. She also wishes her friend to be regaled with continual music, whereupon the speech of the whole household becomes song. But there is a strong purpose through the whole; and though the graver conversations, and sometimes the ironical ones, which are interspersed, are too long, and sometimes too heavy, they save the book from being mere froth and buffoonery, and the underlying earnestness is the real cause of its exceeding drollery.

We do not believe that there can be sparkle where there is not depth. A liking for buffoonery is one of the tastes to be especially discouraged. Fun is a very different matter. Fun and playfulness may crop out everywhere, and join with pathos, nobility, and earnestness, just as Shakespeare and Cervantes mingled them; but an exclusive preference for extravagance is most unwholesome, and even perverting. It becomes destructive of reverence, and soon degenerates into coarseness; it permits nothing poetical or imaginative, nothing sweet nor pathetic to exist; and there is a certain self-satisfaction and superiority in making game of what others regard with enthusiasm or sentiment, which absolutely bars the way against a higher or softer tone. Perhaps those who remember the published letters of young officers during the Indian and Jamaica mutinies, may perceive why it is well to keep boys from thinking it "the thing" to talk slang-comedy over a terrific real life tragedy. Most works with that prefix "Comic" — "Comic History of England," "Comic Latin Grammar," &c. — are mere catch-pennies for boys, and can only teach them the love of burlesque out of place. We do not mean to stigmatize all parody and drollery. Some of the poems we love best will perfectly stand a clever parody, but there must be a certain quality of gaieté de cœur and light delicacy to make such things charming. Premeditated conventional fun is the unhappy commodity. Who can measure out wit by the yard?

Exaggeration is the great error of the books that are written avowedly for boy-taste, such as the whole Mayne Reid school, which stimulate the appetite for the marvellous by a series of adventures not absolutely impossible individually, but mon-strously improbable, in rapid succession. The love of sensation is thus fed, so that boys lose their interest in all that is real. In truth, we have little liking for "books for boys."

If boys have healthy, intelligent minds, they would be doing much better if they were reading books for men. Many boys really care not at all for stories, but have a vehement affection for some branch of natural history, for mechanics, or physical science, and will take infinite trouble of their own accord to follow the study, which they have quite the power to do, out of any popular manual. Others are delighted with real travels (i. e. if they are not spoilt with false ones), and such books as Franklin, Kane, Livingstone, Erskine, and the Alpine Club give us are full of charms for them; and those who do love a story will not, after eleven or twelve years old, be put off with "Robert and Frederick; a Book for Boys," and the like; but, unless they are wholesomely fed on the real sound romance, will fall upon some trash that their friends have never thought of warning them against. School-boy literature is thus more read by mothers, sisters, and little boys longing to be at school, than by the boys themselves. A very clever one, "Herbert's Holidays," a capital portrait of a very fresh Etonian was evidently regarded as an insult by his congeners, who, like him, had instantly written home for leave to buy a new hat, engaging to "wear out the old one at church in the holidays," or who had made strong endeavors to bring the paternal mansion to the standard of gentility supposed to be worthy of the bosom friend. "A Hero: Philip's Book," by Mrs. Craik, has never seemed to us to be known nearly as well as it deserves. It purports to be the narrative of an English boy who had been sent to spend a half-year in the family of an uncle, a professor at Glasgow, having been told beforehand that one of his cousins was "somewhat of a hero." How he selected as this hero the big, handsome, good-natured bully Hector, worshipped him abjectly, and became gradually undeceived, is told in his own words, and with some delicious descriptions of mountain-climblings, and of boating on the Clyde. Whether boys like it or not we do not know; we are sure that men and women must do so. "The Crofton Boys," again, by Harriet Martineau, is full of life and cleverness. It was suggested, she tells us, by the story of the good tutor who had the honor of sitting for Dominie Sampson. The generous manner in which he concealed the author of the accident that maimed him is imitated in little Hugh, a truly boyish little hero, drawn with all Miss Martineau's charm of humorous simplicity. Perhaps Mr. Hope's "Stories of School-life" is more a book for masters than for boys. It is clever and amusing, but does not so much attain the creature's own point of view as make a study of him, and of the effects of certain treatment upon him. It just falls short of what the unapproachable "Tom Brown" really does, and is, in fact, too palpably trying to tread in his steps, though at a far less distance than does that morbid dismal tale, "Eric's School-days," which we hope no mother or boy ever reads, since it really can answer no purpose but to make them unhappy and suspicious, besides that it enforces by numerous telling examples that the sure reward of virtue is a fatal accident.

Another and much wider field is the tale for girls; a much more convenient one, inasmuch as those for whom they are written really do read them, and like them. There are so many hours of a girl's life when she must sit still, that a book is her natural resource, and reading becomes to her like breathing. The real difficulty is how to prevent the childish reading of story-books from becoming a preparation for unmitigated novel-reading in after life; and we confess that this is a serious difficulty when education is so straining the powers that real relaxation of the mind is absolutely needed in play-hours. Our own private theory is that we ought to teach girls less, while we should encourage them to learn more.

However, this is a branch on which we do not feel competent to enter, and we had better return to our more immediate object of noting the styles we think most or least successful. Some few people have a wonderful art of writing about children from a child's point of view. It is a rare power.

We know some clever little books that are really charming studies for the lovers of childhood, but that somehow do not suit the real children. We mean "Read me a Story," "Little People," and above all "Little Maggie and her Brother." In all three instances the portraits are genuine, and the last two are of extremely clever children. Now the unailing characteristic of children of any ability is that they are continually growing on unexpected sides of their mind, and saying things extraordinarily queer, either in their acuteness, observation, or simplicity, and utterly unlike the conventional child. At the same time the entire being is childish, and is generally incapable of tolerating the follies or understanding the precociousness of its contemporaries. So when the dreamy fancies of its fellow-child in their undeveloped state are set before it without censure, it is bewildered by the book not treating them as either naughty or silly, and feels out of its element. A study such as Dr. John Brown made of Marjorie Fleming is exquisite for parents, but the child cannot understand the point of view. Nor can it (happily) understand the manner in which reflective grown-up people view the faults of childhood. For them things must be always positively good or naughty. Thus "Mrs. Boss's Niece" — which is to us as good as a comedy, so wonderful is the humor of the description of the troubles of two good old aunts of the retired shop-keeper class, with a little harum-scarum Irish niece suddenly left on their hands — fails when given to children. They are entirely unconscious of the admirable drawing of the nervous, anxious, broken-spirited widow, who, through wearing the gayest colors, fidgeting intolerably, and going out to tea on the hottest day of June in a huge fur tippet, had yet the wonderful true judgment of simplicity and humility; and though they are amused for a moment at the Irish girl's wonderful romancings about riding a pig, and shooting an arrow that broke the leg of the major's macaw, they are shocked and dissatisfied that no condign punishment falls on such monstrous untruths, and they miss the delicate touch that shows how in reality all trust is forfeited.

Another remarkable study of character is to be found in a tiny brochure, one of Groombridge's Magnet Stories, by name "Dear Charlotte's Boys." A pair of schoolboys have the audacity to borrow from another couple of brothers a superfluous invitation from some friends of their parents to whom they were personally unknown. The predicaments are very amusing, but the point of the story is the remarkable manner in which a fault, even unconfessed, sometimes becomes the turning-point of the character. It is a matter of experience and consolation, curious as being unlike the conventional moral, and yet in many cases true. It is not an example to children, but it may serve to encourage the "love, hope, and patience" that Coleridge introduces as the sister graces of education.

Some of the tales that strike us as best winning a child's affection by viewing the world really with its own eyes, yet without puerility, are a little square book now some five-and-twenty years old, called "Little Alice and her Sister"; a pair on the list of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge named "Little Lucy" and "Sally Rainbow's Stories"; and lastly "The Vendale Lost Property Office," where the child grown up relates her experiences on being sent from India to live in an uncle's family with a charming naïve humor and tenderness. It is remarkable how the author has contrived to indicate every character most distinctly while making the narrator herself appear to have only a child's indistinct consciousness of the natures of those around her. The "Copeley Annals," by the same author, have something of the same charm, but they suit elders better than children. Some of the children's stories written by the author of "Janet's Home," such as "Mia and Charlie" and "Blind-man's Holiday," have a great charm of childlikeness. So has her "The Cousins and their Friends," one of the best, things that have been in Aunt Judy's Magazine. J. H. G.'s own stories in Melchior's Home, i. e. the "Viscount's Friend" and "Friedrich's Ballad," are exquisitely felt and told, but not children's. Mrs. Gatty's "Parables of Nature" are exquisite works of thought. Her "Worlds not Realized" we rank still higher; but we regard most of hers as fit for grown people, or for such dreamy, thoughtful children as read full-grown books. They are above the ordinary childish mind, though all the better for that. And we must not pass without mention Gwynfrun's fresh and delightful "Friends in Fur and Feathers," real animal stories, told with a free, light-handed touch of frolic and pathos, that is like the soft spring wind breathing lightly over the moorland.

Stories intended to teach history or dramatize travels are generally a failure; the information sits like the Old Man of the Sea upon the poor characters, and strangles them. Yet a few of the late Dr. J. M. Neale's tales were wonderfully vivid and touching. We will just specify among his "Triumphs of the Cross" the story called "Eric's Grave," of the man who leapt down among the wolves to call them off from his master's escape in his carriage, and a shilling book named "The Exiles of the Cevenna," a journal of the adventures of a party of early Christians fleeing from persecution and taking refuge in the hollow of a gigantic tree, whither their persecutors follow them, but are beset by the wolves. One soldier is saved by being dropped in among the Christians, and then ensues a grisly blockade by the wolves ended at last by a chase coming out from the next village. Miss Martineau's "Feats on the Fiord"—a very different style—is delightful, though only by, we are afraid, a sort of Arcadian treatment of the bonders of Norway whom she has made very unlike real life.

In general, history and travels stand best on their own merits, without being made into pap, though it is necessary to write some history for children, because education now requires a knowledge of names and facts to be acquired before the longer history can be grasped. Mythology likewise must be treated expressly for childhood. This has been done playfully by Nathaniel Hawthorne in his "Tanglewood Tales," earnestly by Kingsley in his "Heroes," and scientifically in Cox's various volumes, all of which are delightful to a child and with which should always be joined (when reprinted, as we trust it will be) "The Heroes of Asgard," by the author of "Janet's Home." This lady's "Letters on Early Egyptian History," with Miss Sewell's Histories of Greece and of Rome, supply nearly all that is wanted in Ancient History. Modern History is worse off, but in real truth, after a girl has read a series of abridged histories sufficient to give the chain of events, good biographies, and good selections from standard books, such as parents or teachers ought to understand providing, would be infinitely more beneficial than tons of babyish "Stories from Froissart," "Stories of Cavaliers and Roundheads," &c. &c., all for the most part sheer book-making, all the raciness taken away, and foolish explanations weakening the point.

After all, our conclusion as to children's literature is a somewhat Irish one, for it is—use it as little as possible; and then only what is really substantially clever and good. Bring children as soon as possible to stretch up to books above them, provided those books are noble and good. Do not give up such books on account of passages on which it would be inconvenient to be questioned on. If the child is in the habit of meeting things beyond comprehension it will pass such matters unheeded with the rest. We believe no child was ever contaminated by "The Fairy Queen," "Don Quixote," "The Vicar of Wakefield," or "The Arabian Nights." The only things to put out of its way are those that nobody ought to read, certainly not its mother. And if father or mother will take the pains to lead and sympathize with the child's tastes, encouraging but not overruling, they will find their palate curiously adapting itself to judge for and with the child, and will enjoy a fresh feast of all the old favorites of their lives. It seems like a sacrifice, but it is one worth making, and it proves all pleasure.

LIFE AND DEATH AT ST. BREACA'S.

IN EIGHT CHAPTERS. CHAPTER III.

THE family of Mr. Arthur Monsey were by no means interesting, but it is necessary to say somewhat about them. He was no uncommon specimen of his class; positively cold-hearted and self-indulgent; negatively unprincipled. Short, fat, and plain, his handsome hands and courteous bearing alone hinted at his good birth. He liked drink and play. He had been dismissed civilly by a clergyman who took private pupils, expelled from a public school, advised by his colonel to sell his commission. After these experiences, and when he was about twenty-five, he suggested to his parents that it might be a good plan to send him to travel. They acquiesced readily, and for five or six years they heard from him only when he wanted money. He was amusing himself in his own way in the pleasantest capitals of Europe. Then, at Vienna, without exactly intending it, he proposed to a young lady, half English, half Austrian, who had been sufficiently conspicuous for levity to be very unacceptable to an old-fashioned, well-regulated, well-descended British family; and he applied for an income that would enable him to marry. "The bare fact of her being willing to marry him is quite enough to stamp her," said his father. And his mother could only suggest that he could not expect anything better; that no prudent father would give a daughter to him; that he might do even worse; that there was just a chance of his settling if he had children. So they agreed to give him one thousand pounds a year; and Miss Lydia Courtenay became Mrs. Arthur Monsey.

When Sir Geoffrey received the letter which has been mentioned, he had been, in consequence of his father's death, several years the head of the family; and Arthur had three children, — a boy of ten and two girls younger. The boy, as future baronet, interested him: he was proud, and perhaps even fond of him. For the girls he cared little, and was simply not unkind to them. Their mother had fallen into ill-health, lost her good looks and zest for stirring. She loved her children better, and thought and did more for them than might have been expected of a woman who had grown up without any moral or religious training. For her personal comforts she depended on a certain Suzanne, who had been her nurse, and was her maid; and, provided she would not leave her, she had no objection to live in England. She only stipulated that the climate should be as mild as possible; and as far as she could, she influenced her husband to accept Sir Geoffrey's terms. And so he did, protesting the while that he was treated infamously, but sacrificed himself to his children. The boy was to go to Eton; the girls were to be dealt with as their mother chose; and they were to live rent free in the old Gray House at St. Breaca's. When Sir Geoffrey had made a good road thither, and altered it into a comfortable dwelling, he decided that it would be a pity to have it occupied only a few weeks in the year.

The Arthur Monseys being settled in it, two summers after that visit of Sir Geoffrey's which made him acquainted with Dan Quick's house, it acquired again a questionable character in public opinion. The dark foreign servants, who spoke, two of them, no English; the gentleman with occasional doubtful visitors, and actual intemperate habits, who was said to be up half the night, and in bed three parts of the day, who lounged about smoking, followed by three or four useless dogs: and the fact that none of the household went "to church or meeting," made the St. Breacans very uncomfortable.

"Only that Sir Geoffrey told me hisself as the gent as was coming was his brother, I never would ha' believed it, — never," said Mrs. Rowe of The George. "Chalk and cheese b'ant more unlike one another; and I ha'n't no patience with parson for going out there as he do. He don't booze I knows, — the Lord forbid I should say so! — but them as does a'n't fit company for a minister."

Such talk as this reached Mrs. Secker, though she was no gossip; and seizing what seemed to her a favorable time, she repeated it to her husband. At first, he said that St. Breaca's detested and calumniated Mr. Monsey simply because he was a gentleman. Mrs. Secker thought not, for Sir Geoffrey was exceedingly popular; so was Mr. Treheren, the nearest resident squire.

"Then," replied he, "they hate him because they see that he and Mrs. Monsey are superior to their tea and twaddle; because they are parts of an elevated social system into which they never were, and never can be, admitted. Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins and Mr. and Mrs. Treize, would tell a different story if they were asked out there to eat mackerel-pie, and drink gin and water. — Ha, ha!" he ejaculated with tone, look, and gesture which might have made the reputation of a tragedian denouncing a conspiracy, "I see it all" (he was great in attributing small motives): "the low, mean, dirty spite! They cannot brook that I should be welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Monsey! They have always felt that there was something in me which they could not drag down to their own level; and it was, 'O, Mr. Secker is so very eccentric.' But gentlemen come among them, men of birth and social standing, and these men choose the eccentric Mr. Secker for their frequent guest, — show pointedly that he is one of themselves; and then the venom of envy overflows, and Mr. and Mrs. Monsey are — immoral, forsooth!" He walked rapidly about the room, his face working. A clever woman, if even inexperienced in Mr. Secker, would have let the subject drop; but Mrs. Secker was not clever, and she never learned how to manage her husband. She was very resolute when she thought principle concerned, and, though trembling a little, she remarked, "A clergyman is different from every one else."

"Certainly; in St. Breaca's he is a finished gentleman and man of the world."

"I mean" — she felt frightened, but would go on — "we are told to 'avoid all appearance of evil'; and if people think that you encourage what is sinful —"

He stopped, and confronted her, glaring. She thought he was going to strike her; so did the children, and they shrieked. He seized the only armchair, lifted it high, dashed it furiously on the uncarpeted floor, so that it was shattered; hissed at her with frightful distinctness, "Confound you low, vulgar, cursed cant!" snatched his hat, and left the house.

"O mamma," said a little intelligent, nervous-looking girl, twelve years old, "why did you speak to him? It is never any use. I am always so sorry when you do."

"Hold your tongue, Sophia," returned the poor, pale, tearful mother, petulantly; "I am a better judge of what I ought to do than you are."

"But it will be dreadful when he comes in again; and perhaps he will make me go for a walk; and he will say horrid things of every one, — even of you; and he will make me cry, and then scold me for crying, and tell me not to make an exhibition of myself, — as if I could help it, — and terrify me. I have often thought he would kill me; and suppose he should — and be hanged! I wonder we have not, all of us, fits. And perhaps, in the night, I shall hear him roaring at you, and you answering, crying; and I shall think he is murdering poor baby or you; and I shall be in the dark, and it will be horrible — horrible. I wish we could all run away; and I cannot help it — I am so ashamed too. I know the people next door must hear him, and opposite too; they look very oddly at him, often. And what must Patty say? When he has made me cry dreadfully out of doors, if we have met any one, he has led me up to them — he did it to a man the other day — and said, 'There, pray, gratify your curiosity. This is my daughter. Would you like to ask any questions?' The man looked foolish, and walked off, but I'm sure he thought papa was mad. I wonder if he is — is he?"

She asked it vehemently, and as if she believed that her mother could and ought to answer her.

"Hush, hush! my darling," she replied; "it is not right to talk of a parent in that way. Your poor papa is a very clever man, and very superior to every one here, and he was never meant to be poor. He is not fit for anything but to lie on a sofa, in a silk dressing-gown, and read, and have letters brought him on a silver waiter. I suppose he cannot help his temper, — at all events, we ought to think so; and you know, after all, that he is fond of us, and sorry when he has been angry. I am sure I don't know how I am to get that chair mended, and it is the only one he likes to sit on. Bryant would not mend it for less than half a crown, and I cannot spare the money. You had better put the pieces away somewhere, or he will say something about them. And mind, dear, there's One above who knows all, and does not let anything happen but for our good. — Now, play with baby while I sew on these buttons."

This scene was a fair sample of the moral training given to Mr. Secker's children. His wife did not again attempt remonstrance; and he dined occasionally — often on Sundays — with the Monseys, and spent frequent hours, early in the day, with Mrs. Monsey, attracted chiefly by her good piano. He was an ardent lover of music, and played exquisitely by ear. It is due to him to say that he had never seen Mr. Monsey intoxicated; that gentleman preferred to stand well in his opinion, and, for the sake of his really pleasant companionship, deferred his deeper potations, willingly, till Mr. Secker had started on his early walk home.

During their first two years at the Gray House, the little girls, Lotty and Teresa Monsey, had no manner of instruction, and were confided implicitly to Suzanne. They spoke French, German, and English equally fluently and ill; played a little by ear, danced by instinct, and were utterly unlike what young English ladies of their age are prescribed to be. Partly from indolence, and partly because she did not like to check them, Mrs. Monsey did not trouble herself to seek a governess. At last, when Lotty was eleven years old, Suzanne suggested that the young ladies were old enough for a school-room, and that it would be easy to find an accomplished young Frenchwoman. She had heard, she said, from her sister, who was confidential servant to a certain Madame Montansier, of a Mademoiselle Jeanne Royer, an orphan, just about to leave the Ursuline Convent at Rheims, and highly qualified to impart education. It has been implied that Mrs. Monsey's training had been very defective; this may explain, in some measure, the irregularity of her allowing her maid to find and introduce an instructress for her children.

Mademoiselle Royer arrived, — a little childish-looking creature of eighteen, with large, dark, coquettish eyes, abundance of brown hair, a neat figure, small hands and feet. Not pretty; no, certainly not. Her mouth was too large, and her lips were not full enough; her white teeth were uneven, and her nose was insignificant; but she was sufficiently attractive to arrest attention, and had force of character to detain it at will, to have secrets, and to keep them.

"Madame conceives that she is young and inexperienced," said Suzanne.

"Perhaps," said Mrs. Monsey; and her husband shrugged his shoulders.

The children flew to her, and pulled her long hair down, and kissed her over and over, and told her they were very glad she was not old, that they did not mean to learn lessons, and she should walk with them and play with them from morning till night.

Mademoiselle's manner was irreproachable, — deferential, slightly plaintive, to her superiors; and to her pupils-elect, caressing. That her private views of her position were unsatisfactory, must be inferred from her conduct when she was left in her bedroom on the night of her arrival. She threw herself on the bed, cried angrily till she was too weary to unpack, and at length fell asleep with her clothes on. She woke early, alarmed to find that she had burned out the candle, and from fear of being discovered dressed. She opened her boxes hurriedly, filled her drawers, arranged the dressing-table, undressed, and got into bed in time to tell Suzanne — who had undertaken to call her — that her head had ached from the fatigue of the long journey, and that, darkness being dismal in a strange house, she had presumed to keep her light in.

CHAPTER IV.

Mrs. Secker had an annual vacation. It was disturbed more or less by her husband's temper, and the chronic struggle with poverty; but the joys of that vacation deepened the pretty bloom, of which years and wrongs had not robbed her cheeks, made her step brisker, and her voice cheerier. Once in twelve months, her handsome, good, loving, first-born, Augustine came to spend six weeks at home. He had learned Greek, Latin, and arithmetic from a clever, hard-working schoolmaster at St. Breaca's, till he was thirteen. Then the shrewd, hearty surgeon and apothecary at Loganstone, who came sometimes, seven miles thence, to hear Mr. Secker preach, and chat with him afterwards, offered to take him and teach him his profession. "Mind, I don't want any money," he said. "I've feathered my nest, and my daughters are married comfortably, and the old woman and I are not extravagant. So, if you like to let the boy come, he's welcome; and I'll see that he keeps out of harm's way, and learns his business."

Mr. Secker winced at the familiar, homely form of the generous proposal, and said stiffly, "Indeed, my dear sir, you do me infinite honor, and I am proud that you think well of my son; but there is the walking the hospitals afterwards, and you know what my income is."

"Surely, but one need not look too far ahead. There's no knowing what may happen, — some one may leave you a fat legacy. 'Give us this day our daily bread,' you know, Mr. Secker."

"Ah! you have me there, doctor; but when I glance at the expense, I cannot feel justified. My dear mother paid Mr. Bagot, — he had a first-rate practice at Streatham — one hundred pounds a year for my board only, when she intended me for your profession, which, pardon me, I never could endure. I am not a little proud, though, that I was dresser to the great Cline."

"Well, I'm only a Cornish general practitioner, but that's not a bad thing, let me tell you. I shall call and talk to Mrs. Secker."

"Do, my dear friend, do," said Mr. Secker, contending with irritation, which he had not nerve to express. Unless in a fury, he did not speak offensively, and his wife had said once confidentially to her sister that he was a thorough coward. He intended, however, to write such a note as should overwhelm Mr. Hoskins with a sense of his inferiority, — intellectual, genealogical, social. The folly happily exhausted itself in saying to Mrs. Secker, "I shall give the purse-proud, vulgar gallipot to understand that we are not dependent on his beneficence, and that I consider I do him honor when I confide my son, and such a son, to his care!"

Augustine went to live with Mr. and Mrs. Hoskins, and became really dear to them, — and they pretended not to understand, or not to have received, occasional queer, quarrelsome notes from his father, — by which proceeding they secured the youth's love and gratitude more than by a salary of forty pounds, to which, when he became seventeen years old, Mr. Hoskins said that his really valuable services entitled him. "I hope you will put by some of it, Secker, every year, to begin a fund for hospital fees; if you do, and all else goes well with us, I will help you," were the concluding words that accompanied the first payment.

Mrs. Secker was watching for her son on a certain fine May evening in 1835. The weekly carrier had brought his box, and a hamper of comfortable good things from the Hoskinses. He would walk. On the box sat the little children, longing to have it opened. There were certainly presents in it for every one, — there always had been, — bought with Augustine's very own money. The day following would be his birthday, and Mr. Hoskins had considerably arranged that his holiday should begin in time for him to spend it at home. Mr. Secker had walked to the Gray House, and been kept, evidently, to dine. His wife and children were glad of it, — his uncertainty of temper and artificialness were a restraint on them, and spoiled greetings. The room seemed to grow suddenly darker when they heard his voice, and not his only; he had brought Mademoiselle and the children. It was a favorite freak of his, and a special annoyance to Mrs. Secker. She had always disliked the French girl, because she thought her forward and deep. She would have been ashamed to say so, — for she might have been suspected of jealousy, — but she was sure she tried to attract Mr. Secker; and, in her opinion, he paid her by far too much attention. At that moment flashed the thought: if she should take into her vain head to "set her cap at" Augustine! he was so innocent — yes, innocent, though in years as well as character a man. And in she came, chattering pretty imperfect English volubly, and speaking various languages with her eyes, only a few minutes before him. It was a great disappointment to him also. How could his mother throw her arms round him, and smother him with kisses? and how could the children seize him, and climb on him, and clamor to him, and about him, and enjoy him thoroughly before those strangers, to whom his father was doing elaborate politeness? Their pleasure was as completely spoiled as the tea and toast and crisp hot fish which had been calculated to a nicety for him. In about a quarter of an hour Mademoiselle said the children must go home, and there was some consolation in Mr. Secker's saying that they must not walk alone, and that, as his son was dusty, he would have the pleasure of walking with them.

When their joint vexation had had some relief in words, Augustine said, "So my father still goes there?"

"Yes, though he has taken offence several times, and written more than once to Mr. Monsey; but he has never noticed the letters — perhaps he has not read them, or could not understand them. He must be often glad of some one to talk to, and your father is very pleasant when he chooses."

"Yes, and how well he looks! And Mademoiselle is the better for Cornish air, — does she come here often?"

"Often more than I like, — she interrupts me continually and most inconveniently. I suppose she does not know always what to do with herself, and your father will press her to come. He has taken an immense fancy to her, and she does not choose to see that I never ask her to come again, or say that I am glad to see her."

"She does not understand, perhaps."

"O yes; she does: she understands whatever she chooses."

"I suppose I shall have to go and dine there two or three times. It is, of course, good-natured to ask me, but I do dislike it very much. I do not want to be patronized, and they are not in my line, and I am as well aware of it as they are; but if I say anything of the kind to my father, he will be irritable, and irritate me."

"Yes; he will say you are consciously unfit for 'good society,' as he will persist in calling those people. It is very strange that he cannot see that they are really out of society. No one visits them. He is fond of calling himself a man of the world, but he is perfectly blind. I have never said anything to him about his visits there since he broke that chair, and I dare not say a word, except to you, about yourself, — but it is not a house for a good young man to go to, particularly a clergyman's son. There is no doubt in the world that Mr. Monsey drinks, and is unsteady; and I am sure Mrs. Monsey has not been always what she ought to be. Before they came, Sir Geoffrey and Lady Monsey, who were so nice and unaffected that I quite liked to talk to them, told us that it was useless to conceal that painful family reason sent Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Monsey here, — that he had always given great trouble, and there was no hope of his reforming, — but they hoped to save the boy, — you see they never let him come here without a tutor, and then they stay at The George. Then that Mademoiselle Royer. What young girl, with prudent friends, would be allowed to stay there? And why should she choose to stay, if she had not some discreditable reason? She is clever enough to earn her bread anywhere. Perhaps they pay her very high. But how can she like to live in that wild, lonely place, with no companions but two spoiled, wild, troublesome children? Of course, you ought not to go there, but I suppose you must, and pray God to keep you from the evil."

"There's one comfort at any rate," said Augustine: "the evil is, in this instance, no temptation to me."

By this time Jeanne had been two years at the Gray House. Her pupils liked her: she was naturally obliging and good-natured. Mr. Monsey she saw seldom: Mrs. Monsey took her for a drive sometimes, and had her frequently with her in the evening, and was civil to her. But she was often visibly depressed and weary. When released from the children, she took long wild walks, even late at night, — sat on the rocks reading books, which she kept locked up, and wrote letters which she posted herself. This Mrs. Monsey had remarked, for she kept the key of the post-bag, and had sometimes wanted Mademoiselle when she was writing. "Perhaps she has a lover, Suzanne?"

"I am not in her confidence, Madame."

"I wonder if she would like to go and see her friends, — she may if she likes, and stay a month or two. She has been here a long time, and behaved very well."

"Would Madame make the suggestion herself? It would be more gratifying to Mademoiselle, no doubt."

The young lady was much obliged, — deeply grateful; but she had no nearer relative than aunts, and no special tenderness for them. She had become much attached to England, devoted to her dear charge, and Madame and Monsieur were all consideration.

MY BROTHER LEONARD.

BY JULIA KAVANAGH.

It has always seemed to me, since I passed those giddy but happy years of youth when we feel too much to care to think, — it has, I say, always seemed to me, that some of us are born to act and to suffer, and others to sit passively and look on. From childhood upwards to this present hour, — when I sit writing alone, a white-haired woman, in an old château of Provence, — to be the silent witness of my brother Leonard's life has been my lot. No lover came to me; no dream of love ever crossed my path. But I do not regret it; no, I do not regret it, though I am now a childless old maid, pale and withered. If love, with its blessings and its torments, had sought me, if a husband had taken me to another home than this, what should I have known of that shy and noble heart which grief never conquered, but a great joy broke and stilled forever!

According to the world's estimate my brother Leonard's life was not an eventful one. For in this, too, the parts allotted to the actors in the great drama of life are unequally divided. Some get the glorious destinies. Their star sets or rises in a sort of tempestuous splendor, and leaves a long track of light behind it through the dull pages of history. So far as I can see, they are not more noble, more heroic, more beautiful than others of whom there is no record, who live and die unremembered save by a few faithful hearts. But, after all, what matter? What is it to my brother Leonard, in his grave, if the world never knew that it lost in him a pure heart, chivalrous and true as that which once beat in the bosom of Bayard, — of the knight who knew neither reproach nor fear, and who died in all honor after living without a stain? My brother Leonard never wielded lance or sword, but there are other battles fought in life than those in which blood is shed; and of all who ever struggled nobly against adverse fate, who knew how to bear defeat, or, harder still, how not to triumph over a conquered enemy, none were ever more worthy of honor than this unremembered man.

He was the eldest and the youngest of a large family of children, all born in this old Provençal nest built on a rock above the Mediterranean Sea. It is a fair old manor enough, at least I think it so; I like its yellow sunburnt front and the square tower which rises above its low roof, and its many tall windows, with small glass panes, which flash again in the fiery light of the setting sun. I like its broad view of an azure sea with a whitening horizon, and even the arid plains which surround our old home, I like to. For in that desert our green garden is like a beautiful oasis, cool and shady. It is an old-fashioned garden, — they have none such now, — with straight alleys and clipped trees; here and there a few heathen statues, moss-stained and mildewed, appear in the bowers; and on the lawn, in front of the house, a slender fountain ever throws up its waters, howsoever hot the noonday sun may be. But why do I speak of all this? I am the last of the De Lansacs, and in my languid veins their once hot Provençal blood is dying away feebly.

We were great and rich once, say the records of Provence; but the religious wars proved our undoing. We were Catholics, and had many a fight with our old foes and neighbors the De Sainte Foys, who held the new faith. We beat them of course, but though we were fierce and revengeful, we scorned to enrich ourselves with the spoils of our enemies, and as they soon bent to the storm the warfare which wellnigh ruined us left them rich. Better times came for them, and worse times for us; they married rich heiresses and thrived, whilst we wedded poor girls, had large families, and got poorer and poorer. We had but a slender pittance left under the First Napoleon's reign, but we hated the De Sainte Foys, whose grand old château on the opposite hill went on adding wings and building "pavilions," whilst our poor old manor crumbled away. The sight of it fed our hate. As a child I looked at it with wrath, and even now, when it holds all that is dearest to me, I never care to gaze at its broad façade.

My brother Leonard and I were the only survivors of a large family, and many years divided us. Both our parents were dead, and we lived here alone with a maiden aunt, a pale faded woman, such as I am now, who glided noiselessly about the old rooms and seldom spoke.

All the De Sainte Foys were handsome, and all the De Lansacs were tall. My brother was six feet high, a gaunt, thin young man, with harsh features, keen eyes, and heavy eyebrows. He was a great sportsman, yet most inconsistently tender-hearted. I never saw him strike his dogs, I never saw him hurt a fly; once his gun was out of his hands he was the gentlest of creatures. For all that he was a great hater. Especially did he hate the Corsican, as he called Bonaparte, and perhaps he hated him all the more that the De Sainte Foys were devoted to the new dynasty, and spent all their time in Paris. I remember the scornful looks my brother often cast on the closed windows of their château. "Just like them," he muttered. "Timeservers; anything for money, anything for rank; just like them!"

I was sent to a convent when I was ten years old, and I remained there till I was seventeen. The nuns were very kind to me, but spite their kindness I pined for my old home and the sea dashing up the beach, and the green garden with its mutilated statues and its little fountain.

So when I stepped out of the convent-gates into the little carriage which had been sent for me with our old servant Saint Jean, I was, spite a few tears shed at parting from my kind companions, as gay as a lark. The sun was setting when we reached home. The sunburnt land looked flooded with fire and gold, and our old manor seemed almost fresh and young again in the glorious light. I skipped lightly out of the little jolting car; I ran up the stone steps, still as worn and uneven as of yore; I entered the bare old hall with all the grim De Lan-

Of all the rooms in the manor, there was one which, even as a child, I had dearly liked, — the upper room in the square turret, whence there was a view of land and sea unrivalled in the province it was said. Why should I not climb up to it now, like the Lady of Malbrouk in the ballad, and gaze at a blue sea and a pale sky, where white stars began to twinkle, though the horizon was still rosy with departed fires! Perhaps I might even see a boat gliding along the waters, — one of those low boats with broad lateen sails which I had, so often thought of in my inland staircase in our manor, with steps of massive stone and balustrades of iron, which takes us to the highest floor of the house, and ends in a long corridor, full of doors, all leading to untenanted chambers save one, which gives access to the dark and narrow spiral stairs that climb up the body of the square tower, and take one to a little room with four windows and a terrace around it, of late; my sight, too, is weak and dim and sees no more as it once beheld them the glories of God's world; but I was light as a bird then, ay, and as keen-eyed too, and in a few minutes I had reached the room in the tower. It was much altered from my childish remembrance of it. I had ever known it bleak and bare-looking, and now it bore manifest signs of being tenanted. There was a flask of wine on a table, and when I curiously lifted up an old piece of tapestry which divided the room in two, I some must not dusty, he would them.

When their joint vexation in words, Augustine said, "So my there?"

"Yes, though he has taken offence several times and written more than once to Mr. Monsey; but no one knew when he would come back, and I felt the walls, — w times sobered me at once. I felt anxious, as if I were troubled. Napoleon had left Elba and Foy, I knew, was a proscribed man, for we had met a party of soldiers in search of him. Yet, surely, my brother the Corsican-hater was safe! "O yes, quite safe," answered my aunt. "Then, looking at me wistfully, she added, "Rose," — oh! "we have a guest! Our old cousin the Viscount died, you know, leaving a widow and child almost destitute; they are both here and are likely to remain. You will do well to be friendly with them. Madame de Lansac is a great beauty, and has been rather spoiled, and her little girl is very wilful; but still," said my aunt, looking at me in that wistful way, "you will do well to be friendly with them." Youth is inclined to friendliness, and as my aunt's real meaning never once occurred to me, I cheerfully promised to be all that the beautiful Madame de Lansac could wish. I had no immediate opportunity of showing her how amiable I was; she did not appear, and when my aunt left me to attend to some domestic matters I remained alone. But does solitude really exist for youth with the delightful companionship of its thousand dreams and hopes notes in the noonday sun? Besides it like gay mites in the home of my childhood? I could I feel lonely in the home of my childhood? I went up to my old room and found it unchanged after all those years; then I ran down to the garden, so fresh and dewy in the pleasant evening; I explored every green nook, I looked fondly at the poor old statues and fancied that they looked back kindly at me. I was half-crazy with the joy of being home again. Of all the rooms in the manor, there was one which, even as a child, I had dearly liked, — the upper room in the square turret, whence there was a view of land and sea unrivalled in the province it was said. He perjured; he was almost covered, and sobbed pitifully; but he came to me in your peril, and trusting

Here was news for us! The relations of that poor little orphan, our sixth or seventh cousin, had with rare coolness transferred her to us, and taken advantage of our absence to deceive poor Geneviève. Without uttering a word my brother opened the door of our sitting-room. It is a large room, with brown oaken walls and a polished floor. A stream of red sunshine from the west was pouring in through the farthest window, that at which I always sit, because it has a deep recess and a broad ledge on which I put my work. To this ledge the little stranger had climbed, and there she now sat in a forlorn attitude, with her feet gathered beneath her, and her little hands clasped around her knees. She might be six or seven years old. She looked fair as a lily in her deep mourning, and when she turned towards us, and shook back her yellow curls to look at us with wistful wonder in her deep blue eyes, I knew at once the lovely face of her beautiful grandmother. I looked at my brother Leonard. His heavy brows were bent, and his keen eyes fastened on the child with a steady gaze. He smiled, too, rather a grim ironical smile, which seemed to say, "So the traitress has come back to De Lansac after all." But the little thing returned his look very fearlessly, and, to my surprise, smiled up in his face, and never minded me.

We had not the heart to send her away. We kept her, and I soon loved her dearly. She was a good, lovely, and joyous creature. It was like having a bird, or a sunbeam, or anything bright and gay, to have her in the house. Leonard never took the least notice of her; I sometimes fancied he did not see her, so unconscious did he seem of her presence. Yet of us two it was this cold and careless cousin whom the perverse child preferred. She would leave me any day to sneak after him. Lucie had been a year with us when Geneviève, who doted upon her, came in one afternoon with startled looks. The child was missing; she had been searched for over all the manor, and she was not to be found. My brother looked up from his book, and rose. I followed him up the central stairs, then up again in the tower to the chamber, which he unlocked, and there we found Lucie fast asleep in his chair, curled round like a faithful little spaniel waiting for its master.

My brother never said a word, but took her up, and carried her down stairs still fast asleep, and when Lucie woke below she was on his knee, in his arms, and from that day forth in his heart. They were seldom apart. If you heard my brother's stately step about the house, you also heard a pair of little feet pattering after him. His loud cheerful laugh was ever echoed by a childish voice clear as a silver bell, and if he locked himself up in the library for an hour's lonely reading, his case was vain unless he also closed the window; for Lucie would climb up to the sill, jump down, and stealing behind his chair lay her rosy cheek to his, and mingle her golden locks with his iron-gray curls. How could he help loving a creature so endearing, — one who thought, felt, loved, and hated as he did, and who detested the De Sainte Foy's as cordially as if she had been a genuine De Lansac? I tried to check the feeling: in the first place because it was unchristian, and in the second because the De Sainte Foy's were in the shade just then. For a widow came to Provence, another's as adopted by a distant of her and taken to Tours; she died and young; we never saw her again time and I became a second after an ant's death kept her hale and vigorous. I was indeed, but whose were as keen as ever the joyous hearting to remember in a rarely, and the la forth, our return was foreseen event. We felt heartily glad w

This sobered me at once. I felt anxious. The times were troubled. Napoleon had left Elba and been conquered at Waterloo. Monsieur de Sainte Foy, I knew, was a proscribed man, for we had met a party of soldiers in search of him. Yet, surely, — surely my brother the Corsican-hater was safe! "O yes, quite safe," answered my aunt. Then, looking at me wistfully, she added, "Rose," — oh! what a mockery that name of mine seems now, — "we have a guest! Our old cousin the Viscount died, you know, leaving a widow and child almost destitute; they are both here and are likely to remain. You will do well to be friendly with them. Madame de Lansac is a great beauty, and has been rather spoiled, and her little girl is very wilful; but still," said my aunt, looking at me in that wistful way, "you will do well to be friendly with them." Youth is inclined to friendliness, and as my aunt's real meaning never once occurred to me, I cheerfully promised to be all that the beautiful Madame de Lansac could wish. I had no immediate opportunity of showing her how amiable I was; she did not appear, and when my aunt left me to attend to some domestic matters I remained alone.

But does solitude really exist for youth with the delightful companionship of its thousand dreams and hopes and wishes, which are ever flitting about it like gay motes in the noonday sun? Besides could I feel lonely in the home of my childhood? I went up to my old room and found it unchanged after all those years; then I ran down to the garden, so fresh and dewy in the pleasant evening; I explored every green nook, I looked fondly at the poor old statues and fancied that they looked back kindly at me. I was half crazy with the joy of being home again.

Of all the rooms in the manor, there was one which, even as a child, I had dearly liked, — the upper room in the square turret, whence there was a view of land and sea unrivalled in the province it was said. Why should I not climb up to it now, like the Lady of Malbrouk in the ballad, and gaze at a blue sea and a pale sky, where white stars began to twinkle, though the horizon was still rosy with departed fires! Perhaps I might even see a boat gliding along the waters, — one of those low boats with broad lateen sails which I had so often thought of in my inland convent home.

There is a broad central staircase in our manor, with steps of massive stone and balustrades of iron, which takes us to the highest floor of the house, and ends in a long corridor, full of doors, all leading to untenanted chambers save one, which gives access to the dark and narrow spiral stairs that climb up the body of the square tower, and take one to a little room with four windows and a terrace around it. I seldom go there now, for my breath has failed me of late; my sight, too, is weak and dim and sees no more as it once beheld them the glories of God's world; but I was light as a bird then, ay, and as keen-eyed too, and in a few minutes I had reached the room in the tower. It was much altered from my childish remembrance of it. I had ever known it bleak and bare-looking, and now it bore manifest signs of being tenanted. There was a flask of wine on a table, and when I curiously lifted up an old piece of tapestry which divided the room in two, I saw with surprise a low camp-bed behind it. "I suppose some servant sleeps here." I thought, and stepping out through one of the windows on the terrace, I looked around me with a delight which made me forget all else. The evening was very bright and clear, the sea lay calm and lovely beneath me, and far as eye could reach there spread a noble land stretching to the base of purple-looking hills. It was very fine, but I had no time to linger over the beauty around me. I was roused by a sound of voices coming from the room within. Hiding behind the shutters of the open window, I listened and peeped in.

"I tell you, I cannot," said a man's voice, "and I never said that I could. You must marry him."

The low weeping of a woman answered him. I saw the man first. He was no servant, as I had thought, but a gentleman, and, though long past youth, one of the handsomest men I had ever seen. He stood facing me with his arms folded across his breast, and a careless, defiant look in his dark eyes that gazed steadily on the clear evening sky. The lady was leaning against the wall with one of her hands resting on a chair. I could not see her at first, but when she turned her face to me I was bewildered at her beauty. He was handsome, but enchanting loveliness are the only words that can describe her. If such she looked to me when overpowered by sorrow, what must she have been when gladness beamed from those deep blue eyes, and happy smiles played on that sweet young face with its cloud of golden hair! I had never seen two such handsome creatures out of the fairy tales, and I was all amazement to see them here.

"O heavens!" she cried, clasping her white hands in an agony of grief, "have I betrayed him for that?"

"Why need he know it?" asked her companion, drawing towards her. I was very young, very innocent, and would not understand their meaning; but some revelation of it came to me when the door of the turret-chamber, which had remained ajar, opened, and my brother Leonard came in with such a look on his white face as I had never seen there before. She uttered a low cry, and starting back he turned pale as death; but Leonard raised his hand, and uttered an imperious "Hush!" which silenced them. For a moment the room was so still that I could hear the low dash of the water on the shore below.

"So that is the end," said Leonard, looking at them in sorrow and in scorn; "that is the end of trust and faith in man and woman. Do not answer — hear me both. Madam, I shall deal first with you. As the widow of my cousin, you asked me for a home, and I gave you one. When you came to this house with your child, your beauty, I confess it, touched my heart; but if you had not one day given me to understand that you had seen my love and that it might be welcome, I never should have wooed a lady so young and so beautiful as you are. On such a hint, however, I spoke and was accepted. I promised to become your protector and the father of your child, and you, I suppose, agreed to be true to me. How have you kept your pledge? Speak, but no, do not answer; be silent, let not at least your lips be perjured, even though your heart is false." He ceased: he was dreadfully agitated, and the lady sobbed pitifully; but he soon recovered, and turning to her companion, he said, almost calmly, "You, Monsieur de Sainte Foy, came to me in your peril, and trusting to my generosity and honor bade me revenge the old feud of our ancestors by saving your life. How did I receive you? Like a brother. And how have you repaid me? You know on what errand I went to Paris. Well, sir, I have succeeded; you are pardoned. You can leave this house; you need its shelter no more. You can go back openly to your own home, where you, too, have a child, sir, a boy for whose sake you implored my compassion; but mark my words, do not forget to take this lady with you."

"I cannot—I am married," sulkily said Monsieur de Sainte Foy, for the first time attempting to answer my brother.

"You are a widower, sir," answered Leonard, gravely; "your wife died whilst I was in Paris. I repeat it, you can take this lady with you. And, sir," he added, his eyes flashing angrily from beneath his heavy eyebrows, "let me advise you to do her justice. She is the widow of my cousin, and I will not see her wronged. I say no more; you are my guest, and though you have forgotten it, sir, I remember it still."

So saying, he turned away and left them. My eyes were blind with tears, and my heart was full of sorrow for my brother Leonard. I stood awhile looking down at the swelling bosom of the sea; then, when I was, or at least when I looked calm, I entered the room. The guilty pair had vanished: they left the manor that night, and this was the story of my brother's youth.

From that day forth Leonard was an altered man. He took to books, and became a great reader. His gun was added to the rusty old armor in the hall, and remained there unused; his days were spent in the library. His two hounds, Capitaine and Diane, used to go and seek him there, looking at him with wistful, questioning eyes; but though they always got a caress and a kind word, they could not lure him forth. "Why should I go and murder poor harmless creatures that never wronged or betrayed me?" he once said, and that was the only allusion I ever heard him make to the treachery that had darkened his existence. The blessing of a long life was not granted to the betrayers. Both died within a year of their marriage. Young De Sainte Foy was brought up in Paris, and seldom came to Provence; his stepmother's child was adopted by a distant relation of her mother, and taken to Tours; she, too, married and died young; we never saw her. And thus time passed, and I became a sedate old maid, and after my aunt's death kept house for my brother Leonard, a hale and vigorous old man, whose locks were gray indeed, but whose step was as firm and whose eyes were as keen as ever. He was cheerful, too, and the joyous heartiness of his laugh was something to remember in a man of his years. We left home rarely, and the last time that business took us forth, our return was made memorable by a very unforeseen event. We had been a week away, and I felt heartily glad when I saw once more the square tower rising above the yellow front of our old manor. Leonard, too, uttered a relieved "Ah!" as he helped me to alight, and Geneviève, our trusty old female servant, came forth to meet us with a beaming face.

"Thank Heaven!" she said, crossing herself, "it had seemed a hundred years since we had gone away, but all was right now, and the little girl had come quite safely, praised be Heaven! A real cherub! For though her grandmother had been foolish and wicked enough to marry a De Sainte Foy, the child—glory be to all the saints!—did not belong to that brood."

Here was news for us! The relations of that poor little orphan, our sixth or seventh cousin, had with rare coolness transferred her to us, and taken advantage of our absence to deceive poor Geneviève. Without uttering a word my brother opened the door of our sitting-room. It is a large room, with brown oaken walls and a polished floor. A stream of red sunshine from the west was pouring in through the farthest window, that at which I always sit, because it has a deep recess and a broad ledge on which I put my work. To this ledge the little stranger had climbed, and there she now sat in a forlorn attitude, with her feet gathered beneath her, and her little hands clasped around her knees. She might be six or seven years old. She looked fair as a lily in her deep mourning, and when she turned towards us, and shook back her yellow curls to look at us with wistful wonder in her deep blue eyes, I knew at once the lovely face of her beautiful grandmother. I looked at my brother Leonard. His heavy brows were bent, and his keen eyes fastened on the child with a steady gaze. He smiled, too, rather a grim ironical smile, which seemed to say, "So the traitress has come back to De Lansac after all." But the little thing returned his look very fearlessly, and, to my surprise, smiled up in his face, and never minded me.

We had not the heart to send her away. We kept her, and I soon loved her dearly. She was a good, lovely, and joyous creature. It was like having a bird, or a sunbeam, or anything bright and gay, to have her in the house. Leonard never took the least notice of her; I sometimes fancied he did not see her, so unconscious did he seem of her presence. Yet of us two it was this cold and careless cousin whom the perverse child preferred. She would leave me any day to sneak after him. Lucie had been a year with us when Geneviève, who dotted upon her, came in one afternoon with startled looks. The child was missing; she had been searched for over all the manor, and she was not to be found. My brother looked up from his book, and rose. I followed him up the central stairs, then up again in the tower to the chamber, which he unlocked, and there we found Lucie fast asleep in his chair, curled round like a faithful little spaniel waiting for its master.

My brother never said a word, but took her up, and carried her down stairs still fast asleep, and when Lucie woke below she was on his knee, in his arms, and from that day forth in his heart. They were seldom apart. If you heard my brother's stately step about the house, you also heard a pair of little feet pattering after him. His loud cheerful laugh was ever echoed by a childish voice clear as a silver bell, and if he locked himself up in the library for an hour's lonely reading, his case was vain unless he also closed the window; for Lucie would climb up to the sill, jump down, and stealing behind his chair lay her rosy cheek to his, and mingle her golden locks with his iron-gray curls. How could he help loving a creature so endearing,—one who thought, felt, loved, and hated as he did, and who detested the De Sainte Foy's as cordially as if she had been a genuine De Lansac? I tried to check the feeling: in the first place because it was unchristian, and in the second because the De Sainte Foy's were in the shade just then. The son of my brother's betrayer lived in Paris, and squandered or gambled all his large property away. The old château itself would have gone if he had not died rather suddenly, leaving but one son, a young man of whom report spoke well, and who, after his father's death, came to Provence with the intention, it was said, of remaining. It seemed strange to see the windows of the château open again after they had been closed so many years; but we got used to it.

Monsieur de Sainte Foy had not been back more than a month, and Lucie was about seventeen, when he unexpectedly called upon us one morning. I was working, Lucie sat by me unwinding silk, and my brother was reading, when our solitary manservant Jacques came in, and with scared looks announced our unexpected visitor. We all rose to receive the hereditary enemy of our house. He was a very handsome young man, — all the De Sainte Foyes were handsome, — with a manly young face, in which I did my best to read hereditary perfidy, but could not. There was truth in his dark eyes, truth in his smile, and truth in the very sound of his voice.

"Monsieur de Lansac," he said, coming forward, "our ancestors have not been friends, I am told; but I am young, I feel guiltless of the past, whatever it may be, and have no wish to cherish its resentments or its hatreds. I therefore come to you hoping that you will be so good as to grant your neighborly advice and friendliness to one who, though a stranger to this place, means to live and die in the home of those who have gone before him."

My brother smiled very kindly, and held out his hand, and thus a league of amity was struck between the last of the De Lansacs and the last of the De Sainte Foyes.

I had always deplored the old feud, but I had my fears about this reconciliation; and when young De Sainte Foy, who did much need my brother's advice, became a frequent visitor at our house, I plainly told those fears to Leonard. Lucie was very lovely and very young. What if this young gentleman should be smitten with her, and win her heart!

"Well, and if they should love, where would be the harm?" he replied, very kindly.

Ah! what changes time can bring in its train! My brother actually wished for this thing; and when months passed, and no sign of it appeared, I read disappointment in his looks. Well, I, too, was disappointed. They were both young, both handsome, both gifted and good, and both exactly suited to each other, as it seemed to me. I could not imagine how they met without pleasure and parted without pain, as unconcerned as if the magic of the word "Love" did not exist for them. Besides, I longed for a love-story. There had been none in my own life; my brother's had ended in bitterness. Why would not these perverse young things give me one? It would have been so pleasant to see them adoring each other, quarrelling and making it up again, and going through their pretty idyl in the green garden of our old manor. I was sorry that they did not care for each other, and I could not help saying so to my brother one evening as we walked alone in the garden. Lucie was up in the tower; she had taken a great fancy to it of late, and went up to it every evening.

"And I, too, am sorry," replied Leonard, shaking his gray locks regretfully; "for, Rose, I like that young man very dearly; strange that a De Lansac should say so, is it not? But he does not care for the child, and love will be free. Where is she? In the tower, as usual. Let us go up to her. It feels close down here."

I do not know why I opposed Leonard's wish. I seemed to have a presentiment of coming evil, and yet all I thought of was that the stairs were steep and high, and that the exertion would be too much for my brother. But he only laughed, and said he would go and see what stars the child was reading up there. He was soon tired, as I had foreseen, and obliged to rest on the dark stairs of the tower. A sound of voices from above came down to us. Lucie, if she was there, was not alone. I heard my brother breathing heavily.

"Leonard," I whispered, "let me go," for it was a man's voice that mingled with hers.

He did not answer, but he put me by; in a moment, as it seemed, he had reached the door and pushed it open. I followed him in. Lucie was alone in the room. Without looking at her, my brother went straight to the window, and said, calmly, "You may come in, sir."

And thus summoned, young Monsieur de Sainte Foy left the balcony and entered the room. I looked at them both. There they were — the two ingrates — as I had seen them so many years before; beautiful and deceiving, again betraying the kind friend and the generous enemy; but they were younger than in those bygone days, and I could read shame and grief on their two faces. My brother looked at them with the very look which I remembered, — a cold and angry look; and he said, in a cold hard voice, —

"I have read somewhere that what has been is; that the same men and women live again and again to do the same deeds over and over, and I find the truth of it this day. You, Monsieur de Sainte Foy, came to me, your hereditary enemy, asking our old animosity to be forgotten; and when I opened my house to you, as if you had been one of its sons, you abused my hospitality. Even so did your grandfather act, sir, when I saved his life many years ago. Hush! you will speak presently. You," he added, turning to Lucie, "have betrayed me, your adopted father, as she whose image you are betrayed me, her future husband; and, true to your destiny, you chose to do so with the descendant of the man to whom I was sacrificed. I, too, fulfilled my part in this repetition of an old story, for I was blind, trusting, and easily deceived. Well, as I acted before I shall act again. Let the lot you have chosen be your lot. You want this young girl, Monsieur de Sainte Foy? Take her! For the sake of the few drops of De Lansac blood which flow in her veins she may remain in this house till she becomes your wife; but I shall thank you both to have the wedding over quickly, and then let me see either of you no more."

Lucie buried her face in her hands, and sobbed pitifully; but the young man became crimson, and said passionately, —

"You wrong us, sir; we have been imprudent, but treachery was not in our thoughts. I repeat it, you wrong us."

"Do you think I am angry?" replied my brother Leonard. "Why, you could not help yourselves. It was in your blood to betray me, and it was my lot to be deceived by you."

"Ah! do not say so," cried Lucie, attempting to detain him as he turned to the door; but he who had so loved her looked at her so coldly that she shrank back afraid. So we left them; and, turning back, I saw her sinking on a chair, pale as death, whilst her lover stood looking after my brother, gnawing his nether lip, as if he still smarted under the sting of those bitter words: "It was in your blood to betray me."

Sad and bitter were the days that followed this ill-fated evening. I attempted to say a few words for poor Lucie, but my brother's only answer was, "Keep her out of my sight till they are married."

He was a wilful man, — one, too, whom the memory of a great wrong had embittered. It was useless to dispute his commands, and I told Lucie so.

"I have deserved it," was her only answer; and she submitted, and kept out of his way.

The wedding was to be a speedy one, according to my brother's wish; but, oh! how joyless were the few preparations, and with how heavy a heart I made them! Three days before that appointed for the marriage I again tried to move Leonard. It was a clear and calm evening, and we sat together on the wooden bench in the bower where the dilapidated Pan is ever playing on a broken reed. I pleaded for the two culprits. I spoke of their youth, of the wish he had felt for their union, of forgiveness and indulgence. He heard me out, then said, —

"I trusted them, and they deceived me without need, without cause. By what magic can I ever trust them again?"

I felt silenced. What is there, indeed, that can restore a lost faith? Still, I was seeking for some argument wherewith to move him, when we were both startled by a sound of steps on the gravelled path. Lucie and young De Sainte Foy stood before us. My brother's pale thin face took a slight hectic tinge, and he looked angrily at them both, but said not one word.

"Monsieur de Lansac," said the young man, — and I had never seen a nobler and a more loyal look on man's face than I then saw on his, — "we would not thus intrude upon you if we could help doing so, but we cannot; be so good, therefore, as to bear with us for a few moments."

"Speak," impatiently said my brother.

"All we have to say is this: our love was born and ripened in ignorance; our interviews were the result of accident; we never designed to deceive you, or to betray your trust, and you have laid upon us the burden of a sin and a shame which, however much appearances may condemn us, we will not bear. We love each other very dearly, but having no other means to convince you, we have resolved to part forever rather than give you the right to think that we, the descendants of two who unhappily wronged you, have combined to betray you in your old age as you were betrayed by them in your youth. In your presence, therefore, and with her full consent, I give up all claim to this young lady's love. Here I bid her adieu forever, and let the bitterness of such a parting atone for the imprudence which has cost us both so dear."

I looked at Leonard; I could scarcely see him, my eyes were so dim with tears; but he replied in a low, bitter voice, —

"Yes, the old man has but a few years to live. It will do to wait till he is in his grave, will it not?"

"Ah! we have not deserved this!" cried Lucie.

"No, we have not deserved it," answered her lover. "Sir, you wrong us very much indeed. A thought so cruel as that of waiting for your death never came to us. Our parting is to be irrevocable. My house and land are to be sold, and the first vessel which leaves Marseilles will take me to India. We may never meet again, and if we do, years will have passed over us, — years and their changes. If you do not trust us, if you think we are acting a part and speculating on your grave, the sin be yours, not ours."

"Marvellous!" replied my brother Leonard, with a low, ironical laugh. "A young man gives up his mistress, a girl gives up her lover, and all for the sake of a gray-headed old man! Do not ask me to believe it."

"Sir, it is not merely for your sake that we part," said young De Sainte Foy, with an angry light in his dark eye; "it is also for the sake of our honor. Our error has sullied it, but our sacrifice shall redeem it; and you yourself, sir, you our accuser, shall confess it."

My brother was staggered, but he would not relent.

"Yes, — yes, I know," he said, impatiently; "you think I am one of those soft-hearted stage fathers, who forgive the sinners and bestow their blessing in the last act. You are mistaken. If Lucie gives you up, she must give you up entirely. Do you hear, both of you, — entirely? I ask for no sacrifice; I expect none. But if you do give up this thing for the sake of your honor, you must not look back."

"We mean it so," answered the young man, in a low tone. "Lucie." He turned to her. She twined her arms around his neck; for a few moments they stood before us in the pale moonlight, clasped in so passionate an embrace that it seemed as if they could never again be sundered. Neither spoke, neither wept; but when I looked at them — so young, so fond, so noble, and so handsome — and thought that they were to part, I could not restrain my tears. My brother looked on unmoved, and uttered not a word of relenting. Young Monsieur de Sainte Foy at length put her by, and walked away without bidding us adieu. She stood looking after him, pale and tearless.

"Lucie," quietly said my brother, "you may call him back, if you repent your choice."

She looked at him swiftly, with a vague hope, poor child; but there was no relenting in my brother's eye, so her face fell a little, and she only shook her head, as much as to say, "I do not repent."

I have often wondered how my dear brother, so generous, so kind, could be so hard to these two. But he had trusted them entirely, and it pierced his very heart that they should have deceived him. Indeed, there was no reason why they should have done so. It must have been the waywardness of youth which allured them into this needless secrecy, giving sweetness to a hidden love. I could have made all these allowances for them, it seemed to me; but Leonard could not. He was hard because he was himself the soul of truth and honor, and he was unrelenting because the memory of his old wrong had never left him. It may also be, that in his secret heart he thought to try the two culprits for a time, and forgive them in the end; but it was not to be.

Lucie bore this great trial with quiet fortitude. She looked pale, and her old joyousness was gone; but if she grieved or wept, she kept both tears and sorrows to herself. To my brother she was as gentle and affectionate as ever. His manner to her was unaltered, save for a slight shade — a very slight shade — of more tenderness. I think my heart must have been young still in those days, for I kept on hoping to the last. I used to watch my brother Leonard's face, trying to read signs of pity or forgiveness in his harsh features, but I saw them not. Then, I confess it, I acted a little part. I would sigh deeply within his hearing, or look persistently at the château of the Sainte Foy's, when we were all in the garden, or murmur a "Poor child!" whenever Lucie left the room; but my brother would not see, he would not hear, — he never questioned me, nor gave me the opportunity I wanted. At length I got desperate, and spoke to him one evening.

"Leonard," I said, "will you not relent? Do you know that young De Sainte Foy's house and land are for sale, and will go to the highest bidder? Do you know that he sails for India to-morrow on board the Memphis?"

"You have seen him," said Leonard, knitting his heavy eyebrows, "and he has asked you to say all this to me?"

"I have seen him, but not spoken to him," I replied, a little angrily. "He is the shadow of his former self, — so pale, so worn, so sad, has he grown at all this. Do not let him go, Leonard."

"He will come back when I am in my grave," answered Leonard, moodily. It was useless to argue. Mistrust had taken an iron grasp of him, and would not let him go again.

On the evening of the following day we missed Lucie. Genevieve told us that Mademoiselle had gone up to the tower; I guessed what had taken her there, but Leonard did not seem to think that she might wish for solitude, for he said to me, "Let us go to her."

Never shall I forget the sight that met us as we entered that ill-fated room. It was full of a broad ruddy glow which came from the sea, lighting up the coast for miles around; a vessel was on fire! My heart seemed to stand still in the horror of that moment, and yet how I remember the pale evening sky, with the round white moon, and Lucie's ghastly face and wild eyes, as she stood gazing on the cruel sight in mute despair!

My brother stared at the burning vessel. "God forgive me, miserable sinner!" he cried, — "God forgive me!" And he sank back with a groan, and would have fallen but for me.

He never recovered that blow; for it was the Memphis whose destruction we thus witnessed, and young De Sainte Foy, who had sailed in her, was not amongst the few who escaped to tell her lamentable history. He was the last of his name, and with him ended the line of our hereditary enemies.

And Leonard, as I said, never recovered that blow. His vigorous old age gave place to decrepitude; his gray hairs grew white, his form was bent, his steps became feeble and unsteady. The knowledge that his mistrust and hardness had doomed that brave and true young man to a cruel death, and condemned Lucie, his darling, to go through the agony of such a grief, was more than he could bear. He brooded over the thought incessantly.

The weather was fine, and that part of the garden where he could sit and look at the château of the De Sainte De Foy's, now closed forever on its ancient tenants, was that which he liked best. He would sit there, gazing at the shut-up mansion, for hours at a time. When I tried to rouse him from this bitter contemplation, he only shook his head and said, "It was an old quarrel, a long quarrel; it lasted ages, but the De Sainte Foy's had the best of it in the long run, Rose. Far better perish on board the burning Memphis, — better lose love and life for honor, than live to be a hard and revengeful old man." This was the thought that was killing him. "Make him forget," said the doctor whom I called in, "and then you may hope to save him."

Make him forget! I would have laid down my life for it, — O, how gladly! — but it passed my power; Lucie herself did her best and failed. What she really felt and suffered she never showed. She was a generous little creature, and from the first she buried her grief deep in her heart, and kept it there fast locked from our view. Her one thought seemed to be to cling to Leonard. He no longer read now, though when he could not go to the garden to look at the château of the De Sainte Foy's he would sit in the library with a book lying unread before him, his moody eyes ever seeming to gaze on the tragic ending of the ill-fated Memphis. But no more than than formerly could he escape Lucie. She would steal in upon him as she had so often stolen in her childhood, and lay her cheek to his fondly and silently. I do believe she had never loved him more tenderly than she did then, perhaps because of the same deep grief through which they both suffered, and which, as I saw with an aching heart, was wasting them both away. This had lasted three weeks, — weeks as long as years, — when the end came. We were all sitting in the garden, I remember, in that very arbor where the poor god Pan is ever piping away, when Genevieve came up to us with startled looks.

"Monsieur! — Mademoiselle!" she gasped. "He is alive! — here he is!"

My brother rose as with an electric shock. He strode towards her; he pushed her away, and then young De Sainte Foy stood living before us. "Sir," he said, "I did not mean to intrude upon you; but my life has been saved by a miracle, and as I am told that the report of my death has been a heavy trouble to you, I come —"

He did not go on.

"Thank God!" gasped my brother. "Thank God! But it is too much; ah! it is too much."

And it was too much indeed! The joy was too exquisite and too great for his true heart, for as he uttered the words he sank back on his seat and died. What sorrow, what faith betrayed, and love lost, had not done, the joy of seeing his hereditary foe safe and well before him, did.

My little tale is told. I am very happy, for my dearest Leonard has only gone before, and the two whom we both loved so dearly are blest. Yes, I am happy; but you know now what I meant when I said that the lot of some is to suffer, and that of others to look on. This was certainly my lot, and maybe that is why, though so happy, I sometimes feel rather useless. My part is ended, and all I can do now is to remember what I can see no more. Be it so; memory, too, is sweet.

BRITISH PEARLS.

SENECA, the Roman moralist, found fault with a patrician lady of his acquaintance for wearing a whole fortune in her ears; not meaning to insinuate that the said ears, like pinky Venus-shells, were a fortune in themselves, — for, as a philosopher, he was above such fadaises, — but because he was aghast at the millions of sesterces represented by each of her pearl eardrops. The taste for pearls is of very great antiquity, but it is remarkable that they are mentioned but once in the Old Testament, — viz. in Job xxviii. 18, in conjunction with coral.

Solomon's merchant navy traded to Ormuzd and Ind, possibly even to Ceylon; yet, though his ships are recorded to have brought back consignments of ivory, apes, and peacocks, and doubtless precious stones also, we hear nothing of pearls in the enumeration of their master's riches. However, in the New Testament we find the "pearl of great price" employed, as an image familiar to oriental minds, to typify something of exceeding beauty and value; and in after years, throughout the flowery language of Eastern poets and improvisadores, "fair and spotless as a pearl" became proverbial, more especially in reference to the unsullied purity of virtue. We can hardly suppose that the pearl-oysters of Ceylon or the Persian Gulf were unknown to Solomon or to his Phœnician ally, Hiram king of Tyre, whose ships traded far and wide, and possibly rounded the Cape of Storms centuries before Vasco di Gama renamed it the "Cape of Good Hope" on his way to India.

Pearls appear to have been known at Rome after the Jugurthine War (they are still found off the Algerine coast at the present day), but it was not until after the taking of Alexandria that they became universally fashionable in the imperial city. Previously to this, however, the fame of the pearls of Britain had reached the ears of Julius Cæsar in Gaul; nay, Suetonius declares that the cupidity of the future emperor, who had a pretty taste for gems and objets de luxe of every description, was the main inducement for his first invasion of Britain, where he hoped to possess himself of some of these pearly treasures. After the occupation of Britain by the Romans, we find Cæsar presenting a buckler, incrustated with Britannie pearls, to Venus Genetrix, suspending it as a votive offering in the temple of that goddess at Rome. Pliny takes care to mention that the inscription recorded their British origin (this alone implies that oriental pearls must have been already well known), and he rather seems to disparage the gift on that account; but the Roman ladies were apparently of a different opinion, for Britannie pearls speedily became the rage, and enormous sums were given for choice specimens by the fair leaders of ton at Rome, Pompeii, and "shining" Baïæ, the Biarritz of imperial Rome. Antony, or as some allege, Agrippa, brought a pearl from Egypt so large that, cut in half, it formed a pair of earrings for the statue of Venus in the Pantheon; but this was of course an oriental or an African gem. The Roman ladies wore pearls in their hair and on various parts of their dress, even on the straps of their sandals, as well as on their arms, neck, and ears. In the latter they were frequently worn, as we learn from Pliny, loosely strung together in separate drops, when they were termed crotalia, or castanet-pendants, and the fair wearers took a childish delight in the rattling of these drops as they clicked against each other with every movement of the head. Pliny denounces the new "sensation" very warmly, complaining that the malady had reached even the common people, who had a proverbial saying that "a pearl worn by a woman in public is as good as a lictor before her." He further makes mention of a wedding-feast, at which Lollia Paulina, the wife of Caligula, was present, covered with emeralds and pearls disposed in alternate layers and rows on her head and hair, woven into wreaths, hanging from her ears, encircling her neck, arms, and fingers, and decorating every part of her dress. He gravely censures this prodigal display, and appraises it at no less than £300,000 of our money. The Britannie pearls were held in peculiar estimation by these dainty dames for their pinky hue (at the present day those that come from the Persian Gulf are golden yellow, and the Ceylon specimens mostly white), and the oriental ones seem for a time to have gone more or less out of fashion. In reference to Britain, Tacitus, in his Agricola, mentions that pearls of a "tawny livid color" were frequently thrown up by the waves on its shores, and then collected by the islanders; but these, from the description of the tint, were in all probability bits of amber, rounded and polished by the action of the waves, such as may be picked up at the present day after any great storm on the Norfolk and Suffolk coasts. We should note, however, that Venerable Bede, writing some centuries later, but quoting apparently from Solinus, says that "excellent pearls are found in the British seas, various in color, though principally white."

Meantime, in the prodigal age of imperial Rome, while the husbands spent half their incomes on banquets of nightingales' tongues and Kentish oysters from the "Rutupian bottom," the latter being imported at fabulous prices,—their wives, as Seneca hints, hung the other half from their ears in the shape of British pearls. Fashion, no less than history, proverbially repeats itself; and since gold and silver dust for the hair, African cosmetics, and other adventitious aids to beauty, after being a crying evil in Juvenal's days, have lately returned to us in full force, so likewise are British, and more particularly Scotch, pearls daily more sought after by the fair sex. Even Cleopatra's extravagant feat of dissolving a costly pearl in vinegar and drinking it off at a banquet, had its exact parallel in England during Elizabeth's reign. That grave and otherwise frugal citizen, Sir Thomas Gresham, is said to have reduced to powder a pearl valued at £15,000, and to have drunk it in a glass of wine to the health of her Majesty, thereby winning his wager from the Spanish ambassador as to which of them would give the most costly dinner. But the material for this ruinous toast was in all probability like its Egyptian prototype, an oriental specimen.

In the Middle Ages Scotch pearls were celebrated on the continent of Europe for their size and beauty, and their peculiar pink hue was highly esteemed by foreign magnates. The famous hussar-jacket of Prince Esterhazy, entirely covered with pearl embroidery, was largely indebted for its sheeny splendor to Scottish pearls. But pearls are fragile things to hold, and at court festivities the prince's track in a waltz was marked by a shower of pearls scattered profusely around him; while the wear and tear incidental to donning and doffing the precious garment was a small fortune to his valet, who carefully gathered up the cast-off wealth of his master from the dressing-room floor.

Nor in these early days was Ireland behindhand in contributing gems "rich and rare" from her loughs and streams. Many beautiful pearls were found in the rivers of Donegal and Mayo, and other districts beyond the Pale; and on October 13, 1688, we find Sir Robert Reading corresponding with the Royal Society on the structure, color, and so forth of the Irish pearls. In England, the pearls from the river Irt, in Cumberland, became so noted that, "fair as Irtou pearls" became a proverbial byword in the North country. The river Conway, in Wales, was also famous; and at the present day the fresh-water mussels are called by the Welsh countryfolk "deluge-shells," from their supposed origin in Noah's flood. Sir R. Wynne presented a magnificent pearl from the Conway to Catharine of Braganza, queen of Charles II., and it still figures as one of the principal adornments of the royal crown. Though the mania for native pearls seems to have partially died out in the next half-century, yet between 1761 and 1764, pearls to the value of £10,000 were sent to London from the rivers Tay and Isla, then, as now, the principal centre of the Scottish pearl-fisheries. But, as Mr. Bertram justly remarks, the trade carried on in the corresponding three years of the present century represents far more than double that amount, and it increases every year. We owe the revival of this ancient industry to the discernment and enterprising spirit of a foreign dealer in gems at Edinburgh, who, having occasionally met with fine pearls said to come from the Scotch rivers, was so attracted by their size and beauty, that he resolved to collect them in a systematic way, by travelling through the country and buying up all the good specimens he could find. This stimulated the search for more: and the visits of the foreign gentleman, who gave such good prices, soon sent man, woman, and child into the lochs and streams, groping for mussels, and prizing them open in search of their occasional precious contents. On the classic banks of "bonnie Doon," which at one time had a good reputation for its pearls, the mussel-hunt grew so keen among the Ayrshire folk after the jeweller's visit, that it became locally known as the "pearl-fever." Nor is it surprising that the epidemic should be catching, when we learn that in 1863 the wages paid by him to those employed in pearl-fishing on his account exceeded £150 a month, while there were besides many other fishers who traded independently, making a very comfortable living by an occupation which involved no capital and comparatively slight exertion. The mussels are usually found in the clearer parts of the stream; and if lying too deep to be reached by the hand, are easily captured by inserting a stick between the gaping shells, which instantly close upon it, and both are drawn up together. It would seem that, on an average, one mussel in every 100 or 130 contains a pearl, though this is of course a variable calculation. Mr. Unger was rewarded for his spirited exertions by gradually collecting a large number of remarkably fine specimens, which commanded prices varying from £5 to £60; and titled, nay even royal ladies, caught the infection, and eagerly sought after these Scottish gems. Their fame soon spread to the Continent, especially to France, where the Empress Eugénie, herself on one side of Scottish extraction, possesses a splendid necklace formed entirely of Scottish pearls. More recently foreign agents have appeared in the north in quest of these gems, and the trade waxes brisker than ever. Nay, even the Australians, bent upon acclimatization projects, are anxious to import the pearl-mussel to their rivers. Nor is the fishery confined to the Tay, the Doon, or the Isla. Other streams, such as the Clyde, Earn, Teith, Ythan, Forth, &c. yield a fair quota of pearly treasure, according to the nature of their beds. There are four species of fresh-water mussels in the British islands, of which the usual fluviatile sort (Alasmodon margaritifera) does not object to a habitat among rocks and stones; whereas its cousin (Anodon cyaneus), of a larger size and more homely exterior, prefers the muddy ooze of lake-bottoms, or the sandy reaches of our wider and more placid streams. Loch Tay is also very prolific in mussels; and the late Marquis of Breadalbane had a fine collection of pearls gathered from its waters. The partial laying dry of Loch Vennacher, in constructing a sluice for the Glasgow water-works, revealed a great quantity of mussels, wherein many fine pearls were found by the laborers. This incident suggested to Mr. Unger the idea of systematically dredging this and other lochs, and of examining their beds by means of diving apparatus: but the muddy nature of their bottoms proved a great bar to success: and on the whole, the experiment did not reward his explorations. We regret, moreover, to hear that, as was the case with the marine pearl-fisheries of Ceylon for many years, several of the Scottish streams are nearly exhausted of their mussels by over-fishing; and unless the reformed Parliament furnishes us with a "Pearl-mussel Act," there is some danger of these mollusks becoming extinct in a few years.

The origin of pearls was a subject of much speculation in ancient times, and still provokes considerable discussion and difference of opinion among zoologists. The ancients fabled that they were originally drops of rain or dew, which, falling into the half-opened shells, were converted by the animal into pearls by some occult process of nature, "plastic force," or what not. This theory is gravely advanced by Pliny, who, in his chapter on pearl-oysters, avers further that pink pearls are produced only upon sunny days, while the dull-hued specimens are due to a cloudy sky, &c. Dioscorides, who ought to have known better, seems to incline to the same opinion, faute de mieux. Moore poetically alludes to the theory in the well-known lines:—

"And precious the tear as the rain from the sky, Which turns into pearls as it falls in the sea."

In connection with Pliny's statement, that the deep-sea pearl-oysters are accompanied by sea-dogs, who act as their faithful guards, Procopius (De Bello Pers. b. i. c. 14) tells a whimsical story. He avers that the sea-dogs [q. dog-fish?] are great admirers of the pearl-fish, and follow them out to sea; that when the sea-dogs are pressed by hunger, they go in quest of prey, and then return to the vicinity of the oysters and gaze upon them. Now a certain fisherman had noticed these platonic loves of pearl-oyster and sea-dog, and, watching his opportunity when the mollusk was deprived of its faithful sentry, who was absent for a while in search of food, pounced upon the defenceless oyster, and made for the shore with his prize. But the sea-dog, having taken a hasty meal, hurried back on the fins of love to the vicinity of his beloved, arriving just in time to catch a glimpse of the retreating robber. Before the latter could reach the shore he was overtaken by the sea-dog, and a fierce struggle ensued for the pearl-fish. Finding himself getting the worst of it, the fisherman made a last effort, and threw the pearl-fish high and dry on the strand, whereupon he was at once "torn in pieces" (see Procopius) by its infuriated protector. Unluckily we are not informed whence Procopius derived this extraordinary legend, which, as a traveller's tale, combining the poetic with the popular-scientific element, throws the fictions of Herodotus and Strabo completely into the shade.

But to return to the formation of pearls. Modern naturalists, after much patient investigation, generally ascribe their origin to an irritation produced by the intrusion of some foreign body, such as a grain of sand or grit into the shell or body of the mollusk; this particle becoming, in due time, by a pathological process, covered over with a calcareous secretion deposited thereon in successive layers or lamellations.

The late Professor Quekett subjected a sea-pearl to microscopic examination, and found the nucleus to be a minute portion of steel, probably from its position part of the blade of an oyster-knife, which, having chipped off in a vain attempt to open the oyster, had been coated over with pearly matter by the mollusk. The exact chemical composition of this secretion, termed nacre by zoologists, has never been satisfactorily ascertained, but its calcareous origin would account for Cleopatra's pearl being so easily soluble in vinegar. The material is deposited in irregular layers, overlapping each other in such a manner that the edges of the successive nacreous coats present when highly magnified sharply serrated outlines; and it is not improbable that to this irregularity of deposition pearls are indebted for their peculiar sheeny lustre. They are usually found between the mantle or shell-secreting membrane and the shell itself; but they also not unfrequently occur loose in the viscera or muscles of the animal. Those of a perfectly spherical form are seldom met with, except loose in the interior of the mollusk; and those which adhere to the shell, being irregular in shape and less uniform in color, are probably prominences or protuberances of the shell covered over with nacreous matter, rather than true pearls. Other zoologists have, indeed, held (with Tertullian of old, who calls them "maladies of shell-fish, or warts") that they originate in a diseased condition of the fish, which may not in all cases be aware of the presence of the foreign body within its frame. The latter theory is somewhat at variance with the speculations of a recent writer, who stands up stoutly for the intelligence and æsthetic development of the oyster, which, as he declares, is possessed of a heart, and is, perchance, not insensible to the tender passion!

As to the color of pearls, there has always existed great diversity of opinion. Sir Robert Reading, in his letter to the Royal Society, apparently attributes their hue to the central node or nucleus, affirming that pearls, if once of a dark tint, will never clear. But his theory has been completely upset by recent investigations, specimens having been found both in Scotland and Ireland, white without, but perfectly dark within; and pearls discolored by age have been sometimes restored by skillfully removing the outer layer of nacre altogether. Linnæus satisfactorily proved, by a series of experiments on the fresh-water mussel of Sweden, that irritation, resulting, as we have said before, in a pathological process of nature, is the primary origin of the pearl being formed. He suggested a plan to the Swedish government of boring holes through the shell, and introducing a wire having minute grains of sand fixed thereon between the shell and the fish. His plan succeeded so far as to reward him with pearls to the value of £450, but, proving unremunerative as a commercial venture on any large scale, it was finally abandoned. The industrious Chinese have long been in the habit of breeding pearl-mussels in tanks, and, following the same theory as that propounded by Linnæus, of introducing wires within the shell to which small shot or spherical pieces of shell are affixed. They do not, however, bore the shell of the mussel, but, gently forcing open the valves, introduce the wire through the opening into the interior. At the end of a year, the particles so introduced are found covered over with a perfect coat of nacreous matter, and if left untouched for a year or two more, the objects so coated over can hardly be distinguished from genuine pearls. Sometimes small clay figures are inserted, which in process of time become similarly overlaid with nacre. We might suggest to zoologists the possibility of repeating these experiments with some of the Scottish pearl-mussels, which are identical with the Lapland species of Linnæus, and which could easily be kept in enclosed places traversed by running water.

But after the nearly universal belief that the nucleus of pearls is generally a particle of sand or grit accidentally lodged within the shell, the patient and straightforward researches of an able practical naturalist, Mr. Robert Garner, of Stoke-upon-Trent, have now almost conclusively set at rest the question of their origin and formation. Finding that the shore mussels near the estuary of the Conway were collected by the inhabitants of the district not only for food and bait, but also for the sake of an opaque pearl which they occasionally contained, he submitted some pearl-bearing specimens of these mussels, as well as of the true fresh-water species (Alasmodon or Unio margaritifera) from Llanwrwt and Bettws-y-coed, higher up the river, to a careful dissection and microscopic examination. We give the result in his own words, extracted from his very agreeable "Holiday of a Naturalist."

"They (i. e. the pearls) are due to the irritation caused by the presence, in the mantle or shell-secreting envelope of the animal, of a minute parasite, a Distomus. Sometimes a little dark shelly matter, like the interior of the shell, is first deposited, but with the distomus within. Sometimes the parasite may be obtained with pearly plates adhering to it, or seen within a thin covering of pearly matter, or extracted entire from the pearly case. Occasionally, however, a pearl may be less than the parasite, and sometimes pearly prominences are to be seen within the valves, especially towards the posterior extremities; these may be due to other less common causes of irritation, but especially to a parasitical mite (Atax)."

We do not remember to have seen this apparently satisfactory solution of the formation of pearls mentioned with the prominence it deserves; and it should suggest to naturalists the expediency of subjecting pearls from other localities in Britain as well as these found in the oriental pearl-oyster (Avicula margaritifera) to more careful dissection and microscopic examination. This solution would explain the frequent occurrence of pearls in the viscera or muscles of the animal, where minute parasites or entozoa would be more likely than chance bits of sand or grit to effect a permanent lodgment. Mr. Garner does not mention whether the specimens he examined were generally spherical, or whether they partook of the irregular shape which so frequently characterizes the pearls attached to the shell itself.

It will be a curious instance of the revolving cycle of fashion, should our British pearls again rise so far in estimation as to cause the marine treasures of Bahrein, Manasar, and Condatchy to be slighted in comparison, and should Occident instead of Orient pearls be quoted as typical of unsullied beauty and purity. Be this as it may, to all the pearl-fishers of Doon, Tay, and sister streams, we cordially address the kelpie's words which so perturbed the sacristan of Melrose as he rode the water:—

"Good luck to your fishing!"

PACKING UP.

WE once knew a somewhat eccentric fellow, eccentric however on this point alone, who piqued himself on starting for his summer tour simply "as he stood." With a hat and an umbrella he would have cheerfully started for the Caucasus or Nova Zembla, if his whim took him there; he certainly did start with this somewhat meagre outfit for Moscow and the Calabrias. To use his own phrase, he "packed as he went along." A hand-bag was snatched at Dieppe, Paris yielded a razor and a tooth-brush, the necessities of civilized repose got hitched on at Strasburg, a comfortable wide-awake marked his stay at Dresden, his railway rug bore the stamp of Viennese extraction. He would fling down his burden when he reached home again, and declare he needed no Murray. Every article of his accumulated belongings had its separate history, its memories and associations. As he unpacked his carpet-bag he unpacked his diary. The carpet-bag itself was one of the most notable events of his tour. Its desirableness had loomed on him as he parted from the Italian lakes. Its necessity forced itself on him at Rome. "The idea struck me as I stood on the Capitol," he would say, "that I must have a carpet-bag. At Naples, with the great blue circle of the bay before me, I saw it, I had it." The very incongruity of the collection, as it strewn the floor, framed itself into a sort of mosaic of his travels. There was a German heaviness about his overcoat, a Swiss force about his stick, an Italian grace in the loose splendors of his necktie, a Parisian precision in his gloves. "I am," he would comment reflectively, "all I have seen and heard."

A certain cosmopolitan richness and variety was about the man when spring brought him home again. Like some olden conqueror, he brought back the spoils of every nation he had visited. "I have touched nothing," he would muse reflectively, "which has not served to adorn me." There was a new life, he would add, in coming thus naked into the world of travel. As a rule a man knows nothing of the real nature of the social forces which clothe and drape and dress him. He grows up in a circle of sartorial traditions, amidst a domestic ritual that prescribes the nature of his boots, amid mystic numbers that dictate the extent of his collarly and shirtly resources. The whistle of his train used to free this man from this oppressive despotism of routine. He started on a voyage, above all, of self-discovery. Every step brought him nearer to the decision of the great question over which judges shake their heads confounded, — what is an essential part of a man's outfit? He came back defiant of a host of "unnecessaries," but with a grave and profound reverence for whatever time and trial had declared to be indispensable. And even above this scientific object there was in its highest intensity the pleasure of purchase. The world was turned for him into a Burlington Arcade, where his very conscience encouraged him to buy at each shop. It was in vain that one urged that all travellers bought, and spread before him the gems, the photographs, the knickknackeries that had so swollen the bill of one's tour. There was little pleasure, he would reply, in purchases such as these, made avowedly as mementos, mere side-lights of travel; the true joy of purchase lay in the sense of necessity, and when in bowing to the yoke of necessity, one drank all the joy of gaining an association. Moreover, no little fragmentary dips in knickknackery shops could rival the completeness, the continuity of his acquisitions, — the delight of bargaining rolling in, wave after wave, on this man's life.

It is not given to every man, of course, to ascend into such a seventh heaven of liberty as the heaven of our eccentric friend, and there were undoubtedly some of his hearers, — especially those over forty, to whom many of his reflections seemed somewhat forced and unreal. But there were none who did not own that he had at any rate disposed satisfactorily of the purgatory through which common mortals pass into the paradise of a holiday ramble. He had no packing-up to do. It is only by a little quiet thought that we can realize what such a freedom means. No man in his sober senses ever deliberately contemplated packing-up, and then, having contemplated, set about it. We drift into it, we are lured into it, we are forced and driven into it. It is not till we have made our engagements, till we have written to distant hotels, till we have bought our Murray, till we have promised our wife, that the necessity of it dawns on us. We say the necessity of packing, because its æsthetic and contemplative side has long been familiar to us. We have elaborately discussed the question of costume with Jones at the Club. We have dawdled with him over the shelves of the well-known "Alpine Emporium." Jones has warned us sternly against the peril of taking too much. Then he has warned us as sternly against the folly of taking too little. We strive to remember the precise number of superfluous ounces that will inflict on us the cost of another mule. We plunge deeper and deeper into an abyss of doubt. "Take arnica with you, whatever you do," our friend counsels; and then he adds in a solemn whisper, "and don't forget a needle and thread." We know it is not twice in our lives we cut our fingers, we know we could not sew a button on if we had a wilderness of needles and thread. Experienced travellers are indignant at our indecision, but there is a certain pleasure in it after all. So long as you are doubtful what to buy, you are master of the shop; the moment you have settled, all interest in your proceedings ceases. There is an infinitesimal amount of self-importance even in being an object of attention on the part of a shopboy.

As yet, indeed, packing has not really dawned on us. We are still dabbling our feet at the brink. The plunge comes when the question faces us "what do you really want?" All dreams of that portable bath that does for a mattress at night and a port-manteau in the morning die away. We dawdle no more over camp-stools that can be converted into Alpenstocks at the shortest notice. We summarily cut down the list of "necessaries" that our obsequious provider presents. We ask him, with impatient irony, whether he thinks a camp-train is to follow us. But it is long before we fairly face the voice that asks us what we shall "really want." We stop our ears, we fly, we dally with the call as long as possible. But possibility has its limits, and the time comes when we must "settle." We stand amidst the ruins of our wardrobe. A chaos of coats and boots is at our feet. The man who hesitates under such circumstances is lost. But the man of decision is hardly better off. The valise, the portmanteau, smiles serenely on the accumulated mountain of absolute indispensables. It mocks the pile with an epic, "All hope abandon, ye, of entering here." It is in vain that wild dreams of "closer packing," of better arrangement, lead us to turn everything out of it and to begin again. The heap of reliquies is only a little bigger than it was before, while the portmanteau, with a Mephistophelean enjoyment of our agonies, refuses to shut. We sit on it, we jump on it, we stand in the full grandeur of thirteen-stone-six on it, but in vain. The best course seems to be to let it sulk a little, and to leave it until the morning. The morning comes, and it still yawns on our agonies. It is master of the situation, and it knows it. The train starts in half an hour. There is nothing but to fling out a boot or two, and to smile in triumph on the partner of our joys and sorrows as she looks in to see "if we are ready." But our smile is slightly premature. The partner, too, has her reliquies, — half a dozen "quite little" packages of mysterious nature, not one of which can she possibly do without. Her box is bursting in the hall. Gentlemen's portmanteaus, she knows, will take any number of things. With a shout of despair, as the cab drives to the door, we dive again, into the ruins of our wardrobe and fling out enough to make room for the packages. Another wrestle with the straps, and we are off.

But the miseries of packing are far from ending with our first railway station. Every halt in our career, every hotel along our route, renews them. It is impossible to remember the exquisite arrangement which enabled us at first starting to get so much into the narrow compass of our bag. To drag out, to shove in, becomes the simple secret of our packing and unpacking. Physical force battling with chaos is the sight which supersedes all the ingenuity and order of home. After a time we learn to revel in the smash, to exult in crumpled collars and a hunt after the wandering slipper. What really haunts us at first is a sense of the tendency of all things to turn odd. Was it that last endeavor to accommodate our spouse that left us none but right-handed gloves? It is bothering to have to face the Alps with but one thick-soled boot whose fellow is still strewing idly the floor of our dressing-room. To these little difficulties, however, we gradually accommodate ourselves. The real difficulty lies elsewhere. No one can be more profoundly impressed with a sense of domestic blessings than we are, but it must be owned that a wife singularly complicates the problem of packing. On our first Alpine tower we listened to the warnings of the wise, and sternly insisted that a single portmanteau should do for both of us. We were young, and there was a certain romance about the idea that won a laughing assent.

The laugh lasted as far as Luzerne, and then in some inexplicable way the portmanteau had become two. Little purchases of things absolutely needful had quietly crowded one out. We have long ceased to hope for such unattainable glory of packing as this. Our aim at present is simply to keep the partner of our joys to a single box. With infinite persuasion we induce her to start fair. Each year the box grows bigger, bulkier, but it is still one. Why does it return two? Why have we a dismal provision that this summer it will return three? It is impossible to detect the moment or the cause of the multiplication. It is generally at some station that the fact is broken to us, when we are too late to remonstrate. Over the girls, indeed, we exert a stronger and a sterner discipline. We pack them together in portmanteaus, we kick bonnet-boxes down stairs, we weight out the amount of their necessary luggage, and threaten to charge extras on their pocket-money. We prohibit all additions along our route. We remind them that cameos and "delicious statuettes" can be bought at home. They are well-bred English daughters, and they yield. But they turn obedience into a running fight. They decline to pass through Paris without dresses. They refuse to visit the waterfall, and sulk at home in the hotel, lest "any one whom we know" should see them in such a dishabille. They make sarcastic comments on the ridiculous shabbiness of English travellers, and then check themselves abruptly with a confession that we are no better than our neighbors. The eldest unmarried one believes to this hour that a certain young Ensign would have made her his bride if in an unlucky moment he had not caught sight of her on a glacier. "Dressed as papa forces us to dress, he might as well have seen one in curl papers." The sigh dies gently away down the line. If the rest remain unmarried, no doubt each in her turn will attribute it to the despotism of papa. On the whole, the question is fatally complicated by the moral and social considerations that family life involves. There is but one course that we can fairly recommend; it is to pack off wife and child to a quiet watering-place, and to start like our friend at the opening with a hat and an umbrella.

CHARLES DICKENS'S USE OF THE BIBLE.

THE present writer had the distinguished honor and pleasure of being introduced to the works of Shakespeare by those of Sir Walter Scott. The introduction was obtained in this way. When the Waverley novels first fell into his hands he was too young fully to appreciate them; but he read with great and absorbing interest the quotations from Shakespeare, the "old plays," and other sources, prefixed as mottoes to the various chapters, or printed on the title-pages. "Scrappy" as such reading necessarily was, yet it impressed the present writer aforesaid so deeply, that when he afterwards came to study Shakespeare himself, he was both surprised and delighted to find how much he really owed to Sir Walter's introduction. To come, in the course of that study, upon some line or passage which he had formerly met with in the Waverley novels, was not only to meet with a dear old friend indeed, but it was also to feel how doubly classic was the ground on which he trod, since the great novelist had been there too, in search of texts for his stories and mottoes for his chapters.

Unlike the author of "Waverley," Charles Dickens employs no quotations, either from Shakespeare or anybody else, as texts or mottoes. The most cursory reader of Mr. Dickens's works may have observed that he is not much given to quoting from or alluding to the writings of others; but the attentive reader must have observed that when he does quote or allude, it is, in the great majority of cases, from or to the sacred Scriptures. Occasionally we come upon a reference to Shakespeare; now and then, though on much rarer occasions, we meet with one from Swift, or Scott, or Byron; but these occur so seldom that it may be said, once for all, that the source from which Mr. Dickens is usually in the habit of making quotations is the Bible only.

It is worth while to dip into these eighteen handsome volumes, clothed in crimson and lettered in gold,* for the purpose of marking off and noting as many such references as will make not only good what we have just affirmed, but also point out a new field where sacred treasure may be found, not buried mystically out of sight, but lying glittering on the ground: worth while, because these references to sacred subjects are all so fresh, so healthy, and — since the publication of a certain “Fly-leaf in a Life” — more than usually interesting. We shall begin with some references to the Bible itself. It is very interesting to find that so many of Mr. Dickens’s characters are represented as being in the habit either of regularly reading and studying the Bible, or of having it read to them by some one else. “I ain’t much of a hand at reading writing-hand,” said Betty Higden, “though I can read my Bible and most print.” Little Nell was in the constant habit of taking the Bible with her to read while in her quiet and lonely retreat in the old church after all her long and weary wanderings were past. In the happy time which Oliver Twist spent with Mrs. Maylie and Rose, he used to read in the evenings, a chapter or two from the Bible, which he had been studying all the week, and in the performance of which duty he felt more proud and pleased than if he had been the clergyman himself. There was Sarah, in the “Sketches by Boz,” who regularly read the Bible to her old mistress; and in the touching sketch of Our Next-door Neighbor in the same book, we find the mother of the sick boy engaged in reading the Bible to him when the visitor called and interrupted her. This incident reminds us of the poor Chancery prisoner in the Fleet, who, when on his death-bed calmly waiting the release which would set him free forever, had the Bible read to him by an old man in a cobbler’s apron. One of David Copperfield’s earliest recollections was of one Sunday evening when his mother read aloud to him and Peggotty the story of Our Saviour raising Lazarus from the dead. So deep an impression did the story make upon the boy, taken in connection with all that had been lately told him about his father’s funeral, that he requested to be carried up to his bedroom, from the windows of which he could see the quiet churchyard with the dead all lying in their graves at rest below the solemn moon. Pip, too, in “Great Expectations,” was not only in the habit of reading the Bible to the convict under sentence of death, but of praying with him as well; and Esther Summerson tells us how she used to come down stairs every evening at nine o’clock to read the Bible to her godmother.

Not a few of the dwellings into which Mr. Dickens conducts us in the course of some of his best-known stories have their walls decorated with prints illustrative of many a familiar scene from sacred history. Thus when Martin Chuzzlewit went away from Pecksniff’s, and was ten good miles on his road to London, he stopped to breakfast in the parlor of a little roadside inn, on the walls of which were two or three highly colored pictures representing the Wise Men at the Manger, and the Prodigal Son returning to his Father. On the walls of Peggotty’s charming boat-cottage, too, there were prints showing the Sacrifice of Isaac, and the Casting of Daniel into the Den of Lions. When Arthur Clennam came home after his long absence in the East, he found the Plagues of Egypt still hanging, framed and glazed, on the same old place in his mother’s parlor. And who has forgotten the fireplace in old Scrooge’s house, which “was paved all round with quaint Dutch tiles designed to illustrate the Scriptures?”

Here are a few comparisons. When Mr. Lorry, in bestowing a bachelor’s blessing on Miss Pross before “somebody” came to claim her for his own, “held the fair face from him to look at the well-remembered expression on the forehead, and then laid the bright golden hair against his little brown wig with a genuine tenderness and delicacy which, if such things be old-fashioned, were as old as Adam.” As old as Adam here means so long ago as Adam’s time; while Methuselah suggests great age. Thus Miss Jellyby relieved her mind to Miss Summerson on the subject of Mr. Quale in the following energetic language: “If he were to come with his great shining lumpy forehead night after night till he was as old as Methuselah, I would n’t have anything to say to him.” And Mr. Filer, in his eminently practical remarks on the lamentable ignorance of political economy on the part of working people in connection with marriage, observed to Alderman Cute that a man may live to be as old as Methuselah, and may labor all his life for the benefit of such people; but there could be no more hope of persuading them that they had no right or business to be married than he could hope to persuade them that they had no earthly right or business to be born. Miss Betsy Trotwood declared to Mr. Dick that the natural consequence of David Copperfield’s mother having married a murderer — or a man with a name very like it — was to set the boy a-prowling and wandering about the country “like Cain before he was grown up.” Joe Gargery’s journeyman, on going away from his work at night, used to slouch out of the shop like Cain, or the Wandering Jew, as if he had no idea where he was going, and had no intention of ever coming back. Describing the state of “the thriving city of Eden,” when Martin and Mark arrived there, the author of “Martin Chuzzlewit” says “The waters of the Deluge might have left it but a week before, so choked with slime and matted growth was the hideous swamp which bore that name.” The Deluge suggests Noah’s Ark. The following reference to it is from “Little Dorrit,” descriptive of the gradual approach of darkness up among the highest ridges of the Alps: “The ascending night came up the mountains like a rising water. When at last it rose to the walls of the convent of the Great St. Bernard, it was as if that weather-beaten structure were another ark, and floated on the shadowy waves.” Here is something from the Tower of Babel: Looming heavy in the black wet night, the tall chimneys of the Coketown factories rose high into the air, and looked as if they were so many “competing towers of Babel.” When Mortimer Lightwood inquired of Charley Hexam, with reference to the body of the man found in the river, whether or not any means had been employed to restore life, he received this reply: “You would n’t ask, sir, if you knew his state. Pharaoh’s multitude that were drowned in the Red Sea ain’t more beyond restoring to life.” The boy added, further, “that if Lazarus were only half as far gone, that was the greatest of all the miracles.” When the Scotch surgeon was called in professionally to see Mr. Krook’s unfortunate lodger, the Scotch tongue pronounced him to be “just as dead as Phairy.” Job’s poverty is not likely to be forgotten among the comparisons. No. Mr. Mell's mother was as poor as Job. Nor Samson's strength: Dot's mother had so many infallible recipes for the preservation of the baby's health that, had they all been administered, the said baby must have been done for, though strong as an infant Samson. Nor Goliath's importance: John Chivery's chivalrous feeling towards all that belonged to Little Dorrit made him so very respectable, in spite of his small stature, his weak legs, and his genuine poetic temperament, that a Goliath might have sat in his place demanding less consideration at Arthur Clennam's hands. Nor Solomon's wisdom: Trotty Veck was so delighted when the child kissed him that he could n't help saying, "She's as sensible as Solomon." Miss Wade, having said farewell to her fellow-travellers in the public room of the hotel at Marseilles, sought her own apartment. As she passed along the gallery, she heard an angry sound of muttering and sobbing. A door stood open, and, looking into the room, she saw therein Pet's attendant, the maid with the curious name of Tattycoram. Miss Wade asked what was the matter, and received in reply a few short and angry words in a deeply injured, ill-used tone. Then again commenced the sobs and tears and pinching, tearing fingers, making altogether such a scene as if she were being "rent by the demons of old." Let us close these comparisons by quoting another from the same book, "Little Dorrit," descriptive of the evening stillness after a day of terrific glare and heat at Marseilles: "The sun went down in a red, green, golden glory; the stars came out in the heavens, and the fireflies mimicked them in the lower air, as men may feebly imitate the goodness of a better order of beings; the long, dusty roads and the interminable plains were in repose, and so deep a hush was on the sea, that it scarcely whispered of the time when it shall give up its dead."

Looking over the dear familiar pages of "Nicholas Nickleby," our eye lights upon a passage, almost at opening, which refers to God's goodness and mercy. As Nickleby's father lay on his death-bed, he embraced his wife and children, and then "solemnly commended them to One who never deserted the widow or her fatherless children." Towards the close of Esther Summerson's narrative in "Bleak House" we read these touching, tender words regarding Ada's baby: "The little child who was to have done so much was born before the turf was planted on its father's grave. It was a boy; and I, my husband, and my guardian gave him his father's name. The help that my dear counted on did come to her; though it came in the Eternal Wisdom for another purpose. Though to bless and restore his mother, not his father, was the errand of this baby, its power was mighty to do it. When I saw the strength of the weak little hand, and how its touch could heal my darling's heart, and raise up hopes within her, I felt a new sense of the goodness and tenderness of God." After these illustrations of the great lessons of the goodness of God, and that there is mercy in even our hardest trials, we come next upon one which teaches the duty of patience and resignation to God's will. Mrs. Maylie observed to Oliver Twist, with reference to the dangerous illness of Rose, that she had seen and experienced enough to "know that it is not always the youngest and best who are spared to those that love them; but this should give us comfort in our sorrow, for Heaven is just, and such things teach us impressively that there is a brighter world than this, and that the passage to it is speedy. God's will be done!"

After these words the subject of prayer naturally suggests itself. At another, and a very different stage of Oliver Twist's career, we find him on his knees, earnestly beseeching God to spare him from committing such deeds and crimes as he had just been reading of in the book which Fagin had put into his hands. That was an earnest prayer, too, of the poor woman in the sketch by "Boz" of "The Black Veil"; and no reader of "Bleak House" can forget the prayer of poor Jo, the crossing-sweeper. On his death-bed he was visited by Allan Woodcourt, who asked him:—

"Jo! Did you ever know a prayer?"

"Never know'd nothink, sir."

"Not so much as one short prayer?"

"No, sir. Nothink at all. . . ."

"Jo, my poor fellow!"

"I hear you, sir, in the dark, but I'm a-gropin—a-gropin; let me catch hold of your hand."

"Jo, can you say what I say?"

"I'll say anythink you say, sir, for I knows it's good."

"Our Father."

"Our Father! Yes, that's wery good, sir."

"Which art in heaven?"

"Art in heaven; is the light a-comin, sir?"

"It is close at hand. Hallowed be Thy name."

"Hallowed be Thy—"

"The light is come upon the dark benighted way. Dead! . . . and dying thus around us every day." When Pip went to see Abel Magwitch lying under sentence of death, he felt it to be his duty to say and read to him what he knew the convict ought to hear: "Mindful, then, of what we had read together, I thought of the two men who went up into the Temple to pray, and I knew there were no better words that I could say beside his bed than 'O Lord, be merciful to him a sinner!'"

Our Saviour's life and teaching supply so many interesting illustrations to Charles Dickens that our great difficulty, in such a limited space as that to which we are now confined, is to make a good selection. To make a beginning; here is a sketch entitled "A Christmas Tree," from one of his reprinted pieces, which contains this simple and beautiful summary of our Lord's life on earth: "The waits are playing, and they break my childish sleep! What images do I associate with the Christmas music as I see them set forth on the Christmas Tree? Known before all the others, keeping far apart from all the others, they gather round my little bed. An angel speaking to a group of shepherds in a field; some travellers, with eyes uplifted, following a star; a Baby in a manger; a Child in a spacious temple talking with grave men; a solemn figure, with a mild and beautiful face, raising a dead girl by the hand; again, near a city gate, calling back the son of a widow, on his bier, to life; a crowd of people looking through the opened roof of a chamber where He sits, and letting down a sick person on a bed with ropes; the same, in a tempest, walking on the water to a ship; again, on a sea-shore, teaching a great multitude; again, with a child upon His knee, and other children round; again, restoring sight to the blind, speech to the dumb, hearing to the deaf, health to the sick, strength to the lame, knowledge to the ignorant; again, dying upon a cross, watched by armed soldiers, a thick darkness coming on, the earth beginning to shake, and only one voice heard, Forgive them, for they know not what they do."

In such a history, truly, as Mr. Dickens elsewhere says ("Uncommercial Traveller"), "the most beautiful and affecting conceivable by man," there must be many incidents and illustrations of surpassing interest to the novelist. Let us proceed with our selection. One who has written so many Christmas stories, and associated his name so intimately with that welcome season, as Charles Dickens has done, can scarcely fail to allude to many of the scenes in the life of Him who was "its mighty Founder." Opening the "Christmas Carol," we find ourselves in the company of Scrooge and the ghost of Jacob Marley. Listen! "At this time of the rolling year," the spectre said, "I suffer most. Why did I walk through crowds of fellow-beings with my eyes turned down, and never raise them to that blessed Star which led the wise men to a poor abode? Were there no poor homes to which its light would have conducted me?" To the Star in the East there is another very touching reference in "Hard Times," — perhaps one of the most affecting references to the sacred narrative that can be found anywhere within the boards of all Mr. Dickens's books. Stephen Blackpool has just been recovered from the "Old Hell Shaft," and is lying on the ground with his face turned to the sky of night. A throng of people surround the poor, crushed, dying man. Rachael his friend, is stooping and bending over him.

"Look up yonder, Rachael! Look abooove!" Following his eyes, she saw that he was gazing at a star.

"It ha' shined upon me," he said, reverently, "in my pain and trouble down below. It ha' shined into my mind. I ha' look'n at 't and thowt o' thee, Rachael, till the muddle in my mind have cleared awa, abooove a bit, I hope. . . ."

The bearers were preparing to carry him away. While they were arranging how to go, Stephen again spoke to his friend: "Often as I coom to myseln," he said, again referring to the star, "and found it shining on me down there in my trouble, I thowt it were the star as guided to our Saviour's home. I awmst think it be the very star!"

They lifted him up, and he was overjoyed to find that they were about to take him in the direction whither the star seemed to him to lead.

"Rachael, beloved lass! Don't let go my hand; we may walk together t' night, my dear."

"I will hold thy hand, and keep beside thee, Stephen, all the way."

"Bless thee! Will soombody be pleased to coover my face?"

"They carried him very gently along the fields, and down the lanes, and over the wide landscape; Rachael always holding the hand in hers. Very few whispers broke the mournful silence. It was soon a funeral procession. The star had shown him where to find the God of the poor; and through humility and sorrow and forgiveness he had gone to his Redeemer's rest."

What our Saviour said of little children is often affectionately alluded to by Mr. Dickens. Thus while David Copperfield relates how he was treated by the Murdstones, he quietly observes that, though their gloomy theology made out all children to be nothing better than a swarm of little vipers, yet he was greatly comforted by knowing that Jesus had other and very different thoughts about children, when He could take, as He once did, a little child and set him in the midst of the disciples, saying,

"Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." The same incident is mentioned in Tiny Tim's history. Scrooge had asked the spirit to let him "see some tenderness connected with a death," whereupon they entered Bob Cratchit's house, and found the mother and her children all seated round the fire. "The noisy little Cratchits were still as statues in one corner, and sat looking up at Peter, who had a book before him. The mother and her daughters were engaged in sewing. But surely they were very quiet."

"And He took a child, and set him in the midst of them."

"Where had Scrooge heard those words? He had not dreamed them. The boy must have read them only, as he and the spirit crossed the threshold. Why did he not go on?"

The mother laid her work upon the table, and put her hand up to her face.

"The color hurts my eyes," she said.

"The color? Ah, poor Tiny Tim!"

Since we have got amongst the little children, let us have a few more instances of their associations with the sacred story in the writings of Charles Dickens. In "A Tale of Two Cities" we read of Lucie sitting in the still and lonely house "listening to the echoing footsteps of years," — listening to something which whispered of a time when she would perhaps be called away to fill an early grave, and leave her husband and her child behind. "That time passed, and her little Lucie lay on her bosom. Then, among the advancing echoes, there was the tread of her tiny feet and the sound of her prattling words. Let greater echoes resound as they would, the young mother at the cradle-side could always hear those coming. They came, and the shady house was sunny with a child's laugh, and the Divine Friend of children, to whom in her trouble she had confided hers, seemed to take her child in her arms, as He took the child of old, and made it a sacred joy to her. Thus soothed and comforted, Lucie heard in the echoes of years none but friendly sounds."

"Even when there were sounds of sorrow among the rest, they were not harsh nor cruel. Even when golden hair, like her own, lay in a halo on a pillow round the worn face of a little boy, and he said, with a radiant smile, 'Dear papa and mamma, I am very sorry to leave you both, and to leave my pretty sister; but I am called, and I must go—those were not tears all of agony that wetted his young mother's cheek, as the spirit departed from her embrace that had been intrusted to it. Suffer them, and forbid them not. They see my Father's face. O Father—blessed words!"

Esther Summerson and Ada Clare are on a visit to the brickmaker's family. Opportunity has just been given them of saying a few kind words to the brickmaker's wife, who was sitting by the fire with the baby on her knee. Ada's gentle heart is moved by baby's sufferings. As she bends down to touch its little face, it died. "O Esther!" cried Ada, sinking on her knees beside it, "look here! O Esther, my love, the little thing! — the suffering, quiet, pretty little thing! I am so sorry for it. I am so sorry for the mother. I never saw a sight so pitiful as this before. O baby, baby!"

They tried to comfort the mother, and whispered to her what our Saviour said of little children. She answered nothing, and could only reply to their tender, loving sympathy by "weeping—weeping very much."

We have no space for more of these touching incidents, nor for any other, indeed, out of a list of passages which we had marked off with reference to the parables and miracles of our Lord; the divine lessons of loving and forgiving one another; the necessity of being ourselves at peace with God; the change that must come upon us all; the certainty of another and a better life than this; and the great day of judgment to come. But what we have given will be amply sufficient, we trust, to show how much our greatest living novelist is in the habit of going to the sacred narrative for illustrations to many of his most touching incidents, and how reverent and respectful always is the spirit in which every such illustration is employed. To think of Charles Dickens's writings as containing no religious teaching is to do them a great injustice. It is true that many of his readers may possibly have been startled by what he has written with regard to the Christian ministry and missionary work as associated with Stiggins, Chadband, Mrs. Jellyby, and some of the observations of Sam Weller's father. But with reference to these, and such as these, a paragraph in the Preface to one of the earliest of his works — "The Pickwick Papers" — is quite sufficient to reassure his startled readers, and dispel from their minds all idea of religion or religious work being referred to only to be ridiculed. In the Preface referred to Mr. Dickens says: —

"Lest there should be any well-intentioned persons who do not perceive the difference (as some could not when 'Old Mortality' was newly published) between religion and the cant of religion, piety and the pretence of piety, a humble reverence for the great truths of sacred Scripture and an audacious and offensive obtrusion of its letter and not its spirit, in the commonest dissensions and meanest affairs of life, to the extraordinary confusion of ignorant minds, let them understand that it is always the latter, and never the former, which is satirized here. . . . It is never out of season to protest against that coarse familiarity with sacred things which is busy on the lip, and idle in the heart; or against the confounding of Christianity with any class of persons who, in the words of Swift, have just enough religion to make them hate, and not enough to make them love, one another."

These "words of observation on so plain a head," though written as far back as the first publication of "Pickwick," are strictly applicable to all that Mr. Dickens has since written. So that, to think of his writings as containing neither moral nor religious lessons, — in their best and widest sense, free from all sectarian teaching and as high and dry above the distractions of theological dogmatisms as practice is from profession, — simply because they are works of fiction, and not classed under the head of "Religious Publications," would be not only as uncharitable, but as unjust, as it was of St. John, who on one occasion came to our Saviour and reported, in his zeal, that he had seen one casting out devils who did not belong to his company or apostleship. "Forbid him not," said Jesus, "for there is no man which shall do a miracle in My name that can lightly speak evil of Me; for he that is not against us is on our part." Who can tell how many are the legions of evil spirits that have been cast out? — how much real and lasting good effected by those pure and healthy writings which have made the name of Charles Dickens familiar as a Household Word wherever the English language is spoken or translated?

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE programme of the next Paris Italian opera season has just been issued. Three new operas are promised.

THE Musical Standard states that the French normal diapason has been adopted at the important opera-house of Prague.

OFFENBACH celebrates his silver wedding at his estate at Etretat by a fancy dress ball, the characters chiefly selected from his own operas.

"THE Academy" is the very bad title selected by Mr. Murray for his new critical journal. Dr. William Smith of dictionary renown is mentioned as its editor.

At a recent marriage at a Ritualistic Church in the fashionable part of London the service lasted exactly two hours! This included a sermon and the celebration of the Holy Communion.

NOT long since Sir Edward Codrington breakfasted with the Emperor and the Empress at St. Cloud. In the folds of his napkin Sir Edward found the insignia of Grand Officer of the Legion d'Honneur.

THE Athenæum says that Lord Palmerston's Diary recently discovered is not a mere record of facts, but a gallery of pictures and sketches, in all of which are clearly to be seen the style of an accomplished master. It is besides, something more. A scene between the writer and the Duke of Wellington, when Mr. Huskisson's dismissal or his being retained was in dispute, is of the very highest and finest style of serious comedy: graphic, dramatic, and so lifelike that the actors seem bodily before us.

THE readers of the Figaro, one of the most popular and best written of the Paris journals, had last week to contemplate a singular phenomenon. The editor in chief, M. H. de Villemessant, was bold enough to give the place of honor to an article of his own entitled "Une Maison de Fous à vendre." It was a magnificent account of a house with fine grounds of his own which he wanted to sell for $10,000, and the folly to which the title of the article referred was that of successive proprietors who had wasted whole fortunes in making this mansion, its park, its gardens, and its fields a perfect paradise, with every comfort and luxury which ingenuity could devise and money obtain. M. de Villemessant announces that he is on the point of purchasing a residence in the Bois de Boulogne, and that is the sole reason of his wishing to part with a perfect paradise in the country. The Parisians are amused. They take an interest in the private affairs of M. de Villemessant, and they do not see how journalism is degraded by such a system of advertising.

THE English journals are in a very happy frame of mind over the result of the international boat race, and frankly admit that the match was a close one. The Pall Mall Gazette says: "To have beaten such as these, men whose pluck could carry them 3,000 miles to measure oars with an English university, whose patience has in detail surmounted innumerable difficulties and disappointments in boat-building, and whose endurance was almost unparalleled, is for Oxford one of those happy triumphs in which there is peculiar honor to the victor, without the smallest particle of humiliation for the vanquished." The London Times ends its account of the contest with the following sentiment: "The American crew has met, as we were always sure it would meet, with perfectly fair play; and if our crew goes to America, we have no doubt it will receive similar treatment. May all our future international struggles be conducted in the same spirit, and whichever side wins, may the vanquished always have as little reason to feel regret at their defeat!"

A CONTRIBUTOR to the Daily News gives an interesting account of an unsuccessful attempt made by a correspondent of Victor Hugo, while the translation of "Les Travailleurs de la Mer" was being proceeded with, to convince the great man that "Première des quatre" was not a correct rendering of "Firth of Forth," and that the "Firth of Forth" was not the "First of Four Cliffs." The curious blunder was noticed in many quarters when "Les Travailleurs de la Mer" appeared; but it is now known for the first time, that it had been pointed out to M. Hugo before the work appeared, and that the sublime romancist persisted in maintaining that the "Firth of Forth" was what he had declared it to be, and that the first of the four cliffs which mark the frontier between England and Scotland had been blown down by the fury of an equinoctial gale. "The meteorological facts mentioned by me," he replied, "being the same as reported by the Bulletin of the Paris Observatory, if there is an error, or if the denomination is inexact, it is to the Bulletin that that error or inexactitude must be referred. For the rest I do not believe that there is any error (Du reste, je ne crois pas qu'il y ait erreur)."

Mrs. STOWE's paper on the Byrons appears in the September number of Macmillan's Magazine, prefaced by the following editorial note:—

"Many readers of the Diary of the late Mr. Crabb Robinson must have been much struck by a letter from Lady Byron, there printed for the first time (Vol. III. p. 351). The tone of deep affection, and almost divine charity, in which she speaks of her husband, must have come with startling effect on those who knew her only through the representations of 'Don Juan,' and Mr. Moore's 'Life of Lord Byron.'"

"The following paper, from the pen of Mrs. Beecher Stowe, on Lady Byron's life and relations to Lord Byron, is the first complete and authentic statement of the whole circumstances of that disastrous affair which has been given to the world. Painful and appalling as are the details, the time is come when they can no longer be concealed. This paper is, in fact, Lady Byron's own statement of the reasons which forced her to the separation which she so long resisted, and on which, out of regard for her husband and child, she maintained so religious a silence up to the day of her death. Evidence at once so new and so direct cannot but materially alter the whole complexion of this most painful question; and all former judgments, being based on insufficient data, must of necessity be henceforward invalidated or superseded. A perusal of the facts here given for the first time will leave little doubt in the reader's mind both that Lady Byron's separation was the only course open to her, and that the motives for her persistent silence were of the same kind which governed her long life of active and noble beneficence. The intense faithfulness and love to her husband which survived private wrongs of the deepest kind, the continued attacks of Lord Byron himself, and a long course of public vituperation, were only a consistent part of her whole nature and life.

"Towards so pure and lofty a character, compassion would be out of place; but justice may be rendered, even after this lapse of time; and it is peculiarly gratifying to the Editor of Macmillan's Magazine that it should be rendered through these columns."

LUCAS, who succeeded Batty as Lion-Tamer at the Hippodrome, has been slain by his beasts. Armed only with a whip he entered a cage wherein were four lions. Lucas had not been two seconds in the cage before he perceived his danger. He had omitted to take with him his usual weapons. For an instant he lost sight of the lioness, who, no longer perceiving his eyes fixed on hers, seized him by the lower jaw and by the back of his head crunching the occipital bone, and then seizing him by the arm in order to drag him between her paws and devour him at her leisure. Her sire, however, desirous of sharing the spoil, attempted to force him from beneath her paws, and caught him by the thigh, inflicting a fearful wound, and literally gnawing through the main artery. It was at this awful moment that José Mendez, an attached servant of Lucas, dashed into the cage with a revolver with the butt end of which he dealt a heavy blow at the lioness's head, which compelled her to give up her prey. Mendez, with marvellous strength, made a spring at the lion and threw him into the back of the cage; then, levelling the weapon at the animals with his right arm, pushed the bleeding man out of their reach by his feet. It was only then that the other attendants came to the rescue, and with an iron bar wrenched open the bars of the cage, enabling Mendez to effect his escape backwards, dragging Lucas with him, but never lowering his right arm, with which he grasped the revolver. The heroic conduct of Mendez deserves record, and may well rank with deeds of daring which have won stars and crosses on fields of battle. But his devotion was unavailing. His master had received his death-wound.

A VIENNA paper gives an amusing account of the refreshments which the singers at the opera there are in the habit of taking between the acts to keep their voices in good order. Each singer, it appears, has his or her own peculiar specific. The Swedish tenor Labatt takes "two salted cucumbers" for a dose, and declares that this vegetable is the best thing in the world for strengthening the voice and giving it "the true metallic ring." The other singers, however, do not seem to be of this opinion. Sontheim takes a pinch of snuff and drinks cold lemonade; Wachtel eats the yolk of an egg beaten up with sugar; Steger, "the most corpulent of tenors," drinks "the brown juice of the gambrinus"; Walter, cold black coffee; Niemann, champagne; and Tichatchek, mulled claret. Ferenczy, the tenor, smokes one or two cigars, which his colleagues regard as so much poison. Mdlle. Braun-Brini takes after the first act a glass of beer, after the third and fourth a cup of café au lait, and before the great duet in the fourth act of the "Huguenots" always a bottle of Moët Crémant Rosé. Nachbar munches bonbons during the performance: Rübsam, the barytone, drinks mead; Mitterwurzer and Kindermann suck dried plums; Robinson, another barytone, drinks soda-water; Formes takes porter, and Arabanek Gumpoldskirchner wine! The celebrated barytone Beck, on the other hand, takes nothing at all, and refuses to speak. Draxler smokes Turkish tobacco and drinks a glass of beer. Another singer, Dr. Schmid, regulates his diet according to the state of his voice at the time. Sometimes he drinks coffee, sometimes tea, and a quarter of an hour afterwards lemonade, mead, or champagne, taking snuff between whiles, and eating apples, plums, and dry bread, a very liberal arrangement.

HEINRICH HEINE.

THIRTEEN years have now elapsed since the death of Heinrich Heine, and it is scarcely yet decided what position he is entitled to occupy in the history of European literature. Those who assign him the rank of a great humorist are unwilling to number him amongst the first poets of Germany, in close proximity to the cycle of Lessing, Herder, Schiller, and Goethe; while those who claim for him the throne vacated by Goethe are apt to overlook the humoristic and political side of his character. Outside Germany he is best known as a critic, a satirist, and a humorous writer. The French admired him as an Apollo, who flayed Marsyas with a grace and dexterity that rendered the operation, if not painless to the sufferer, at least pleasant to the spectator. The Germans, who were best able to appreciate the music and beauty of his singing, are only too willing to forget the bitter things he said of them beyond the Rhine. This is easily intelligible. As a poet he was German; as a humorist he was European. The many visitors who crowded to the sick-chamber at Paris, where he lay shrunk to a skeleton, with a beard that grew long as a woman's hair over the coverlet, carried away stories of satire that conquered pain, and wit whose brightness approaching death could not tarnish. But the songs of the poet spread from the woods and valleys of Germany, where they were first sung, and became intelligible only through translation to those who stood around his bed. An unfortunate misunderstanding between Heine's family and his publisher has hitherto prevented the excellent editor of his works from obtaining access to all the materials for a full biography. In the mean while his brother has published a few reminiscences of Heinrich's youth.* Such a work could not fail to have a certain interest; in most respects it is a jejune and meagre chronicle of events scarcely worth recording. Until the fuller and promised work appears, the best magazine for the biographer will be the works and letters of Heine published by Messrs. Hoffmann and Campe, and edited by Dr. Strodtmann.†

Heine was born at Düsseldorf on the Rhine, December 13th, 1799. He himself dated his birth from the 1st of January, 1800, in order that, as he laughingly said, he might be spoken of as one of the first men of the century. His father, Sigismund Heine, belonged, as did his ancestors, to the mercantile class. He was a Jew, but, unlike his brother, Solomon Heine, the Hamburg banker, never attained to considerable wealth. He married Elizabeth von Geldern, the daughter of a medical man of some local celebrity. We do not know much of the mother of Heinrich Heine, but we do know that she always retained the affection of her son, for in some of his latest letters to his publisher he is careful that she should be provided with early copies of his works, and that parts, which he believed could not be pleasing to her, should be removed from the copies which she received.

Heinrich had two brothers and a sister, who was still alive. It is to this sister that the well-known poem, "Mein Kind, wir waren Kinder," is addressed. Heinrich was entered as pupil in the Düsseldorf Gymnasium. He has given an account of the advantages he derived from that institution:—

"Everything was to be learnt by rote: Greek, History, Geography, Chronology. And yet many benefits have come to me from such study. For if I had not known the Roman kings in order it would have been afterwards perfectly indifferent to me whether Niebuhr had proved or had not proved that they never existed at all. And if I had not known those dates how could I afterwards have found my way about big Berlin, where one house is as like another as two rain-drops, and where you cannot find your friends unless you keep the number of their houses in your head? I used to allot my friends some historical event, whose date coincided with the numbers of their houses, so that I could easily know the number by thinking of the date; and thus it happened that I never saw a friend without his suggesting some historical event. For instance, if I met my tailor, I immediately thought of the battle of Marathon; when I saw the well-dressed banker, Gumpel, the destruction of Jerusalem occurred to me. When I met a certain insolvent Portuguese friend, I thought of the flight of Mahomet; when I saw the University chancellor, a man whose severe integrity is well known, I remembered the death of Haman.

"But as regards Latin, you have no idea how involved it is. The Romans would never have found time to conquer the world if they had been first obliged to learn Latin. This happy people knew in their cradles what nouns have an accusative in im. I, on the contrary, must learn them by rote in the sweat of my brow. Still, it is a grand thing that I know them. For instance, if on the 20th July, 1825, when I had to dispute publicly in the hall at Göttingen, I had said sinapem instead of sinapim, the undergraduates present might have detected it, and that would have been for me an eternal disgrace. Vis, buris, silis, tussis, cucumis, amussis, cinnabis, sinapis, these words, which have made such a noise in the world, have done so by pretending to belong to a certain class, and yet remaining exceptions. For this reason I esteem them highly; and that I always have them at command, should any unforeseen need come upon me to use them, gives me in many a gloomy hour of life much inward comfort and delight."

From this Gymnasium, Heine proceeded to study law at Bonn, which he seems soon to have left, and at Göttingen. Here he began his tragedies, "Almansor" and "Ratcliffe"; but having violated the university duelling-regulations, he was compelled to leave by a consilium abeundi.

He had already won something of the reputation of a poet. He had published, in 1821, a small volume of poems, and these were so successful that Rassmann included him among the celebrities whom he noticed in his year-book for 1822. The work, small as it was, attracted the attention of the Baron de la Motte Fouqué, who wrote a poem and an affectionate letter to Heine.

In 1822 he continued his studies at Berlin. He attended the lectures of Hegel, whose influence upon him was never obliterated; and he further had the good fortune to be admitted to the best literary circles. The friendships formed at this time were the warmest that he made, and doubtless gave the direction to his after career. These naturally began with the mercantile class, to whom his uncle Solomon could give him an introduction, and especially with a friend of the family, Moses Moser. He was one of those men, not uncommon in Germany, who, though engaged in active business, are enthusiastic students. He was a warm admirer of Hegel, and his friendship with Heine lasted until his own death in 1838.

"I do not like you," said Heine, in a letter to him at this time, "because you are a magazine of virtue, and know Spanish, and Syriac and Hegelian, English, Arabic, and Hindostani, and have lent me your overcoat and money, and have worried yourself about me and so forth. I like you, perhaps, only for a silly trick of manner I have noticed in you, and a few absurd expressions that escape you, and stick in my memory, and haunt me pleasantly when I am in a good temper, or have money, and am sentimental.

"I had a Pole for a friend, for whom I would have drunk myself to death; or rather for whom I would have stood, and would still stand to be shot, and the fellow was not worth a single penny, and was dirty, and had the most abominable principles,—but he had a guttural sound with which he could say the word, 'What!' in so astounding a manner that at this very moment I can't think of it without weeping and laughing."

It was perhaps to Moser that Heine owed his introduction to Varnhagen von Ense and his wife,— "the mother of young Germany" as she was called. In her drawing-room Heine, whom she had named "the untutored darling of the graces," met the best intellectual society of the capital. All sciences and arts were represented at her reunions. Hegel, the two Humboldts, Rauch, Schleiermacher, Hitzig, and Chamisso met each other there, and contact with such men must have left a certain mark upon the quick and sensitive nature of Heine.

But while admission to this society developed the Hellenistic side of his character, the Hebraism in him was deepened by his close and constant familiarity with another circle which included his intimate friends. Most of the members of this society were Jews, and if their names are not so well known as those that clustered around Hegel and Von Ense, they had certainly no less influence upon the young poet. They met every Thursday evening in the house of Philip Veit, and it was to this society that some of Heine's early pieces, such as the "North Sea Poems," were first submitted. Among them were, Moser; Professor Gans, the Jurist, author of a work on the "Development of Hereditary Right"; Lessmann Lehrman, better known under the name of Anselmi, a critic and lifelong friend of Heine; Dr. Zung, the Orientalist; and Mendelssohn, the father of Felix the musician, who was then a boy "with large, dreamy, poetical eyes."

The two years Heine spent at Berlin seem to have been his happiest. Reckless, joyous, keen in the pursuit of pleasure, he yet found time to write letters which reflect the careless happiness of his nature to the Rhenish journals reviews of Rossmann's, Rousseau's, Smets's, Beer's, and Henzel's works, and to bring out his own tragedies. But as yet he was untouched by the terrible nervous disease, to the inheritance of which he so soon succeeded.

After leaving Berlin he resided for some time with his family at Lüneburg and Hamburg. Owing to the illness of his father they seem to have been in a measure dependent upon the generosity of the rich Solomon Heine; and the proud nature of Heinrich who hated the bounty that his position compelled him to take, embittered the relationship between himself and his uncle's family. His letters to Moser show how eagerly he looked forward to a position of independence, which, alas! he never entirely reached. It was, perhaps, the feeling of unwilling dependence that gave rise to much of the cynicism which marked and marred his best work. On leaving the society of Moser, too, a strong reaction in his mind set in against the Jews, and he was already beginning to reap the consequences of his free and out-spoken criticisms. "How I despise this pack of men," he writes, "the uncircumcised with the circumcised!" Perhaps, at this time he despised the circumcised most. While at Berlin he had joined the Jewish Union for Culture and Science, and had promised to write for a magazine which had been planned. But the early numbers offended his delicate literary taste. "I have read it," he wrote to the editor, Dr. Zung, "but I must candidly confess that the greatest part, yes, three parts, of the third number is unpleasant on account of the negligent style. I don't want Goethe's style, but an intelligible one. I have studied all forms of German,—Saxon German, Swabian German, and Franconian German,—but our Magazine German gives me more difficulty than any. Impress, I implore you, upon your colleagues in the magazine the importance of culture in style, without which the other culture cannot be advanced."

This advice may not have been without effect. The fourth number never appeared.

An arrangement with his uncle was shortly made, by which he was enabled to proceed again to Göttingen to read finally for his degree. It was also deemed advisable for his subsequent employment under the Prussian Government that he should be baptized. In this matter he was opposed to the wishes of his family. Not that his objections were upon religious grounds. "You can easily infer," he says, "that baptism has no meaning for me, and that even as a symbol I esteem it of little importance, and that under the circumstances and in the manner in which it would be performed in my case, it would have for others but little significance. Me, indeed, it might influence to devote myself still more to battle for the rights of my unhappy race, but I think it beneath my dignity, and a blot upon my honor, that I should be baptized in order to gain a civil appointment in Prussia."

He yielded, however, to the solicitations of his family, and was baptized before setting out for Göttingen. His uncle allowed him a year for study and during this period he worked hard, — so hard that the nervous headaches to which he was now subject seriously affected his health. Meanwhile his uncle appears to have pursued an illiberal policy towards him. Perhaps we can hardly judge the circumstances fairly. Ordinarily Solomon Heine was a man of strict justice, occasionally of great generosity, and several charitable institutions at Hamburg still testify at once to his commercial success and his munificence. But Heine always complained bitterly that his cousins poisoned the mind of his uncle towards him. This is quite possible; but the pride and impetuosity of the poet may have tended more to breed misunderstandings between them than Heine himself would have admitted. For long periods of time he did not write to his uncle lest he should be supposed by the family at Hamburg to be attacking him with captationes benevolentiae. But his health failed him so much that he was compelled to ask for another half-year to complete his studies, which he had been obliged to suspend for some time during the first year. In this interval of rest he undertook a walking tour over the Harz district. It is this journey which he describes in the now celebrated "Harzreise." Upon his return he wrote to Moser about it thus:—

"It did me a great deal of good, and I feel myself much stronger through the journey. I went on foot, and mostly alone, wandered over the whole Harz, passed by fair hills and valleys, and breathed fresh air once more. I saw much that was beautiful and lovely, and if jurisprudence had not followed me spectre-like, I should have found the world very beautiful. I could tell you much about this Harz journey, but I have already begun to write it down, and shall have it quite ready this winter. There will also appear verses in it, which will please you — fair and noble feelings, and such-like sentimental rubbish. What can one do! Of a truth the opposition to effete conventionalism is a thankless business."

But the "Harzreise," originally intended for a magazine, and written for pecuniary reasons, did not appear until after Heine had taken his degree, in July, 1825. Later some of his literary opponents averred that he had purchased his diploma, and he used to say that he could bear any attack except that upon his academical honors. It is curious to read the name of that "most high and puissant monarch George IV., King of Great Britain and Hanover," upon Heine's diploma.

Of Hugo, Protector of the University, Heine spoke warmly, and the recognition of his talent, which he obtained from him, was of a nature to fill the poet with gratitude. For some time after this he lived at Hamburg. As might have been expected from the nature of the man, he was now bitter against the Christians. "I assure you," he says to Moser, "had the laws allowed me to steal silver spoons, I would never have been baptized."

In 1826 appeared the "Buch le Grand," and the second volume of the "Reisebilder," and in the following year Heine visited England. Much has been said of his dislike to this country, — a dislike which culminated with his personal experience of us. He disliked the people, he disliked their mode of life, he disliked most of all the climate, "nothing but fog, coal-smoke, porter, and Canning."

It is perhaps well we should learn what a man like Heine thought of our country forty-two years ago, especially as we may hope that our faults are not the same now as they were then. It is, at least, not true of us now that our most frequented amusements are boxing, cock-fighting, and public executions, though, alas! we still bring our "simple vegetables to table, boiled in water, exactly as God made them." But it was especially the hard mechanical nature of the English mind that Heine could not tolerate; our lack of mental flexibility seemed to him a melancholy born of unwholesome air and unjustifiable pride. Not only the iron, but the cold, unvarying regularity of our machinery, had entered into our souls and chilled and imprisoned all intellectual life. We sometimes ask with no little self-satisfaction, What would be the feelings of a Greek, could he be transported from ancient Athens to one of our commercial centres? Perhaps we may have a sufficiently correct answer in the words of Heine:—

"The perfection of the machinery which is everywhere employed, and which has superseded so much of human effort, seemed to me something wrong; this artificial motion of wheels, bars, cylinders, the myriad little hooks, pegs, and teeth which circle in almost passionate revolution, filled me with horror. The accuracy, correctness, rigor, and punctuality in the life of the English troubled me in an equal degree. For as in England the machines seem human, so too the men appear machines. Wood, and iron, and brass seem there to have arrogated to themselves the intellect, and to have gone mad through excess of it whilst the demented man, like a hollow spectre, performs mechanically his customary business, and at the fixed minute devours beefsteaks, speaks in Parliament, brushes his nails, mounts the stage-coach, or hangs himself."

Again:—

"It is when we meet them in foreign countries," he says of the English, "that their defects are so unpleasantly prominent. They are the divinities of dulness, who hurry at full speed through all lands in brightly lacquered chariots, and leave behind them everywhere a gray dust-cloud of gloom. To this may be added their curiosity without interest, their elaborate awkwardness, their insolent stiffness, their narrow selfishness, and their dreary delight in all melancholy circumstances."

Heine's journey to England was under unfavorable circumstances. At that time, at least, he could not speak English, and, though here, he viewed things from the outside. His opinion of English society was in some measure derived from his unfavorable notions of the young Hanoverian nobles whom he met at Göttingen and Nordeney. These outdid the English aristocracy in their exclusiveness and pride of pedigree, and we may reasonably hope that it was some mistaken memory that prompted him to tell the verger of Westminster Abbey, as he handed him his fee, that he would willingly have given him more if the collection had been complete.

At the close of this year appeared the first edition of the "Buch der Lieder." All the poems had appeared before; some, to which reference has already been made, when he was very young. He did not anticipate a long life for the book. "It will sail away," he said, "like a harmless merchant-ship under the protection of the second volume of the 'Reisebilder' quietly into the sea of oblivion." But the war-spirit was on him, and he was now ready to do battle with the whole world. "The third volume shall be a man-of-war, far more fearfully equipped; the cannons shall be of greater calibre, and I have discovered quite a new powder for them. Neither shall it carry so much ballast as the second volume."

To fit out this vessel with its cannon and ammunition, Heine travelled through Italy, where he spent a great part of the following year. The volume proved to be all that he had promised, and exhibited the characteristics of its author in a remarkable degree. He had now taken up the line of opposition to all restraint. The new wine was beginning to crack the old bottles. Heine declared his mission to be the liberation of humanity. He meant to fight for uncompromising freedom in religion and politics. He resigned the poet's laurels for the warrior's sword, which he prayed might be laid upon his coffin. That sword he wielded fearlessly, indeed, recklessly, in this volume. And yet the movement of later and present thought has demonstrated how much farther than his contemporaries he saw. The following passage shows, too, how tenderly, and yet how boldly, he could speak upon religious subjects:—

"Only so long as religions have to compete with one another, and are far more persecuted than persecuting, are they noble and honorable; for then alone are inspiration, sacrifice, martyrs, and palms possible. How beautiful, how serenely fair, how unutterably sweet was the Christianity of the early centuries, whilst it still resembled its divine Founder in the heroism of suffering! There lingered yet the beautiful story of an undeclared divinity, who wandered in the fair form of youth under the palms of Palestine, who preached love, and revealed the doctrines of freedom and equality, which the reason of the greatest thinkers has since recognized as true. Compare with that religion of Christ the several Christianities that have been established in the several countries as state-religions,—the Roman Catholic Church, or that Catholicism without poetry which we see prevailing in England as High Church,—that decaying skeleton of belief, from which all bloom and life have passed away."

The great blot which disfigures this work is the attack made upon Count von Platen. Nowhere is Heine's style so masterly in invective, so glittering and incisive, as in this unjust and unwarrantable criticism. The Count von Platen is an admirable writer. He was a profound scholar in Greek, Oriental and modern literature, and a true poet. By his studies and tastes he belonged to the Classical School, and his poems take their color, and often their form, from the antique models. Heine at this time chose to consider himself as belonging to the Romantic School, and had, it may be, a right, on this ground, to deem Von Platen his opponent. That he had any other cause is now difficult to discover; but he attacks the poetry, the poverty, the person of his rival, with a virulence which no dissimilarity of tastes, no opposition of artistic creed could palliate. He gave his enemies—and they were many—just reason of complaint; he alienated some of his warmest and oldest friends; he displeased all. This defection of friends, and general rising of foes, rather than any imminent political danger, determined Heine to take up his residence in Paris, amongst the joyous, light-hearted people who contrasted so favorably with the "Philistine faces" of his own land.

From 1831, then, Heine seldom left Paris, except to make short visits to the French watering-places. He began at once a series of political letters to the Augsburg Allgemeine Zeitung, some of which he collected and published with his name in the following year. To these he prefixed a bold preface which could not fail to displease the Prussian Government. The German edition was much mutilated by the censor, and henceforth Heine fought for the liberty of the press in Germany with zeal, and not without success. His letters to his publisher for many years are a history of the long war between himself as the head of the "Young Germany" party on the one hand, and the literary censorship of the authorities on the other. "If I wish to insert," he says, "in the Hamburg journal a notice under the births: my wife 'has been safely delivered of a daughter, beautiful as liberty,' there comes the censor with his red-pencil, and beautiful as liberty is crossed out. How long is this to be possible? I know not."

Of his political letters little need now be said. The significance of a newspaper correspondence written in the heat of events is necessarily transient. In 1833, however, appeared the most important of the prose works he had yet published; it was a critical history of modern German literature, and appeared pretty nearly at the same time in France and Germany. In both countries it attracted immense attention. Nor was it unnoticed in England. The Quarterly Review criticised it, and spoke of the new luminary that had risen upon its horizon as "a star malign in its influence, wavering in its orbit, and unsteady in its light." The first volume contains a history of religion and philosophy from Luther, through Kant, to Hegel. The design of the work is to show how the idea of Christianity and the idea of Protestantism had to free themselves from the encumbrances that grew around them, and must eventually result in Pantheism. The idea itself suffers no loss, cannot be injured:—

"Voltaire could injure only the body of Christianity. All his jests drawn from ecclesiastical history: all his pleasantries directed against dogma and cult; against the Bible, the most sacred book of humanity; against the Virgin Mary, the fairest flower of poesy; the entire lexicon of philosophical arrows which he discharged against the priestcraft of the clergy, touched only the perishable body of Christianity, not its inner reality, nor its deeper spirit,—not its unassailable soul. For Christianity is an idea, and, as such, inviolable and immortal."

It was Luther who first broke open the prison-house of thought, and set Protestantism free. But Protestantism had already begun to act upon Europe. Even Leo X. was a Protestant, in virtue of his sunny artistic nature against the cold, melancholy spiritual doctrines of Catholicism.

"As they protested at Wittenburg in Latin prose, so they protested at Rome in color, in stone, and admirabile. Or do not the powerful marble figures of Michael Angelo, the laughing faces of Giulio Romano's nymphs, and the intoxicated delight in life of Lodo-vico's verses, make a Protestant antithesis to the languishing melancholy of Catholicism? The painters of Italy engaged in far more effective polemics than did the Saxon theologians. The blooming flesh-tints upon the paintings of Titian are all Protestantism. The graces of his Venus are more real theses than those which the German monk fixed on the church door of Wittenburg."

Yet Heine is far from underrating the genius and influence of Luther.

"Renown," he says, "eternal renown to the dear man to whom we owe the preservation of our noblest goods, and by whose merits we live to-day. It becomes us little to complain of the narrowness of his views. The dwarf who stands upon the shoulders of a giant can indeed see farther than the giant himself, especially if he puts on spectacles; but to the higher position are lacking the lofty feeling and the giant heart, which we cannot make our own. It becomes us still less to pass a harsh judgment upon his failings. These failings have benefited us more than the virtues of a thousand others. The subtlety of Erasmus, the gentleness of Melancthon, would never have carried us so far as did often the divine brutality of Brother Martin."

He traces the rough revolutionary character of the Protestant outburst still farther:—

"A battle-song was that defiant hymn with which he and his companions entered Worms. The old cathedral shook with these new echoes, and the ravens were terrified in their dark nests in the towers. That song, the Marseillaise of the Reformation, has kept its power of inspiration to the present day, and it may be we shall use yet again for similar contests the old martial strain:—

'Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott,
Ein' gute Wehr und Waffen.'

Heine maintained that the only faith that allowed the complete emancipation of man was Pantheism, and the remainder of the first volume is occupied in marking the growth of this under the philosophers who have been named. Deity was in everything,—in the unconscious life of plants, and in the dream-like semi-conscious existence of animals. In man alone the Deity rose to self-consciousness. And this Pantheism beautified matter, whilst it elevated spirit. In a complete manhood for instance, as in Luther's, both spirit and matter, spiritualism and sensualism, held their proper positions. Deism, as exemplified in Judaism on the one hand, and on the other in certain forms of Christianity, as Catholicism, wronged matter; whilst materialism, as it became (for example) a crowned incarnation in Frederick the Great, annulled spirit.

"You know this royal materialist," he said in the French edition; "you know that he wrote French verses, played the flute well, that he won the battle of Rossbach, took vast quantities of snuff, and believed only in artillery. Some of you have surely visited Sansouci, and the old pensioner who is in charge of the castle has shown you in the library the French novels which Frederick, when Prince Royal, read in church, and which he got bound in black morocco, that his father might believe he was perusing the Lutheran hymn-book. You know this royal man of the world, whom you call the Solomon of the North. France was the Ophir of this Northern Solomon, and it was hence that he imported his poets and philosophers. For these he cherished a great partiality, like the Solomon of the South, who (as you may read in the Book of Kings, chap. x.) shipped from Ophir, with the assistance of his friend Hiram, whole cargoes of gold, and silver, and ivory, poets and philosophers."

The Pantheism in which Heine finds religion is the Pantheism of Spinoza.

"The mathematical form," he says, "gives Spinoza a harsh expression. But this is like the bitter shell of the almond, the kernel is the sweeter. In reading Spinoza there seizes us a feeling as when we behold nature in vital repose. A forest of towering thoughts, whose green summits are in wavelike motion whilst the immovable trunks are rooted in the everlasting earth. There comes a certain breeze from his writings which is inexplicable. We feel, as it were, the light breath of the future. The spirit of the Hebrew prophets rested perhaps upon the last of their descendants."

But Kant, and Fichte, and Schelling were not true, Heine thinks, to the principles they initiated and advanced, and shrank away from the cause of Pantheism. How complete Heine's own apostasy was we shall see later. Goethe, too, the great Pantheistic poet, never took a decided part with regard to that philosophy. Wrapped in the serene indifference of art, he let the stormy enthusiasm of philosophy blow past him, and looked but coldly upon the ardor of Christianity. By thus remaining apart in the tranquillity of conscious power, he became the greatest artist of his time, and the least valuable partisan.

Yet Heine never doubted that the time would come for a great revolution, and that the stage would be Germany.

"The old stone gods will arise from their forgotten tombs and rub the secular dust from their eyes, and Thor with gigantic hammer shall smite to pieces the cathedral domes of the Goths. The thought precedes the deed, as the lightning the thunder. Our thunder is German, too, is not very lithe, and comes but slowly rolling on; but come it will, and when you hear it peal as it has never pealed in the world's history before, then know that the German thunder has at length rolled home."

The second volume dealt more especially with the Romantic School of poets. Lessing, Herder, and Goethe are the objects of criticism. But the chiefs of this school at this time were the two Schlegels, and Jena was their head-quarters. As Jena was close to Weimar, and Goethe was prime-minister of the duchy, there came about a half-alliance between him and the Romantic School. Schelling was their philosopher, and though he never actually belonged to the party, his personal influence was great. But Schelling became a convert to Catholicism, and therefore lost favor with Heine, and Goethe was too great to be a party-man.

The most remarkable part of the volume is Heine's attack upon the two Schlegels. In abuse, as we have had occasion to see before, he was not moderate. He spared no personality, and his language almost recalls the venomous eloquence which Æschines and Demosthenes poured upon each other. Both Schlegels, with whom he was apparently once on good terms, are abused and inveighed against in all the relations of life. Frederick, the Austrian diplomatist, author of the "Philosophy of History," seemed to him to be more important than his brother. "But he died," says Heine, with no apparent ground for his assertion, "in consequence of gastro-nomic excesses, after having carried off the wife of his host, and living upon the alms of the insulted husband." For A. W. Schlegel he reserves his choicest abuse. This was the great critic, rival, and literary opponent of Niebuhr. Besides his historical criticisms, A. W. Schlegel had translated Shakespeare, and with his brother was the initiator of Sanscrit research. In metric power Heine allows him to be second to Von Platen alone, after which covert sneer, he denies all his further pretensions as critic or linguist.

"It is difficult to determine," he says, "what may be his rank as a poet. The violinist, Solomons, who gave lessons to the King of England, George III., said once to his illustrious pupil: 'Violinists are divided into three classes. The first class comprises those who play very badly; the second, those who cannot play at all; to the third belong those who play well. Your most gracious Majesty has already advanced to the second class.' Now does Herr August Wilhelm Schlegel belong to the first or second class? Some say he is no poet, others say he is a very bad one, I am quite certain he is no Paganini."

In 1834 appeared the third and last volume on Germany. In the previous volumes Heine had endeavored to show that Pantheism was the true religion of Germany. It was a return, he urged, to the old mythology, which peopled the woods and "piny mountains" with gods, and made the elements their dwelling-places. The stories of fairies, pixies, demons, and devils which Luther believed in, though he denied the spiritual power of the Pope, were traces of the former religion: they were the crumbling fragments of the northern Pantheon. The love of the Romantics for the Middle Ages, and their preference of mediæval subjects, were in reality the result of a secret, half-conscious love of primeval Pantheism, whose relics were much more abundant in mediæval times. They were preserved in the stories of magic and witchcraft, and in many of the otherwise inexplicable customs and sayings of the people. The spell of the buried gods, dead, despised, but not altogether forgotten by the true children of the soil, and some day to come back and reign again, was strong upon the poetic imagination of Heine:—

"There is surely something more than a mere fable in the belief that Kaiser Friederich, the old Barbarossa, is not dead, but that he fled, when the hosts of priests pressed him, to a mountain called Kyffhäuser. They say he lies concealed there with his whole court, until the day shall come when he will once more appear in the world to make the German people happy. This mountain is in Thuringia, not far from Nordhausen. I have often passed it, and one fair winter night I remained there for more than an hour, and cried again and again, 'Come, Barbarossa, come,' and my heart burned like fire in my breast, and tears rolled down my cheeks. But he came not, the beloved Kaiser Friederich, and I could only embrace the rock in which he dwells."

This third volume is occupied with the history of popular belief connected with these superstitions. Kobolds, dwarfs, elves, trolls, pixies, and fairies meet with a loving historian. And it is extraordinary that these airy creatures still retain such vitality in Germany. With us the migration of the fairies took place long ago, and it was not the main body that Shakespeare saw on midsummer-nights by Warwick, but loiterers who hung behind. Perhaps this is owing to the fact that since we are Romance as well as Teutonic, these sensitive folk did not find our composite nature genial. But in some respects the German mythology agrees with ours, and Barbarossa may correspond to our King Arthur, who is to come again from the island of Avillion. We have happily nothing to represent the story of Tannhäuser and the Venusberg, but that belongs to a different cycle of legends, and may be traced rather to classical than old German Paganism. At the close of the volume there is an original poetical version of the story.

Although Heine renounced Pantheism in the last years of his life, the work on Germany must ever remain a remarkable book. Open it where we will, we feel that we are breathing the air of freedom and listening to the words of genius. The air hurtles with the arrows of unsparing satire, but it is for the most part against prejudice and bigotry that they are directed, and everywhere there are the two great blessings of literature,—light and air.

In 1841 appeared the book upon Ludwig Börne.

It was an unfortunate production. Börne was an able critic, an older man than Heine, and had at one time shown him much kindness. The two men had at first the same political views, and Börne, like Heine, was compelled to quit Germany. The revolution attracted him to Paris, where he welcomed his friend upon his arrival. But they drifted farther and farther apart, and their intimacy was broken off. The fault lay with Heine. He had assumed the position of a democrat and a partisan, a most difficult one for an artist to keep. Already he saw, or thought he saw, that in the democracy of the future beauty must yield to expediency, poetry to commonplace commerce. Consistent communism, the equality and fraternity for which he was fighting, would certainly dispense with the nightingale song of the lyrist and the flower-like beauty of art. And so a reaction in his own mind set in against his party, and their resentment was as natural as it was bitter. After Börne's death Heine published this account of their relationship, in which, of course, Börne is made to figure ridiculously. The book aroused many slumbering hatreds in Germany against the author, and involved him in a duel. Some passages he afterwards voluntarily suppressed. The really valuable part of the volume is a kind of intermezzo written at the time of the revolution in the island of Heligoland, and contains a description of the effect the French news produced even at that distance from the centre of the great struggle.

Before the duel Heine celebrated his marriage with a Parisian lady, Mathilde Crescentia Mirat. She had already lived some years with him as his wife, and remained his greatest consolation in the terrible misfortune of his later years. Their union was childless. Late in the same year was printed the poem of "Atta Troll," and in 1844, "Germany.—a Winter Story."

But the fatal disease which during Heine's whole life had been impending was now imminent; and in 1848, in the very crisis of the last revolution, he was laid upon the sick couch, never again to rise whole. His disease was a softening of the spinal marrow. The pain caused him perpetual sleeplessness, and his nerves were so paralyzed that he had to raise his eyelid with his hand. For eight years he lay almost without power of motion, and had to be fed like a bird. But the finger of paralysis which rendered his body powerless failed to touch his mind or daunt his spirit. When no longer able to write, he dictated letters and poems which had lost nothing of the old daring. In the course of these eight years he published his "Romancero," "Hebrew Melodies," and "Last Poems," and overlooked the issuing of a complete edition of his works. However ill he was, and however much he had suffered during the night, each morning at a fixed time he dictated to his secretary. Afterwards came some one to read to him, and then he was ready to receive visitors; and these were many. It was in these last helpless years that he enjoyed the reputation he had made. The distinguished men of France and of Germany grudged him his glory no longer, and people from many nations paid their homage in his sick-chamber to a dying poet. After the 17th of February, 1856, they came no more.

Just thirty years before, in Germany, he had drawn a picture of what his old age should be, and how he would sing his dying song:—

"At last the day will come when the fervor in my veins is extinguished, when Winter reigns in my heart, and his white flakes fall but sparingly upon my heart, and his mist is as a veil before my eyes. My friends have long lain in their weather-beaten tombs; I alone am left behind like a lonely halp which the reaper forgets. A new race has sprung up, with new wishes and new thoughts; with wonder I hear new names and new songs. The old names have died away, and I myself am heard no more; honored still perhaps by few, by many despised, and loved by none. And boys with rosy cheeks come to me, and put the old harp in my trembling hand, and laughingly say, 'Thou hast long been silent, thou lazy graybeard, sing us again songs of the dreams of thy youth.'

"Then I take the harp, and the old joys and sorrows awake, the mists dissolve, tears bloom again from my dead eyes, there is spring again in my heart, tears of sweet regret tremble in the strings of my harp; I see once more the blue river, and the marble palaces, and the fair faces of women and maidens, and I sing a song of the flowers of Brenta.

"It will be my last lay. The stars will gaze upon me as in the nights of my youth, the enamored moonlight kisses once more my cheeks, the spirit choirs of dead nightingales are heard in the distance, my eyes close themselves in the intoxication of sleep, my soul dies away like the music of my harp, — there is a perfume of the flowers of Brenta.

"A tree shall hang over my tombstone. I should prefer a palm; but this thrives not in the North. It shall be a linden, and lovers shall sit there of a summer evening and caress. The greenfinch who listens and rocks himself in the branches is silent, and my linden sighs sadly above the heads of the happy ones, who are so happy that they find not time to read what is written upon the white headstone. But, afterwards, when the lover has lost his beloved, he will come again to the well-remembered linden and sigh, and weep, and look long and often at the headstone, where he will read the inscription: 'He loved the flowers of Brenta.'

But it was not to be. The eight years of agony which he suffered, though they did not quench the fire of his spirit, brought many things before his mind in a different light from that in which he had seen them in happier days. The change which came over his political views some years before has already been referred to. But besides this, there came another, a change in his religious opinions. In the preface to his last volume of poems he makes his recantation. The whole passage is touching; it is Heine's apologia pro vitâ suâ : —

"When we lie on our death-bed we become very gentle and tender-hearted, and would willingly make peace with God and man. I confess I have scratched many, and bitten many, and been no lamb. But since I have stood in need of God's mercy I have made a truce with all my foes; many beautiful poems, which were directed against very high and very low persons, are for that reason excluded from the present collection. Poems which contained in any degree personalities against Almighty God I have committed to the flames with the zeal of fear. It is better that the verses should burn than the versifier. Yes, I have made peace with the Creator as well as with the creature, to the great displeasure of my enlightened friends, who reproach me for my relapse into the old superstition, as they are pleased to call my return to God. Others express themselves with still bitterer intolerance. Atheism's convocation has pronounced its anathema over me, and there are certain fanatical priests of unbelief who would willingly place me on the rack to make me renounce my heterodoxy. Happily they have no instruments of torture at command except their writings. But I will confess everything without torture. I have really returned to God, like the prodigal son, after feeding swine with the Hegelians for many years. The divine home-sickness came upon me, and drove me forth, through woods and vales, over the dizziest mountain pathways of dialectic. On my way I found the god of the Pantheists, but I could make nothing of him. This poor visionary creature is interwoven with and grown into the world. Indeed, he is almost imprisoned in it, and yawns at you, without voice, without power. To have will one must have personality, and to manifest one's self one must have elbow room.

"In religion I admit my backsliding, but I must expressly contradict the report that it has brought me to the bosom or the threshold of any church whatever. No, my religious convictions and belief have remained free from all ecclesiastical prejudice. No music of church bells has seduced me, no splendor of altar candles has dazzled me. I have toyed with no symbolism, nor have I altogether renounced my reason. I have abjured nothing, not even my Pagan gods, from whom it is true I have parted, but only in friendship and love."

Whatever fame Heine has won, or is still to win, as a prose writer, it is by his poetry that he has gained the heart and the love of Germany. Few German poets, except perhaps Uhland, have won so wide and popular a renown. The boatmen as they pass down the Rhine sing his Loreley song, and every boy in Germany is acquainted with some or other song of his. These poems it is difficult to characterize, not more on account of their wide range of subject than because of the sparkle and evanescence of the sentiment. Being in the true sense lyrical, they have little or no connection with each other. "L'auteur a retiré le fil du collier, mais aucune perle ne lui manque." But they have two characteristics which are sometimes thought incompatible, — pathos and humor; and these so blended together that it is almost impossible to say where the one begins and the other ends. Ordinary minds separate the two, and fail to appreciate them in combination. Rain is frequent, sunshine is not rare, but a rainbow is always unusual. Heine's poetry is never without something of this double nature. It is the tear and the smile together, and the reader scarcely knows whether laughter or tears will prevail. In his gayest and most careless verses there is an undertone of sorrow and regret, whilst with the saddest songs is mingled something of humor and subtle delight. "Ce n'est pas un vain cliquetis d'antithèses de dire littérairement d'Henri Heine qu'il est cruel et tendre, naïf et perfide, sceptique et crédule, lyrique et prosaïque, sentimental et railleur, passionné et glacial, spirituel et pittoresque, antique et moderne, moyen-âge et révolutionnaire." * And it is so with his songs.

Yet, properly speaking, he never wrote a volume of lyrical poetry. His mind caught some sudden flash of light, and a poem sprang into existence. Thus they came, and were mostly printed, one by one. It was only later that he collected these fugitive leaves into a book. The first was the "Buch der Lieder." Its success was immediate. All classes accepted it, with its Hebrew mystery, its Greek beauty, its German tenderness and simplicity. The contradiction and inexplicable inconsistency of its music found nothing like itself except human passion and human nature. It is almost impossible to convey into another language the grace and beauty of the original rhythm, — it has not been done yet, — but the poems have a further beauty which may perhaps be retained.

Heine preserves the characteristics to which we have referred in all his poems, even in the satiric stanzas of "Atta Troll" and the "Winter Story."

* Revue des Deux Mondes, July, 1848.

As in reading Aristophanes we come upon passages where we are surprised by a beauty alien to comedy, so in these satires we find a wealth of poetry lavished upon an epigram and adorning a jest.

But the poems which show the most sustained power are those which were written during his last illness, — those which are found in the "Romancero." The story of the discovery of the body of King Harold by Edith of the Swan-neck is an illustration of this. The "Hebrew Melodies" are equally powerful.

The "Lazarus" poems are the last of the series. Even yet the smile has not vanished from the face of the poet, but the tears are the tears of pain and of unrest, to which death alone can bring relief. We will give no specimen of these. The rest has been found now. Heine lies in the cemetery of Montmartre.

To much of the apparent inconsistency in Heine's opinions the key is to be sought in his peculiar position. At the time he was born his father had already renounced Judaism, without having adopted Christianity; and although he himself was educated at a Roman Catholic seminary, and was formally baptized, yet the mythology of Greece and Rome exercised a stronger influence upon him than any Christian teaching. His mind was the perpetual battle-field of opposing forms of thought. He was swayed alternately by Judaism and Hellenism; he wavered between the Romantic and the Classical schools; he could not decide for the democracy of science or the aristocracy of art. That from these conflicting principles he failed to evolve a clear and consistent system, should be no matter of wonder, far less of reprobation. His efforts have made ours easier.

MRS. MERRIDEW'S FORTUNE.

III.

We did not meet again for some days after this, and next time I saw her, which was on Sunday at church with her children, it seemed impossible to me to believe in the reality of the strange scene we had so recently passed through together. The calm curtain of ordinary decorums and ordinary friendliness had risen for a moment from Mrs. Merridew's unexcited existence, revealing a woman distracted by a primitive sense of justice rending her own soul, as it were, in sunder, and doing, in spite of herself and all her best instincts what she felt was right. That she should have any existence separate from her children had never occurred to anybody before. Yet, for one day, I had seen her resist and ignore the claims of her children, and act like an individual being. When I saw her again she was once more the mother and nothing more, casting her eyes over her little flock, cognizant, one could see, of the perfection or imperfection of every fold and line in their dresses, keeping her attention upon each, from little Matty, who was restless and could not be kept quiet, up to Janet, who sat demure, and already caught the eye of visitors as one of the prettiest girls of Dinglefield. Mrs. Merridew remarked all with a vigilant mother's eye, and as I gazed across at her in her pew, it was all but impossible for me to believe that this was the same woman who had clung so convulsively to my arm, whose face had been so worn and hollowed out with suffering. How could it be the same woman? She who had suffered poor John Babington to love her, — and then had cast him off, and married her friend's lover instead; who had established so firm an empire over a man's heart, that, after twenty years, he had remembered her still with such intensity of feeling. How Janet would have opened her big eyes had it been suggested to her that her mother could have any power over men's hearts; or, indeed, could be occupied with anything more touching or important than her children's frocks or her butcher's bills! I fear I did not pay much attention to the service that morning. I could not but gaze at them, and wonder whether, for instance, Mr. Merridew himself, who had come back from circuit, and was seated respectfully with his family in church, yawning discreetly over Mr. Damerel's sermon, remembered anything at all, for his part, of Matilda Babington or her brother. Probably he preferred to ignore the subject altogether, — or, perhaps, would laugh with a sense of gratified vanity that there had been "a row," when the transference of his affections was discovered. And there she sat by his side who had, — had she betrayed his confidence? was she untrue to him in being this time true to her friends? The question bewildered me so that my mind went groping about it and about it. Once, I fear, she had been false to those whose bread she eat, and chosen love instead of friendship. Now was she false to the nearest of ties, the closest of all relationships, sitting calmly there beside him with a secret in her mind of which he knew nothing? "Falsely true!" — was that what the woman was who looked to the outside world a mere pattern of all domestic virtues, without any special interest about her, a wife devoted to her husband's interest, a mother wrapped up, as people say, in her children? I could not make up my mind what to think.

"I hope you got through your business comfortably," Mrs. Spencer said to me as we walked home from church.

"With Mrs. Merridew's assistance," said Lady Isabella, who was rather satirical. And the Merridews heard their own name, and stopped to join in the conversation.

"What is that about my wife?" he said. "Did Mrs. Musgrave have Mrs. Merridew's assistance about something? I hope it was only shopping. When you have business you should consult me. She is a goose, and knows nothing about it."

"I don't think she is a goose," said I.

"No, perhaps not in her own way," said the serene husband, laughing; "but every woman is a goose about business, — I beg your pardon, ladies, but I assure you I mean it as a compliment. I hate a woman of business. Shopping is quite a different matter," he added, and laughed. Good heavens! if he had only known what a fool he looked, beside the silent woman who gave me a little warning glance and colored a little, and turned away her head to speak to little Matty, who was clinging to her skirts. A perfect mother! thinking more (you would have said) of Matty's little frills and Janet's bonnet-strings than of anything else in life.

And that was all about it. The summer went on and turned to autumn and to winter and to spring again, with that serene progression of nature which nothing obstructs: and the children grew, and the Merridews were as poor as ever managing à peu près to make both ends meet, but always just a little short somewhere, with their servants chosen on the same principle of supplementing each other's imperfect service as that Janet had announced to me. For one thing, they kept their servants a long time, which I have noticed is characteristic of households not very rich nor very "particular." When you allow such pleas to tell in favor of an imperfect housemaid as that she is good to the children, or does not mind helping the cook, there is no reason why Mary, if she does not marry in the mean time, should not stay with you a hundred years. And the Merridews' servants accordingly stayed, and looked very friendly at you when you went to call, and did their work not very well, with much supervision and exasperation (respectively) on the part of the mother and daughter. But the family was no poorer, though it was no richer. The only evidence of our expedition to town which I could note was, that it had produced a new pucker on Mrs. Merridew's brow. She had looked sufficiently anxious by times before, but the new pucker had something more than anxiety in it. There was a sense of something better that might have been; a sense of something lost, — a suspicion of bitterness. How all this could be expressed by one line on a smooth white forehead I cannot explain; but to me it was so.

Now and then, too, a chance allusion would be made which recalled what had happened still more plainly. For instance, I chanced to be calling one afternoon, when Mr. Merridew came home earlier than usual from town. We were sitting over our five-o'clock tea, with a few of the children scrambling about the floor and Janet working in the corner. He took up the ordinary position of a man who has just come home, with his back to the fire, and regarded us with that benevolent contempt which men generally think it right to exhibit for women over their tea; and everything was so ordinary and pleasant, that I for one was taken entirely by surprise, and nearly let fall the cup in my hand when he spoke.

"I don't know whether you saw John Babington's death in The Times three or four months ago, Janet," he said, "did you? Why did you never mention it? It is odd that I should not have heard. I met Ellen to-day coming out of the Amyotts', where I lunched, in such prodigious mourning that I was quite startled. All the world might have been dead to look at her. And do you know she gave me a look as if she would have spoken. All that is so long past that it's ridiculous keeping up malice. I wish you would call next time you are in town to ask for the old lady. Poor John's death must have been a sad loss to them. I hear there was some fear that he had left his property away from his mother and sister. But it turned out a false report."

I did not dare to look at Mrs. Merridew to see how she bore it; but her voice replied quite calmly without any break, as if the conversation was on the most ordinary subject, —

"Where did you manage to get so much news?"

"O, from the Amyotts," he said, "who knew all about it. Matilda, you know, poor girl" (with that half-laugh of odious masculine vanity which I knew in my heart he would be guilty of), "married a cousin of Amyott's, and is getting on very well, they say. But think over my suggestion, Janet. I think at this distance of time it would be graceful on your part to go and call."

"I cannot think they would like to see me, now," she said, in a low voice. Then I ventured to look at her. She was seated in an angular, rigid way, with her shoulders and elbows squared to her work, and the corners of her mouth pursed up, which would have given to any cursory observer the same impression it did to her husband.

"How hard you women are!" he said. "Trust you for never forgiving or forgetting. Poor old lady, I should have thought anybody would have pitied her. But, however, it is none of my business. As for Ellen, she is a very handsome woman, though she is not so young as she once was. I should not wonder if she were to make a good marriage even now. Is it possible, Janet, after being so fond of her, — or pretending to be, how can I tell? — that you would not like to say a kind word to Ellen now?"

"She would not think it kind from me," said Mrs. Merridew, still rigid, never raising her eyes from her work.

"I think she would, but at all events you might try," he said. All her answer was to shake her head, and he went away to his dressing-room shrugging his shoulders and nodding his head in bewildered comments to himself on what he considered the hard-heartedness of woman. As for me, I kept looking at her with sympathetic eyes, thinking that at least she would give herself the comfort of a confidential glance. But she did not. It seemed that she was determined to ignore the whole matter, even to me.

"I wish papa would take as much interest in us poor girls at home as he does in people that don't belong to him," said Janet. "Mamma, I never can piece this to make it long enough. It may do for Marian" (who was her next sister), "but it will never do for me."

"You are so easily discouraged," said Mrs. Merridew. "Let me look at it. You girls are always making difficulties. Under the flounce, your piecing, as you call it, will never be seen. Those flounces" she added, with a little laugh which I knew was hysterical, "are blessings to poor folks."

"I am sure I don't think there is anything to laugh at," said poor Janet, almost crying, "when you think of Nelly Fortis and all the other girls, with their nice dresses all new and fresh from the dressmaker's, and no trouble; while I have only mamma's old gown, that she wore when she was twenty, to turn, and patch, and piece, — and not long enough after all!"

"Then you should not grow so," said her mother, "and you ought to be thankful that the old fashion has come in again, and my old gown can be of use." But as she spoke she turned round and gave me a look. The tears were in her eyes, and that pucker, O, so deeply marked, in her forehead. I felt she would have sobbed had she dared. And then before my eyes, as, I am sure, before hers, there glided a vision of Ellen Babington in her profound mourning, rustling past Mr. Merridew on the stairs, with heaps of costly crape, no doubt, and that rich black silk with which people console themselves in their first mourning. How could they take it all without a word? The after-pang that comes almost inevitably at the back of a sacrifice was tearing Mrs. Merridew's heart. I felt it go through my own and so I knew. She had done it nobly, but she could not forget that she had done it. Does one ever forget?

And then as I went home I fell into a maze again. Had she a right to do it? To sit at table with that unsuspecting man, and put her arm in his, and be at his side continually, and all the time be false to him. Falsely true! I could not get the words out of my mind.

IV.

I do not now remember how long it was till I saw in The Times the intimation of old Mrs. Babington's death. I think it must have been about two years, for Janet was eighteen, and less discontented with things in general, besides being a great deal more contented than either her friends or his desired with the civilities of young Bischam from the Priory, who was always coming over to see his aunt, and always throwing himself in the girl's way. He had nothing except his commission and a hundred and fifty a year which his father allowed him, and she had nothing at all; and, naturally they took to each other. It is this that makes me recollect what year it was. We had never referred to the matter in our frequent talks, Mrs. Merridew and I. But after the intimation in The Times, she herself broke the silence. She came to me the very next day. "Did you see it in the papers?" she asked, plunging without preface into the heart of the subject, and I could not pretend not to understand.

"Yes," I said, "I saw it"; and then stopped short, not knowing what to say.

She had been wearing herself in these two years as all the previous years in which I had known her had not worn her. The pucker was more developed on her forehead; she was less patient and more easily fretted. She had grown thin, and something of a sharp tone had come into her soft motherly voice. By times she would be almost querulous; and nobody but myself knew in the least whence the drop of gall came that had so suddenly shown itself in her nature. She had fretted under her secret, and over her sacrifice,—the sacrifice which had never been taken notice of, but had been calmly accepted as a right. Now she came to me half wild, with the look of a creature driven to bay.

"It was for her I did it," she said; "she had always been so petted and cared for all her life. She did not know how to deny herself; I did it for her, not for Ellen. O Mrs. Musgrave, I cannot tell you how fond I was of that girl! And you saw how she looked at me. Never one word, never even a glance of response: and I suppose now—"

"My dear," I said, "you cannot tell yet; let us wait and see: now that her mother is gone her heart may be softened. Do not take any steps just yet."

"Steps!" she cried. "What steps can I take now? I have thrown altogether away from me what might have been of such use to the children. I have been false to my own children. Poor John meant it to be of use to us."

And then she turned away wrought to such a point that nothing but tears could relieve her. When she had cried she was better, and went home to all her little monotonous cares again, to think and think, and mingle that drop of gall more and more in the family cup. Mr. Merridew was again absent on circuit at this time, which was at once a relief and a trouble to his wife. And everybody remarked the change upon her.

"She is going to have a bad illness," Mrs. Spencer said. "Poor thing, I don't wonder, with all those children, and inferior servants, and so much to do. I have seen it coming on for a long time. A serious illness is a dangerous thing at her age. All her strength has been drained out of her: and whether she will be able to resist—"

"Don't be so funereal," said Lady Isabella; "she has something on her mind."

"I think it is her health," said Mrs. Spencer; and we all shook our heads over her altered looks.

I had a further fright, too, some days after, when Janet came to me, looking very pale. She crept in with an air of secrecy which was very strange to the girl. She looked scared, and her hair was pushed up wildly from her forehead, and her light summer dress all dusty and dragging, which was unlike Janet, for she had begun by this time to be tidy, and feel herself a woman. She came in by the window as usual, but closed it after her, though it was very hot. "May I come and speak to you?" she said in a whisper, creeping quite close to my side.

"Of course, my dear; but why do you shut the window?" said I; "we shall be suffocated if you shut out the air."

"It is because it is a secret," she said. "Mrs. Musgrave, tell me, is there anything wrong with mamma?"

"Wrong!" I said, turning upon her in dismay.

"I can't help it," cried Janet, bursting into tears. "I don't believe mamma ever did anything wrong. I can't believe it: but there has been a woman questioning me so, I don't know what to think."

"A woman questioning you?"

"Listen," said Janet, hastily. "This is how it was: I was walking down to the Dingle across the fields,—O Mrs. Musgrave dear, don't say anything; it was only poor Willie Bischam, who wanted to say good by to me,—and all at once I saw a tall lady in mourning looking at us as we passed. She came up to us just at the stile at Goodman's farm, and I thought she wanted to ask the way; but instead of that, she stopped me and looked at me. 'I heard you called Janet,' she said; 'I had once a friend who was called Janet, and it is not a common name. Do you live here? is your mother living? and well? and how many children are there? I should like to know if you belong to my old friend.'"

"And what did you say?"

"What could I say, Mrs. Musgrave? She did not look cross or disagreeable, and she was a lady. I said who I was, and that mamma was not quite well, and that there were ten of us; and then she began to question me about mamma. Did she go out a great deal; and was she tall or short; and had she pretty eyes 'like mine,' she said; and was her name Janet like mine; and then, when I had answered her as well as I could, she said, 'I was not to say a word to mamma; perhaps it is not the Janet I once knew,' she said; 'don't say anything to her'; and then she went away. I was so frightened, I ran home directly all the way. I knew I might tell you, Mrs. Musgrave; it is like something in a book, is it not, when people are trying to find out—O, you don't think I can have done any harm to mamma?"

Janet was so much agitated that it was all I could do to quiet her down. "And I never said good by to poor Willie, after all," she said, with more tears when she had rallied a little. I thought it better she should not tell her mother, though one is very reluctant to say so to a girl; for Willie Bischam was a secret too. But he was going away poor fellow, and probably nothing would ever come of it. I made a little compromise with my own sense of right.

"Forget it, Janet, and say nothing about it; perhaps it was some one else after all; and if you will promise not to meet Mr. Bischam again—"

"He goes to-night," said Janet, with a rueful look; and thus it was evident that on that point there was nothing more to be said.

This was in the middle of the week, and on Saturday Mr. Merridew was expected home. His wife was ill, though she never had been ill before in her life; she had headaches, which were things unknown to her; she was out of temper, and irritable, and wretched. I think she had made certain that Ellen would write, and make some proposal to her; and as the days went on one by one, and no letter came— Besides it was just the moment when they had decided against sending Jack to Oxford. To pay Willie's premium and do that at the same time was impossible. Mrs. Merridew had struggled long, but at last she was obliged to give in; and Jack was going to his father's office with a heavy heart, poor boy; and his mother was half wild. All might have been so different; and she had sacrificed her boys' interests, and her girls' interests, and her own happiness, all for the selfish comfort of Ellen Babington, who took no notice of her. I began to think she would have a brain-fever if this went on.

She was not at church on Sunday morning, and I went with the children, as soon as service was over, to ask for her. She was lying on the sofa when I went in, and Mr. Merridew, who had arrived late on Saturday, was in his dressing-gown walking about the room. He was tired and irritable with his journey, and his work, and perennial cares. And she, with her sacrifice, and her secret, and perennial cares, was like tinder, ready in a moment to catch fire. I know nothing more disagreeable than to go in upon married people when they are in this state of mind, which can neither be ignored nor concealed.

"I don't understand you, Janet," he was saying, as I entered; "women are vindictive, I know; but at least you may be sorry, as I am, that the poor old lady has died without a word of kindness passing between us: after all, we might be to blame. One changes one's opinions as one gets on in life. With our own children growing up round us, I don't feel quite so sure that we were not to blame."

"I have not been to blame," she said, with an emphasis which sounded sullen, and which only I could understand.

"O no, of course; you never are," he said, with masculine disdain. "Catch a woman acknowledging herself to be in fault! The sun may go wrong in his course sooner than she. Mrs. Musgrave, pray don't go away; you have seen my wife in an unreasonable mood before."

"I am in no unreasonable mood," she cried. "Mrs. Musgrave, stay. You know—O, how am I to go on bearing this, and never answer a word?"

"My dear, don't deceive yourself," he said, with a man's provoking calm; "you answer a great many words. I don't call you at all a meek sufferer. Fortunately the children are out of the way. Confound it, Janet, what do you mean by talking of what you have to bear? I have not been such a harsh husband to you as all that; and when all I asked was that you should make the most innocent advances to a poor old woman who was once very kind to us both—"

"Charles!" said Mrs. Merridew, rising suddenly from her sofa, "I can't bear it any longer. You think me hard and vindictive, and I don't know what. You, who ought to know me! Look here! I got that letter, you will see by the date, more than two years ago; you were absent, and I went and saw her: there—there! now I have confessed it; Mrs. Musgrave knows—I have had a secret from you for two years."

It was not a moment for me to interfere. She sat, holding herself hysterically rigid and upright on the sofa. Whether she had intended to betray herself or not, I cannot tell. She had taken the letter out of her writing-desk, which stood close by; but I don't know whether she had resolved on this step, or whether it was the impulse of the moment. Now that she had done it a dreadful calm of expectation took possession of her. She was afraid. He might turn upon her furious. He might upbraid her with despoiling her family, deceiving himself, being false, as she had been before. Such a thing was possible. Two souls may live side by side for years, and be as one, and yet have no notion how each will act in any sudden or unusual emergency. He was her husband, and they had no interest, scarcely any thought, that one did not share with the other, and yet she sat gazing at him rigid with terror, not knowing what he might do or say.

He read the letter without a word; then he tossed it upon the table; then he walked all the length of the room, up and down, with his hands thrust very deeply into his pockets; then he took up the letter again. He had a struggle with himself. If he was angry, if he was touched, I cannot tell. His first emotions, whatever they were, he gulped down without a word. Of all sounds to strike into the silence of such a moment, the first thing we heard in our intense listening was the abrupt ring of a short, excited laugh.

"How did you venture to take any steps in it without consulting me?" he said.

"I thought—I thought—" she stammered under her breath.

"You thought I might have been tempted by the money," he said, taking another walk through the room, while she sat erect in her terror, afraid of him. It was some time before he spoke again. No doubt he was vexed by her want of trust, and wounded by the long silence. But I have no clew to the thoughts that were passing through his mind. At last he came to a sudden pause before her. "And perhaps you were right, Janet," he said, drawing a long breath. "I am glad now to have been free of the temptation. It was wrong not to tell me,—and yet I think you did well."

Mrs. Merridew gave a little choked cry, and then she fell back on the sofa,—fell into my arms.

I had felt she might do it, so strange was her look, and had placed myself there on purpose. But she had not fainted, as I expected. She lay silent for a moment, with her eyes closed, and then she burst into tears.

I had no right to be there; but they both detained me, both the husband and wife, and I could not get away until she had recovered herself, and it was evident that what had been a tragical barrier between them was now become a matter of business, to be discussed as affecting them both.

"It was quite right the old lady should have it," Mr. Merridew said, as he went with me to the door, "quite right. Janet did only what was right; but now I must take it into my own hands."

"And annul what she has done?" I asked.

"We must consult over that," he said. "Ellen Babington, who has been so ungrateful to my wife, is quite a different person from her mother. But I will do nothing against Mrs. Merridew's will."

And so I left them to consult over their own affairs. I had been thrust into it against my own will; but still it was entirely their affair, and no business of mine.

Mrs. Spencer and Lady Isabella called to me from their lawn as I went out to ask how Mrs. Merridew was, and shook their heads over her.

"She should have the doctor," said Mrs. Spencer.

"But the doctor would not pay her bills for her," said Lady Isabella.

And I had to answer meekly, as if I knew nothing about it, "I don't think it is her bills."

This conversation detained me some time from my own house; and when I reached my cottage, my maid stood by the gate, looking out for me, shading her eyes with her hands. It was to tell me there was a lady waiting for me in the drawing-room, — "A tall lady in mourning." And in a moment my heart smote me for some hard thoughts, and I knew who my visitor was.

I found her seated by my table, very pale, but quite self-possessed. She rose when I went in, and began to explain.

"You don't know me," she said. "I have no right to come to you; but once you came to — us — with Mrs. Merridew. Perhaps you remember me now? I am Ellen Babington. I want to speak to you about — my brother's will. You may have heard that I have just lost —"

"Yes," I said. "I am very sorry. If there is anything I can do —"

"You can do all that I want from any one," she said. "Janet will never believe that I wanted to keep the money — now. I have seen all her children to-day at church; and I think, if she had been there, I should perhaps have been able, — but never mind. Tell her I should like — if she would give her daughter Janet something out of the money, — from me. She is a little like what her mother was. I am sure you are kind to them. I don't even know your name —"

"Mrs. Musgrave," I said; and she gave a little bow. She was very composed, very well-bred, terribly sad; with the look of a woman who had no more to do in the world, and who yet was, Heaven help her! in the middle of her life, full of vigor, and capability, and strength.

"Will you tell Janet, please, that it is all settled?" she said. "I mean, not the girl Janet, but her mother. Tell her I have settled everything. I believe she will hear from the lawyers to-morrow; but I could not let it come only from the lawyers. I cannot forgive her, even now. She thinks it is Matilda she has wronged; but it is me she has wronged, taking my brother from me, my only brother, after all these years. But never mind. I kissed the little child instead to-day — the quite little one, with the gold hair. I suppose she is the youngest. Tell her I came on purpose to see them before I went away."

"But why send this message through me?" I said; "come and see her. I will take you; it is close by. And the sight of you will do her more good — more good than the money. Come, and let her explain."

I thought she hesitated for a moment, but her only answer was a shake of her head.

"What could she explain?" she cried, with strange impetuosity. "He and I had been together all our lives, and yet all the while he cared nothing for his sister and everything for her. Do you think I can ever forgive her? but I never forgot her. I don't think I ever loved any one so well in my life."

"O, come and tell her so," said I.

Again she shook her head. "I loved her as well as I loved him; and yet I hate her," she said. "But tell her I spoke to her Janet, and I kissed her baby; and that I have arranged everything with the lawyers about poor John's will. I am sure you are a good woman. Will you shake hands with me for the children's sake before I go?"

Her voice went to my heart. I had only seen her once in my life before, but I could not help it. I went up to her and took her two hands, and kissed her; and then she, the stranger, broke down, and put her head on my shoulder and wept. It was only for a moment, but it bound us as if for our lives.

"Where are you going?" I asked, when she went away.

"I am going abroad with some friends," she said, hurriedly.

"Most likely I shall never come back," she said, hastily, and then went away alone out of my door, alone across the green, with her veil over her face and her black dress repulsing the sunshine. One's sympathies move and change about like the winds. I had been so sorry for Mrs. Merridew an hour ago; but it was not her I was most sorry for now.

And this was how it all ended. I was always glad that Mrs. Merridew had told her husband before the letter came next morning. And they got the money; and John went to the university, and Janet had new dresses and new pleasures, and a ring, of which she was intensely proud, according to Ellen's desire. I dare say Ellen's intention was that something much more important should have been given to the child in her name; but then Ellen Babington, being an unmarried woman, did not know how much a large family costs, nor what urgent occasion there is for every farthing, even with an addition so great as five hundred a year.

I am afraid it did not make Mrs. Merridew much happier just at first. She wrote letters wildly, far and near, to everybody who could be supposed to know anything about Ellen; and wanted to have her to live with them, and to share the money with her, and I don't know how many other wild fancies. But all that could be found out was that Ellen had gone abroad. And by degrees the signs of this strange tempest began to disappear, — smoothed out and filled up as Nature smooths all traces of combat. The scars heal, new verdure covers the sudden precipice, — the old gets assimilated with the new. By degrees an air of superior comfort stole over the house, which was very consolatory. Selina, the housemaid, married, and Richards retired to the inevitable greengrocery. And with a new man and new maids, and so much less difficulty about the bills, it is astonishing how the puckers died away from Mrs. Merridew's forehead, — first one line went and then another, and she grew younger in spite of herself. And with everything thus conspiring in her favor, and habit calmly settling to confirm all, is it wonderful if by and by she forgot that any wonderful accident had ever happened, and that all had not come in the most natural way, and with the most pleasant consequences in the world?

The other day I saw in a chance copy of Galig-nani, which came to me in a parcel from Paris, the marriage of Ellen Babington to a Frenchman there; but that is all we have ever heard of her. Whether it is a good marriage or a bad one I don't know; but I hope, at least, it is better for her than being all alone, as she was when she left my house that day in June, having made her sacrifice in her turn. If things had but taken their natural course, how much unnecessary suffering would have been spared: Mrs. Merridew is, perhaps, happier now than she would have been without that five hundred a year; but of course they spend more; and I don't know that they are to be called richer on the whole; but for two years she was wretched, sacrificing and grudging the sacrifice, and making herself very unhappy. And though I don't believe Ellen Babington cared for the money, her heart will never be healed of that pang of bitterness which her brother's desertion gave her. His companion for twenty years! and to think his best thoughts should have been given all that time to a woman who had only slighted him, and refused his love. Mrs. Merridew does not see the sting of this herself; she thinks it natural. And so I dare say would half the world beside.

WHERE DO SOME THINGS COME FROM ?

It is not difficult to understand that things made of wood and stone and metal, of which the supply is virtually unlimited, as well as fabrics of cotton, muslin, gauze, and wool, should be turned out as fast as they are wanted. It is comprehensible, too, that such developments of silk and satin and velvet as may hit the humor of the moment should be forthcoming, in a degree commensurate with the requirements of the public: though this is less easy to understand when one reflects that the whole supply is due to the exertions of a finite number of small caterpillars. The multiplication of objects, the material for constructing which is practically unlimited, is tolerably comprehensible; but what seems unaccountable is the extraordinary way in which certain products of nature—animal, vegetable, and mineral—seem to rush into existence on the shortest notice, whenever a demand for them springs up.

How wonderfully accommodating—to take an instance—has Nature proved of late years in connection with the increased prolificness of the Seal Tribe, or at any rate that portion of it which furnishes the material that goes by the name of seal-skin! It is only within the last dozen years or so, that this particular kind of fur has become furiously popular. It is marvellous to observe how strangely, within that comparatively short time, the supply has increased and multiplied also. A few years ago, a seal-skin cloak was an uncommon garment, a rarity: whereas, now, during the whole of the autumn and winter seasons, we are so surrounded by all sorts of seal-skin garments—cloaks jackets, waistcoats, hats, caps, muffs, tippets, and the like: not to speak of cigar-cases, purses, tobacco-pouches, blotting-books, and other miscellaneous objects—that we might suppose seal-skin to be not merely, as Jaques said of Motley "Your only wear," but your only decorative fabric available for any purpose whatsoever. For, look where one may, it is still seal-skin, seal-skin, seal-skin, everywhere. On the shoulders of ladies; on the breasts of the lords of creation; in the shop-windows; in the circulars which are thrust into our letter-boxes, announcing a consignment of ever so many thousand seal-skin jackets; in the advertisement sheets of the newspapers, from the Times Supplement to the columns of the Exchange and Mart,—in which last journal the yearnings of humanity after seal-skin, and its readiness to barter all other property, of whatsoever kind, in exchange for this idolized fur, are more touchingly expressed than in any other,—under each and all of these aspects the seal-skin rage is continually kept before us.

But the supply with which this phocal rage is appeased is the marvellous thing. How is it that such supply has suddenly come into existence? Or, was it always there, though there was no demand? Has the genus phoca been wearing seal-skin jackets ever since the creation, retaining unmolested their possession of those priceless wares through countless ages; or has this obliging tribe of animals increased in numbers of late years, out of readiness to gratify the caprice of the fashionable world?

Then there are the kids again,—what shall we say of the kids? If it be matter of wonder where all the seals come from, how much more wonderful, how stupefying and stunning, is the thought of the myriads of young goats, whose existence is absolutely necessary to furnish the gloves of the whole civilized world? Kids! How is it that there exist six yards of ground anywhere, without kids browsing thereon? One would expect that the earth would be teeming and swarming with kids. In every town in England, in France, in Europe, gloves made of what at least professes to be the skin of the kid are exposed for sale; while in the large capitals the number of shops devoted exclusively to the diffusion of kid gloves is almost incredible. Taking Paris and London alone, and occupying ourselves only with a few of the principal thoroughfares, we should find enough of such shops to suggest the existence somewhere of such flocks of kids as would overrun at least all the pasture lands of the civilized earth. How many such shops are there in the Palais Royal, the Boulevards, the Rue de Rivoli, the Rue de la Paix; how many in Regent Street, Oxford Street, Bond Street, the Strand, Cheapside, and Piccadilly? How many in other great capitals? How many in South America, how many in Australia, how many in New Zealand? If we take the trouble to enter on the field of conjecture which is thus opened out before us, we shall be cast out in imagination on immeasurable unknown prairies where the foot of man has never trod (except to capture kids), and where skipping kids disport themselves in such prodigious numbers, that the American herd of buffaloes who took six weeks to pass a man in a ditch at full gallop, would be as an every-day drove in the comparison.

I speak of the supply of the raw material, and not the enormous multiplication and sale of the gloves themselves. When one remembers how many are the occasions of show and ceremony where gloves of the palest and most delicate tints are alone admissible, and how soon (covering as they do a part of the human frame which comes in continual contact with all sorts of objects) they become soiled and unfit for use, there is no difficulty in understanding the sale of almost any number of gloves that can be manufactured. It is the multiplication of the kids of whose skins the gloves are made that is the staggering subject of reflection, and it is in

As in reading Aristophanes we come upon passages where we are surprised by a beauty alien to comedy, so in these satires we find a wealth of poetry lavished upon an epigram and adorning a jest.

But the poems which show the most sustained power are those which were written during his last illness, — those which are found in the "Romancero." The story of the discovery of the body of King Harold by Edith of the Swan-neck is an illustration of this. The "Hebrew Melodies" are equally powerful.

The "Lazarus" poems are the last of the series. Even yet the smile has not vanished from the face of the poet, but the tears are the tears of pain and of unrest, to which death alone can bring relief. We will give no specimen of these. The rest has been found now. Heine lies in the cemetery of Montmartre.

To much of the apparent inconsistency in Heine's opinions the key is to be sought in his peculiar position. At the time he was born his father had already renounced Judaism, without having adopted Christianity; and although he himself was educated at a Roman Catholic seminary, and was formally baptized, yet the mythology of Greece and Rome exercised a stronger influence upon him than any Christian teaching. His mind was the perpetual battle-field of opposing forms of thought. He was swayed alternately by Judaism and Hellenism; he wavered between the Romantic and the Classical schools; he could not decide for the democracy of science or the aristocracy of art. That from these conflicting principles he failed to evolve a clear and consistent system, should be no matter of wonder, far less of reprobation. His efforts have made ours easier.

MRS. MERRIDEW'S FORTUNE.

III.

We did not meet again for some days after this, and next time I saw her, which was on Sunday at church with her children, it seemed impossible to me to believe in the reality of the strange scene we had so recently passed through together. The calm curtain of ordinary decorums and ordinary friendliness had risen for a moment from Mrs. Merridew's unexcited existence, revealing a woman distracted by a primitive sense of justice rending her own soul, as it were, in sunder, and doing, in spite of herself and all her best instincts what she felt was right. That she should have any existence separate from her children had never occurred to anybody before. Yet, for one day, I had seen her resist and ignore the claims of her children, and act like an individual being. When I saw her again she was once more the mother and nothing more, casting her eyes over her little flock, cognizant, one could see, of the perfection or imperfection of every fold and line in their dresses, keeping her attention upon each, from little Matty, who was restless and could not be kept quiet, up to Janet, who sat demure, and already caught the eye of visitors as one of the prettiest girls of Dinglefield. Mrs. Merridew remarked all with a vigilant mother's eye, and as I gazed across at her in her pew, it was all but impossible for me to believe that this was the same woman who had clung so convulsively to my arm, whose face had been so worn and hollowed out with suffering. How could it be the same woman? She who had suffered poor John Babington to love her, — and then had cast him off, and married her friend's lover instead; who had established so firm an empire over a man's heart, that, after twenty years, he had remembered her still with such intensity of feeling. How Janet would have opened her big eyes had it been suggested to her that her mother could have any power over men's hearts; or, indeed, could be occupied with anything more touching or important than her children's frocks or her butcher's bills! I fear I did not pay much attention to the service that morning. I could not but gaze at them, and wonder whether, for instance, Mr. Merridew himself, who had come back from circuit, and was seated respectably with his family in church, yawning discreetly over Mr. Damerel's sermon, remembered anything at all, for his part, of Matilda Babington or her brother. Probably he preferred to ignore the subject altogether, — or, perhaps, would laugh with a sense of gratified vanity that there had been "a row," when the transference of his affections was discovered. And there she sat by his side who had, — had she betrayed his confidence? was she untrue to him in being this time true to her friends? The question bewildered me so that my mind went groping about it and about it. Once, I fear, she had been false to those whose bread she eat, and chosen love instead of friendship. Now was she false to the nearest of ties, the closest of all relationships, sitting calmly there beside him with a secret in her mind of which he knew nothing? "Falsely true!" — was that what the woman was who looked to the outside world a mere pattern of all domestic virtues, without any special interest about her, a wife devoted to her husband's interest, a mother wrapped up, as people say, in her children? I could not make up my mind what to think.

"I hope you got through your business comfortably," Mrs. Spencer said to me as we walked home from church.

"With Mrs. Merridew's assistance," said Lady Isabella, who was rather satirical. And the Merridews heard their own name, and stopped to join in the conversation.

"What is that about my wife?" he said. "Did Mrs. Musgrave have Mrs. Merridew's assistance about something? I hope it was only shopping. When you have business you should consult me. She is a goose, and knows nothing about it."

"I don't think she is a goose," said I.

"No, perhaps not in her own way," said the serene husband, laughing; "but every woman is a goose about business, — I beg your pardon, ladies, but I assure you I mean it as a compliment. I hate a woman of business. Shopping is quite a different matter," he added, and laughed. Good heavens! if he had only known what a fool he looked, beside the silent woman who gave me a little warning glance and colored a little, and turned away her head to speak to little Matty, who was clinging to her skirts. A perfect mother! thinking more (you would have said) of Matty's little frills and Janet's bonnet-strings than of anything else in life.

And that was all about it. The summer went on and turned to autumn and to winter and to spring again, with that serene progression of nature which nothing obstructs: and the children grew, and the Merridews were as poor as ever managing à peu près to make both ends meet, but always just a little short somewhere, with their servants chosen on the same principle of supplementing each other's imperfect service as that Janet had announced to me. For one thing, they kept their servants a long time, which I have noticed is characteristic of households not very rich nor very "particular." When you allow such pleas to tell in favor of an imperfect housemaid as that she is good to the children, or does not mind helping the cook, there is no reason why Mary, if she does not marry in the mean time, should not stay with you a hundred years. And the Merridew's servants accordingly stayed, and looked very friendly at you when you went to call, and did their work not very well, with much supervision and exasperation (respectively) on the part of the mother and daughter. But the family was no poorer, though it was no richer. The only evidence of our expedition to town which I could note was, that it had produced a new pucker on Mrs. Merridew's brow. She had looked sufficiently anxious by times before, but the new pucker had something more than anxiety in it. There was a sense of something better that might have been; a sense of something lost, — a suspicion of bitterness. How all this could be expressed by one line on a smooth white forehead I cannot explain; but to me it was so.

Now and then, too, a chance allusion would be made which recalled what had happened still more plainly. For instance, I chanced to be calling one afternoon, when Mr. Merridew came home earlier than usual from town. We were sitting over our five-o'clock tea, with a few of the children scrambling about the floor and Janet working in the corner. He took up the ordinary position of a man who has just come home, with his back to the fire, and regarded us with that benevolent contempt which men generally think it right to exhibit for women over their tea; and everything was so ordinary and pleasant, that I for one was taken entirely by surprise, and nearly let fall the cup in my hand when he spoke.

"I don't know whether you saw John Babington's death in The Times three or four months ago, Janet," he said, "did you? Why did you never mention it? It is odd that I should not have heard. I met Ellen to-day coming out of the Amyotts', where I lunched, in such prodigious mourning that I was quite startled. All the world might have been dead to look at her. And do you know she gave me a look as if she would have spoken. All that is so long past that it's ridiculous keeping up malice. I wish you would call next time you are in town to ask for the old lady. Poor John's death must have been a sad loss to them. I hear there was some fear that he had left his property away from his mother and sister. But it turned out a false report."

I did not dare to look at Mrs. Merridew to see how she bore it; but her voice replied quite calmly without any break, as if the conversation was on the most ordinary subject, —

"Where did you manage to get so much news?"

"O, from the Amyotts," he said, "who knew all about it. Matilda, you know, poor girl!" (with that half-laugh of odious masculine vanity which I knew in my heart he would be guilty of), "married a cousin of Amyott's, and is getting on very well, they say. But think over my suggestion, Janet. I think at this distance of time it would be graceful on your part to go and call."

"I cannot think they would like to see me, now," she said, in a low voice. Then I ventured to look at her. She was seated in an angular, rigid way, with her shoulders and elbows squared to her work, and the corners of her mouth pursed up, which would have given to any cursory observer the same impression it did to her husband.

"How hard you women are!" he said. "Trust you for never forgiving or forgetting. Poor old lady, I should have thought anybody would have pitied her. But, however, it is none of my business. As for Ellen, she is a very handsome woman, though she is not so young as she once was. I should not wonder if she were to make a good marriage even now. Is it possible, Janet, after being so fond of her, — or pretending to be, how can I tell? — that you would not like to say a kind word to Ellen now?"

"She would not think it kind from me," said Mrs. Merridew, still rigid, never raising her eyes from her work.

"I think she would, but at all events you might try," he said. All her answer was to shake her head, and he went away to his dressing-room shrugging his shoulders and nodding his head in bewildered comments to himself on what he considered the hard-heartedness of woman. As for me, I kept looking at her with sympathetic eyes, thinking that at least she would give herself the comfort of a confidential glance. But she did not. It seemed that she was determined to ignore the whole matter, even to me.

"I wish papa would take as much interest in us poor girls at home as he does in people that don't belong to him," said Janet. "Mamma, I never can piece this to make it long enough. It may do for Marian" (who was her next sister), "but it will never do for me."

"You are so easily discouraged," said Mrs. Merridew. "Let me look at it. You girls are always making difficulties. Under the founce, your piecing, as you call it, will never be seen. Those founces" she added, with a little laugh which I knew was hysterical, "are blessings to poor folks."

"I am sure I don't think there is anything to laugh at," said poor Janet, almost crying, "when you think of Nelly Fortis and all the other girls, with their nice dresses all new and fresh from the dressmaker's, and no trouble; while I have only mamma's old gown, that she wore when she was twenty, to turn, and patch, and piece, — and not long enough after all!"

"Then you should not grow so," said her mother, "and you ought to be thankful that the old fashion has come in again, and my old gown can be of use." But as she spoke she turned round and gave me a look. The tears were in her eyes, and that pucker, O, so deeply marked, in her forehead. I felt she would have sobbed had she dared. And then before my eyes, as, I am sure, before hers, there glided a vision of Ellen Babington in her profound mourning, rustling past Mr. Merridew on the stairs, with heaps of costly crape, no doubt, and that rich black silk with which people console themselves in their first mourning. How could they take it all without a word? The after-pang that comes almost inevitably at the back of a sacrifice was tearing Mrs. Merridew's heart. I felt it go through my own and so I knew. She had done it nobly, but she could not forget that she had done it. Does one ever forget?

And then as I went home I fell into a maze again. Had she a right to do it? To sit at table with that unsuspecting man, and put her arm in his, and be at his side continually, and all the time be false to him. Falsely true! I could not get the words out of my mind.

connection with this, and remembering how comparatively rare, even in France, Italy, and Switzerland, and other goat-producing countries, are the occasions when the traveller encounters kids in any number, that I find myself again and again constrained to ask, O where and O where are your glove-producing kids?

Is it not a fact that there are more fair-haired children to be seen in this country than there used to be? Any one who can find leisure in the early part of the day to visit those portions of our parks and public gardens where children most resort, will infallibly be struck by the great increase in the number of children whose hair is to be classed as belonging to the group of colors which we call "light." Now, we know that fair hair has lately been very much the rage, and we also know that various inventions have been published for taking the natural darkness out of the hair, and imparting to it a flaxen or a golden shade. The use of such medicaments has, however, always been confined to grown-up people, and in none of the recorded instances of that tampering with the natural color of the hair which has been common of late years, have children had any part; so their adaptation to the fashion of the time in this respect would seem to be purely attributable to an obligingness on the part of Dame Nature similar to the politeness of the seals and the philanthropy of the kids.

There was a taste the other day for pug-dogs. Fashion had no sooner issued her mandate on the subject, than behold in all directions there were pugs! The earth appeared to teem with short noses and black muzzles; and any one who wanted a pug (and chose to pay for it) was straightway provided with one of those fascinating animals. Is there any room for doubt that if phoenixes or unicorns were to become the fashion, they would turn up by the score as soon as wanted?

It is not possible that any one, possessed of any reflective power, and being in the habit of frequenting the various kinds of social celebrations, slavery to which forms the principal occupation of a large portion of civilized society can have failed to speculate on the momentous question, Where do all the plovers' eggs come from? They appear at all sorts of meals, — dinners, wedding breakfasts, show luncheons, picnics, evening-party refreshment tables, ball suppers. In all sorts of forms, too, do they appear: nestling in moss, held in bondage caressingly by succulent jelly, pearly and cool, the golden yolk just suggested through the semi-transparent white. Prodigious good they are, in whatever shape presented, but prodigiously mysterious also, in their faculty of turning up in enormous quantities for the London season, and then disappearing with equally strange and inexplicable despatch. Very rarely does one encounter these plovers' eggs except during the London season; and as to the plovers themselves, now and then, in crossing a breezy upland, the pedestrian's attention is caught by their shrill, plaintive cry and their rapid flight round and round his head, as they seek to draw him away from the nest which lies close by; but it is only now and then that the plovers are thus met with, and even where they are thickest, their numbers do not account for those innumerable dishes full of their eggs.

And naturally associated with the plovers' egg difficulty is another: I mean the great champagne mystery. The consumption of this beverage is confined to no particular place, nor to any especial season of the year. Always, everywhere, by everybody, this favorite drink is appreciated. One would think that the supply required for this country alone, and during that one period of the year which we call "the season," would exhaust the produce of all the vineyards the champagne districts can furnish. Let the reader consider the Derby Day, or merely take it in conjunction with the Cup Day at Ascot, and then endeavor to form some dimly approximate notion of the quantity of champagne required. There are those who have seen the champagne dripping through the floors of carriages on Epsom Downs; and even those who have not been favored with that rich experience, but have merely witnessed the ordinary performances during the luncheon hours there, are able to form a tolerably accurate idea of the rate at which champagne disappears on the occasion of those wondrous orgies.

At the Ascot Meeting it is the same story. The same at Goodwood, Doncaster, Newmarket. At all the minor races, at Henley, at every regatta held at Cowes or Ride, or anywhere, and on all those occasions of a more private nature at which we have just seen the dish of plovers' eggs making a goodly appearance, it is again the same. The thought of all the champagne required for England, not to speak of the still greater quantities needed for the supply of Continental capitals, and there not alone for those great festal occasions when royal personages meet together and are entertained at banquets, balls, and the like, but for all the smaller and snuggler meals which come off at restaurants, cafés, hotels, and taverns, — the thought, I say, of all this champagne, and all this society as I may say floating in it, becomes distracting.

But where does that same creamy liquor all come from? We all know that we are expected to swallow a great deal in connection with our wine besides the liquid itself. It requires a most remarkable amount of faith to suppose that those small tracts of land which give their name to the more renowned growths of France and Germany can supply all the cellars throughout Europe. An enigma this, which, with regard to other wines, may be looked upon as simply a difficulty; but which, when champagne is in question, culminates into an impossibility.

The milk and cream, again, supplied twice a day to the inhabitants of England, and for the furnishing of which — since fresh milk cannot be imported from other countries — we are dependent on the resources of the British cows, — the enormous daily yield of this article of consumption is a thing not to be thought of without wonder. Summon before the mind the vast area of London and its suburbs, and remember that in every street, square, place, terrace, court, blind alley, throughout its enormous extent from Highgate and Hornsey in the north, to Camberwell and Dulwich in the south, and from Wimbledon and Putney in the west to Rotherhithe, Hackney, Bow, in the east, the clink of the milk-pail is heard twice every day throughout the year, Sundays included. And all this professes, remember, to be new milk, so that in addition there must be taken into account an entirely separate reservoir of milk set aside for the development of all that mass of cream which is required, at certain times of year, for the supply of the metropolis. What a supply must that be! Think of all the ice-creams sold at all the pastry-cooks' shops besides those which are served up in private houses! Think of all the cream eaten with strawberries, of the cream required for cooking purposes, of the recipes of those great artists who are always directing their disciples to "take a quart of cream," or to, "add a pint of good cream," or "now throw in" a pint or so of cream. And, besides, what becomes of all this supply of milk and cream when it is no longer wanted in the metropolis? On the 30th of June it is required; on the 30th of July it is not. The main body of cream-consumers have by that time left London and are dispersed over the world. Do the cows follow them?

A solution of some of the above-stated difficulties might be afforded by supposing the existence — not a very wide stretch of imagination — of a wholesale system of adulteration. It is possible to make champagne, for instance, and, alas! I fear, milk and cream too, to order; but no manufactory can turn out plovers' eggs to order. And where are the iron works, saw-mills, or galvanized-zinc factories that can contract to supply an unlimited number of sweetbreads, — by the by, another delicacy required, like the plovers' eggs, on a huge scale during the London season, and hardly wanted at other times!

LIFE AND DEATH AT ST. BREACA'S.

IN EIGHT CHAPTERS. CHAPTER IV.

"I DO NOT quite make her out," said Mrs. Monsey to Suzanne; "she is a thorough flirt, and has no one to practise on here but Mr. Secker, unless she has picked up some young lawyer or doctor in the town. I forget how I heard of her."

Suzanne reminded her.

"O yes; but I don't remember what Madame de Montansier said about her. She suits us well enough, at all events, — the children like her, and she amuses them, and does not bore me."

"Can I see Mademoiselle Royer?" was asked a few days later by a bright-looking little elderly man, with a foreign air and accent.

The servant believed so. What name?

"My name would be of no use," said he; "Mademoiselle is unacquainted with me; but will you say that I bring a message from Madame de Coitgourden."

Jeanne, who had started at the announcement, looked alarmed, yet defiant, when she presented herself.

The stranger bowed, and said, "I am le Père Jolivet; I brought a postulant last week from Paris to the convent at St. Petroe, — of which you may have heard. My very good friend, Madame de Coitgourden, desired that I would ascertain personally how you were situated, and if I could be of any service to you. She regrets that she has heard nothing directly from you since you came to England, and you understand that, irrespectively of other motives, she remembers that she is your god-mother."

"Madame de Coitgourden is very good," returned Jeanne, coldly; "but I support myself, and I require nothing."

"Possibly nothing temporal, but Madame thought of probable spiritual difficulties. She has been informed that the Monsey family are Protestant, and that you are cut off from opportunities of practising your religion. St. Petroe's is thirty miles hence, and there is, I know, no direct communication with the place. Madame de Coitgourden has a relative who has been a professed nun there, and much valued, several years. At her request, the Reverend Mother will procure you lodging and every suitable accommodation for a week, whenever you choose to avail yourself of the opportunity to approach the sacraments, and will consider that in so doing she only acquits herself partially of a debt of gratitude to Madame."

"I am overwhelmed with so much condescension," replied Jeanne, petulantly, "but cannot take advantage of it."

"But why not, my child?"

"I do not conceive that I am bound to give my confidence to a stranger."

"A priest accredited by your early benefactress can hardly be regarded as a stranger. Let me have the satisfaction of taking such tidings of you as Madame deserves, and is desirous to have."

"Tell her," said Jeanne, angrily, her eyes flashing, "that the Catholic Church is not popular in England; that no one suspects me of belonging to it; that I do not intend to acknowledge that I ever was a Catholic; that, if I did, this house would be closed against me; that out of it I am, in England, homeless, and that to Paris I will not return. You may say too, if you like, that I have no religion, and that I do not want any."

"Hush! child," said the priest, soothingly; "you are beside yourself. How have you endured life with such a weight of concealment on your heart? You cannot have forgotten all your good early training?"

"I have forgotten everything but that I came into the world to suffer for a man's wickedness and a woman's weakness, — to feel, before I knew this, that I was in some way marked: that I was pitied, patronized: to hate everybody; to resolve to make a position for myself; to have no past; to let no superstition, or, if you like it better, no religion, stand in my way."

"This is mere raving. How do you propose to make a position for yourself? Music might do it, or dancing; but to succeed in either way not only are great natural gifts necessary, but careful and laborious training. Looking at your case for a moment in a purely human point of view, I do not see how your temporal interests are to be served by your forsaking your faith and friends. What, for example, do you gain by living in a remote province with a family who, alas! do not stand well socially? Believe me, my dear child, you make a great mistake. Quærite primum regnum Dei, et justitiam ejus; et hæc omnia adjicieantur vobis." He thought she was softening, and went on more earnestly, "Let me tell Reverend Mother that you will come next week, — nay, I know I may presume to take you back with me; I have a post-chaise at The George; you need not return here at all. There are ladies in the convent connected with some of the first Catholic families in England; they would easily find you a more suitable place than this, and give you shelter till you were provided for; and you might make a little retreat, and recover lost peace, and begin life with new resolutions."

She had kept her eyes fixed on the carpet the last few moments, and better nature was stirring within her. She grasped the truth of the priest's representations; she realized in how utterly heartless an atmosphere she lived, and how insignificant she was. She knew how welcome, how rejoiced over she would be in the convent; but, strengthened by the duplicity she had practised, the demon pride conquered, and she said, "I thought, my father, that I had stated distinctly that I did not want shelter, or spiritual retreat, or patronage, — that I prefer to be as I am. It seems that all human schemes are liable to failure, but I mean to stand by mine. I am sorry you have had so much unnecessary trouble; and you will forgive my reminding you that your visit may be disadvantageous to me. The virtues of Catholic priests are by no means appreciated in England." She stood up; so did he. He looked wistfully, compassionately at her, — his whole demeanor silently besought her to relent. She understood it, and said, "I made my resolution rather more than two years ago, when, to escape from France, I stooped to accept a servant's mediation to procure me the place I hold. I parted with religion on the voyage. A small parcel containing my scapular, beads, and prayer-books is in the sea somewhere between Havre and Southampton."

Her stormy eyes and hard voice seemed to him even worse than her words. With dignity, of which he had looked incapable, he said, "Listen, you unhappy child, to words familiar to your ear in your better days: Qui enim me confusus fuerit, et verba mea, in generatione ista adultera et peccatrice, et filius hominis confundetur eum cum veniret in gloria patris sui cum angelis sanctis; — and may God convert you!"

CHAPTER V.

Mrs. Secker's prepossession against Jeanne increased rapidly as she perceived that she tried to entangle Augustine's affections; just as, before his return, she had laid herself out to attract his father's admiration. She was by no means the wife she would have chosen for her pure-hearted boy, and it was really distressing to have him unsettled just as his prospects were so good. She had no doubt that Mr. Hoskins would do for him as if he were his own son, provided he continued to please him; but he could not contemplate marrying for many years; and this foreigner had it not in her to be the wise, tender, constant friend to whom it is safe to be bound for a long engagement. If she saw any one who would be a better match, she would throw Augustine over, and he would never recover the blow. Yet she, poor mother, could do nothing. With all her heart, Mrs. Secker longed to have the holidays over; and how very hard that was!

It was inevitable that Augustine should be caught. He was trustful and affectionate, and had never been familiar in young ladies' society. Here was a caressing, impulsive young creature, pretty in his sight, a stranger, unprotected, and most unfortunately circumstanced, hanging on his words and looks, telling him, with her great varying dark eyes, that she worshipped him. She could have no interested motive, said he to himself. She knew that he was poor, and that his family were down in the world. In her own selfish, unrefined way, Jeanne did love him; loved him, though in her folly she had resolved to marry for riches, and believed that nothing could be easier in England; loved him, though she intended to rid herself of him if he interfered with her advancement. She had never imagined any feeling so delicious as the certainty that his heart was entirely hers; she could think of nothing so intolerable as his bestowing a thought on another woman. When they parted on the day before his return to Loganstone, a tremendous rush of feeling overpowered every consideration. In a few passionate, hurried words, he implored her to have pity on him, and be true to him forever; and weeping, clinging to him, she told him she lived but in his love. He had never dreamed that for him life could have anything so enchanting. To his prematurely chastened experience, it had seemed as, at the best, to be met with fortitude. He was in a new, vivid, unguessed-at world, while he listened to her fond tones, looked at her glowing face, felt her tears and caresses. How should he tread again his beaten track? Was all the happiness allotted him condensed into that crisis? Thus he questioned, and checked a shiver, even then.

That night Jeanne walked very long in the colonnade. A July full moon shone serenely on the beautiful bay; glow-worms sparkled in the grass. But a few yards from her, the calm deep sea whispered to the rocks below; flowers made the still air fragrant; but the girl's was not a poetic nature, and the delicious influences did not teach her. Brooding over turbid thoughts, she walked to and fro till fatigue compelled her to stop. Leaning against the sill of the schoolroom window, she looked up, and out of herself. Her mind rambled somewhat in this way: "How Augustine would enjoy this! How different we are! I wonder why. We are both young, both unfortunate; but we are no more alike than this calm is to a tempest." She started, for steps were stirring in the house. It was very unusual after midnight. That Mr. Monsey was up great part of the night, was understood; but the room he called his study, and to which he betook himself in the evening, was in a distant part of the house, and she had never met him at night. The door opened, and he came out, intoxicated evidently, and malicious.

"Ah, Mademoiselle, sorry to have disturbed you. Pleasant to be out this fine night. But where's Young Pill-box? Hope I've not frightened him away. Sort of thing is charming; used to be long ago, I know; but not quite proper, is it?"

"I am afraid it is later than I thought it was, Mr. Monsey. I will wish you good-night."

"O, pray, don't. Can I find him for you? Not proper, as I said, but pleasant, very. I never spoil sport. I'm not straight-laced; only thing I'm particular about — hate popery. Had a priest here a few weeks ago; won't stand that sort of thing. Sharp girl, very, — said he was a miner; but post-boy told landlady, — stupid fellow." Angry and terrified, she passed him, and went to her room.

Three months later, haggard and weary, Augustine presented himself late one evening before his startled mother. His first words were; "Is my father in?" and his next "Thank God, that he is not! for I am come home in disgrace, — ruined, perhaps."

The sweet eyes fixed on him expressed the fullest trust and sympathy, and it was no shrinking from increased temporal trouble, but deep affection, that made her voice tremble as she said: "Never mind, my own child; I'm sure it's not your fault. Don't hurry to tell me, if it distresses you."

"But I must tell you before my father comes, if possible. Perhaps you have guessed that I am engaged to Jeanne Royer. I could not tell you sooner, because I knew you did not think well of her, and I cannot bear even a look that blames her, poor darling! Her lot is indeed hard, and excitement about her has worn me terribly. Her letters have been full of complainings, and a week ago one of them drove me nearly mad. She hinted that impertinence from that old ruffian Monsey was added to her troubles; that she ought not to remain in his house, yet knew not what to do." He paused, drew a long breath, and set his teeth firmly together. "Of course, I have been utterly unfit for my work. I directed medicine wrong twice on Tuesday. Mr. Hoskins made the best of it, and implored me to be careful. Yesterday, I sent an ounce of laudanum to old Mrs. Penruddock, instead of a black dose; and if she had not known the smell, of course she would have taken it, and died. Nothing could be kinder than the Hoskineses. She cried; and he said he would rather have lost his little finger, but that there was no help for it; that not only was his practice in danger, but the patients' lives were; that whatever came of it afterwards, for the present I must leave him. So here I am, as if you have not enough to bear with-out this."

She had stood behind him, that if her countenance expressed anguish, he might not see it; and she had passed her fingers soothingly through his bright curls, and sometimes laid her cheek on his head while he was speaking. When he had done, she drew him close to her bosom, and they wept together; but she felt that her indignation against Jeanne exceeded her pity for her child. She wished for a moment that she could hate her without sinning, but all she said was, "Let us thank God, dear, that there is nothing worse, and try to bear it meekly, and hope for the best. Go to bed before your father comes. I will bring you tea. You are really ill, and I will tell him so, and all —"

"But he will storm at you, — say it's all your fault, perhaps."

"Never mind; I do not really care. I used to be afraid of him; I'm not now; and he is so uncertain, that he may take quite a different view."

And so it proved. He expressed nothing but sympathy for Augustine, and evaporated whatever indignation he felt in the subjoined note to Mr. Monsey: —

"DEAR SIR, — When I allowed myself to become a frequent guest at your table, I did not suspect that degradation of my family was involved in the acceptance of your hospitalities, and that the blandishments of a French governess were designed to ruin my son's prospects. He is dismissed from the honorable though humble post which his father's misfortunes made of moment to him, and he is come to add to the burden that presses on his mother's heart. While I congratulate you and your tool on the success of your manœuvres, I beg to have it distinctly understood that my door is closed against you and every member of your household. A poor incumbent may possess the feelings of a gentleman, though he is not the younger son of a James's baronet. I remain, dear sir, yours truly, MARCUS SECKER."

When Mr. Monsey had read the note, he went to find his wife, and sent for Jeanne. "You had better get rid of her, perhaps," he said. "I do not care much about this, whatever it may mean, though I think the girls ought to have a steady person. But she's a concealed papist, — and I have an objection to that sort of thing."

"I do not care whether she goes or stays, but I must have some one; and the children are used to her, and fond of her, and I don't know where to get any one else."

"Where did you get her?"

"Suzanne found her out."

"The deuce she did! I did not know that."

"I don't suppose you cared. Suzanne heard of her from her sister, who is Madame de Montansier's maid. This girl was a protégée of Madame de Montansier's. She has done very well."

"I never liked her."

"No; you don't think her pretty. I do."

When Jeanne entered, pale and hard, Mrs. Monsey began "Mr. Monsey has had a very extraordinary letter from Mr. Secker, from which it appears that his son is in some trouble, and that it is your fault. Mr. Monsey wishes to know if you have anything to say which we ought to know." Jeanne seemed unable to speak; and Mrs. Monsey continued; "Of course a person in your position is required to be steady; and though Mr. Secker is half mad, there must be some ground for so very strange a letter as he has written."

"You'd better make a clean breast of it, mademoiselle," said Mr. Monsey, with a touch of the manner which had been so offensive one night in the colonnade. "Mr. Secker desires that you will not enter his house again."

She stood at bay; her hands crossed and tightly clasped, resting on the table, her eyes darkening, her frame quivering. Mr. and Mrs. Monsey looked at her curiously. At last she spoke, very hoarsely, "It seems to me, madame, that I have nothing to say, unless I know the charge against me."

"You may read the note," said Mr. Monsey, giving it to her.

How she had longed for it! not venturing to hope for it. Was that all? Why, it was a triumph! There was a man in the world who had sacrificed everything for her! What signified anything else? Vanity, intensely gratified, sent the blood to her face, raised her head, and strengthened her voice. "I am not ashamed of loving and being loved," she said, firmly.

"But your 'loving and being loved,' as you call it," uttered Mrs. Monsey, pettishly, "ought to have been better managed, so as not to bring impertinent letters on us. Besides, I have a great regard for Mr. Secker, and I do not choose to have him annoyed by any one in my house."

"I can only say, madame, that I do not know what Mr. Secker means, but that I am affianced to his son."

Mr. Monsey left the room whistling.

"You are very foolish," went on Mrs. Monsey. "If even the young man does not change his mind, — and of course he will, — he has not a chance of marrying for years, and I am not surprised that his father is angry. You must understand that I do not choose my daughters to be made aware of this exceedingly silly affair. The longer young ladies are kept ignorant of such things, the better."

Jeanne longed to laugh mockingly, and her lip curled as she replied, "Madame may rely on my respecting their simplicity. May I go now, madame?"

"Yes. I don't think I've anything more to say at present."

Mr. Monsey wrote: —

"MY DEAR SIR, — I am at a loss to infer more from your note than that my amiable young friend Augustine is in some difficulty. Well, 'boys will be boys,' and we were boys ourselves once. I hope there will be nothing to prevent his coming with you to dine with us to-morrow. Yours, very truly, is quite a different person from her mother. But I will do nothing against Mrs. Merridew's will."

ARTHUR MONSEY."

And so I left them to consult over their own affairs. I had been thrust into it against my own will; but still it was entirely their affair, and no business of mine.

Mrs. Spencer and Lady Isabella called to me from their lawn as I went out to ask how Mrs. Merridew was, and shook their heads over her.

"She should have the doctor," said Mrs. Spencer.

"But the doctor would not pay her bills for her," said Lady Isabella.

And I had to answer meekly, as if I knew nothing about it, "I don't think it is her bills."

This conversation detained me some time from my own house; and when I reached my cottage; my maid stood by the gate, looking out for me, shading her eyes with her hands. It was to tell me there was a lady waiting for me in the drawing-room,—"A tall lady in mourning." And in a moment my heart smote me for some hard thoughts, and I knew who my visitor was.

"You don't know me," she said. "I have no right to come to you; but once you came to—us—with Mrs. Merridew. Perhaps you remember me now? I am Ellen Babington. I want to speak to you about—my brother's will. You may have heard that I have just lost—"

"Yes," I said. "I am very sorry. If there is anything I can do—"

"You can do all that I want from any one," she said. "Janet will never believe that I wanted to keep the money—now. I have seen all her children to-day at church; and I think, if she had been there, I should perhaps have been able,—but never mind. Tell her I should like—if she would give her daughter Janet something out of the money,—from me. She is a little like what her mother was. I am sure you are kind to them. I don't even know your name—"

"Mrs. Musgrave," I said; and she gave a little bow. She was very composed, very well-bred, terribly sad; with the look of a woman who had no more to do in the world, and who yet was, Heaven help her! in the middle of her life, full of vigor, and capability, and strength.

"Will you tell Janet, please, that it is all settled?" she said. "I mean, not the girl Janet, but her mother. Tell her I have settled everything. I believe she will hear from the lawyers to-morrow; but I could not let it come only from the lawyers. I cannot forgive her, even now. She thinks it is Matilda she has wronged; but it is me she has wronged, taking my brother from me, my only brother, after all these years. But never mind. I kissed the little child instead to-day—the quite little one, with the gold hair. I suppose she is the youngest. Tell her I came on purpose to see them before I went away."

"But why send this message through me?" I said; "come and see her. I will take you; it is close by. And the sight of you will do her more good—more good than the money. Come, and let her explain."

I thought she hesitated for a moment, but her only answer was a shake of her head.

"What could she explain?" she cried, with strange impetuosity. "He and I had been together all our lives, and yet all the while he cared nothing for his sister and everything for her. Do you think I can ever forgive her? but I never forgot her. I don't think I ever loved any one so well in my life."

"O, come and tell her so," said I.

Again she shook her head. "I loved her as well as I loved him; and yet I hate her," she said. "But tell her I spoke to her Janet, and I kissed her baby; and that I have arranged everything with the lawyers about poor John's will. I am sure you are a good woman. Will you shake hands with me for the children's sake before I go?"

Her voice went to my heart. I had only seen her once in my life before, but I could not help it. I went up to her and took her two hands, and kissed her; and then she, the stranger, broke down, and put her head on my shoulder and wept. It was only for a moment, but it bound us as if for our lives.

"Where are you going?" I asked, when she went away.

"I am going abroad with some friends," she said, hurriedly.

"Most likely I shall never come back," she said, hastily, and then went away alone out of my door, alone across the green, with her veil over her face and her black dress repulsing the sunshine. One's sympathies move and change about like the winds. I had been so sorry for Mrs. Merridew an hour ago; but it was not her I was most sorry for now.

And this was how it all ended. I was always glad that Mrs. Merridew had told her husband before the letter came next morning. And they got the money; and John went to the university, and Janet had new dresses and new pleasures, and a ring, of which she was intensely proud, according to Ellen's desire. I dare say Ellen's intention was that something much more important should have been given to the child in her name; but then Ellen Babington, being an unmarried woman, did not know how much a large family costs, nor what urgent occasion there is for every farthing, even with an addition so great as five hundred a year.

I am afraid it did not make Mrs. Merridew much happier just at first. She wrote letters wildly, far and near, to everybody who could be supposed to know anything about Ellen; and wanted to have her to live with them, and to share the money with her, and I don't know how many other wild fancies. But all that could be found out was that Ellen had gone abroad. And by degrees the signs of this strange tempest began to disappear,—smoothed out and filled up as Nature smooths all traces of combat. The scars heal, new verdure covers the sudden precipice,—the old gets assimilated with the new. By degrees an air of superior comfort stole over the house, which was very consolatory. Selina, the housemaid, married, and Richards retired to the inevitable greengrocery. And with a new man and new maids, and so much less difficulty about the bills, it is astonishing how the puckers died away from Mrs. Merridew's forehead,—first one line went and then another, and she grew younger in spite of herself. And with everything thus conspiring in her favor, and habit calmly settling to confirm all, is it wonderful if by and by she forgot that any wonderful accident had ever happened, and that all had not come in the most natural way, and with the most pleasant consequences in the world?

The other day I saw in a chance copy of Galig-nani, which came to me in a parcel from Paris, the marriage of Ellen Babington to a Frenchman there; but that is all we have ever heard of her. Whether it is a good marriage or a bad one I don't know; but I hope, at least, it is better for her than being all alone, as she was when she left my house that day in June, having made her sacrifice in her turn. If things had but taken their natural course, how much unnecessary suffering would have been spared: Mrs. Merridew is, perhaps, happier now than she would have been without that five hundred a year; but of course they spend more; and I don't know that they are to be called richer on the whole; but for two years she was wretched, sacrificing and grudging the sacrifice, and making herself very unhappy. And though I don't believe Ellen Babington cared for the money, her heart will never be healed of that pang of bitterness which her brother's desertion gave her. His companion for twenty years! and to think his best thoughts should have been given all that time to a woman who had only slighted him, and refused his love. Mrs. Merridew does not see the sting of this herself; she thinks it natural. And so I dare say would half the world beside.

WHERE DO SOME THINGS COME FROM ?

It is not difficult to understand that things made of wood and stone and metal, of which the supply is virtually unlimited, as well as fabrics of cotton, muslin, gauze, and wool, should be turned out as fast as they are wanted. It is comprehensible, too, that such developments of silk and satin and velvet as may hit the humor of the moment should be forthcoming, in a degree commensurate with the requirements of the public: though this is less easy to understand when one reflects that the whole supply is due to the exertions of a finite number of small caterpillars. The multiplication of objects, the material for constructing which is practically unlimited, is tolerably comprehensible; but what seems unaccountable is the extraordinary way in which certain products of nature — animal, vegetable, and mineral — seem to rush into existence on the shortest notice, whenever a demand for them springs up.

How wonderfully accommodating — to take an instance — has Nature proved of late years in connection with the increased prolificness of the Seal Tribe, or at any rate that portion of it which furnishes the material that goes by the name of seal-skin! It is only within the last dozen years or so, that this particular kind of fur has become furiously popular. It is marvellous to observe how strangely, within that comparatively short time, the supply has increased and multiplied also. A few years ago, a seal-skin cloak was an uncommon garment, a rarity: whereas, now, during the whole of the autumn and winter seasons, we are so surrounded by all sorts of seal-skin garments — cloaks jackets, waistcoats, hats, caps, muffs, tippets, and the like: not to speak of cigar-cases, purses, tobacco-pouches, blotting-books, and other miscellaneous objects — that we might suppose seal-skin to be not merely, as Jaques said of Motley "Your only wear," but your only decorative fabric available for any purpose whatsoever. For, look where one may, it is still seal-skin, seal-skin, seal-skin, everywhere. On the shoulders of ladies; on the breasts of the lords of creation; in the shop-windows; in the circulars which are thrust into our letter-boxes, announcing a consignment of ever so many thousand seal-skin jackets; in the advertisement sheets of the newspapers, from the Times Supplement to the columns of the Exchange and Mart, — in which last journal the yearnings of humanity after seal-skin, and its readiness to barter all other property, of whatsoever kind, in exchange for this idolized fur, are more touchingly expressed than in any other, — under each and all of these aspects the seal-skin rage is continually kept before us.

But the supply with which this phocal rage is appeased is the marvellous thing. How is it that such supply has suddenly come into existence? Or, was it always there, though there was no demand? Has the genus phoca been wearing seal-skin jackets ever since the creation, retaining unmolested their possession of those priceless wares through countless ages; or has this obliging tribe of animals increased in numbers of late years, out of readiness to gratify the caprice of the fashionable world?

Then there are the kids again, — what shall we say of the kids? If it be matter of wonder where all the seals come from, how much more wonderful, how stupefying and stunning, is the thought of the myriads of young goats, whose existence is absolutely necessary to furnish the gloves of the whole civilized world? Kids! How is it that there exist six yards of ground anywhere, without kids browsing thereon? One would expect that the earth would be teeming and swarming with kids. In every town in England, in France, in Europe, gloves made of what at least professes to be the skin of the kid are exposed for sale; while in the large capitals the number of shops devoted exclusively to the diffusion of kid gloves is almost incredible. Taking Paris and London alone, and occupying ourselves only with a few of the principal thoroughfares, we should find enough of such shops to suggest the existence somewhere of such flocks of kids as would overrun at least all the pasture lands of the civilized earth. How many such shops are there in the Palais Royal, the Boulevards, the Rue de Rivoli, the Rue de la Paix; how many in Regent Street, Oxford Street, Bond Street, the Strand, Cheapside, and Piccadilly? How many in other great capitals? How many in South America, how many in Australia, how many in New Zealand? If we take the trouble to enter on the field of conjecture which is thus opened out before us, we shall be cast out in imagination on immeasurable unknown prairies where the foot of man has never trod (except to capture kids), and where skipping kids disport themselves in such prodigious numbers, that the American herd of buffaloes who took six weeks to pass a man in a ditch at full gallop, would be as an every-day drove in the comparison.

that eminent casuist, held, "It is not in the lie going from us, but in its coming to us that our honor is injured." Without precisely agreeing with that "great man," I wish to point out some of the delicacies and intricacies of the art, and lay before you the opinions of some of our deep thinkers thereon. If men will lie, it is a pity that they should not do so with more of method and decency than at present. My object in this elementary sketch is simply to call attention to a science which men bungle in practising from neglecting to study.

Man is born a liar. The child must be taught to speak the truth. Few people, I presume, can contravert that axiom. The nature of the generality of children is, in the first instance, to conceal fault by falsehood. This is eradicated, or supposed to be, by a system of punishments and rewards. A man may be born a poet, musician, &c., education may make him a shoemaker, stonemason, or what not. But, say, born a poet he continues a poet; then he assiduously cultivates the gift with which he was born. If the liar intend to continue a liar, it would be as well that he also should cultivate his birthright.

Now, what are the chief attributes of success in this most delicate art? Quickness of observation and great natural assurance are important accessories; but to be an eminent liar, fecundity of imagination must be exceeded only by tenacity of memory. Memory! yes, without memory no man will ever be a great liar. All men of genius who have considered the subject, and may have, lay enormous stress upon this point.

"Memory in a liar is no more than needs," saith Fuller; while Junius has it, "The language of truth is uniform and consistent; to depart from it with safety requires memory and discretion."

Before going into the question of the many ramifications of the art of lying, I would just call the attention to the difference between a lie and an untruth. Some people fall into the error of supposing them synonymous; but that this is not the case is, I think, well laid down by Montaigne, who says, "To tell an untruth is to tell a thing that is false, but which we ourselves believe to be true"; but a genuine lie is to tell a thing that is false "going against the conscience," that is, knowingly. He goes on to observe, that a pure lie, evolved entirely from the fancy of the narrator, is less liable to detection than a "lie of exaggeration"; inasmuch as in the latter the teller's memory must always have to contend with his recollection of the true story, and in repetition the original facts will be deeper engraved on his memory than his own embellishments. What memory can be sufficient to retain so many different shapes as they have forged upon one and the same subject. Here, again, we see the stress laid upon memory, for in retailing the "lie of exaggeration" to several people, if these once come together and compare notes and find out the cheat, what becomes of this fine art?"

Though Montaigne, in his essay, professes so great a contempt for "lying," yet I think that term "fine art" shows that he had a sneaking regard for it. Moreover, his lament over his want of memory proves that he was painfully aware of his own inability to become a successful liar.

Lord Hervey has laid down, —

"Whoever would lie usefully should lie seldom."

No doubt. Nothing can be so fatal as the habitual practice of the science to a man who intends to succeed in it. The cleverest of liars must be soon exposed if he resorts to it on all occasions. Retentive memories are detective police to liars. No great artist, therefore, would imperil his reputation by continual practise of his art. If conjurers were to display their sleight of hand on all occasions, their tricks would be no longer mysteries. It is mere bunglers or neophytes who would transgress such an approved rule. The past master would never be guilty of such an indiscretion. He would be aware no memory could keep pace with it, and that he must be shortly as much covered with confusion as Mr. Charles Matthews for his "poetical prose."

"Many a man's tongue shakes out his master's undoing."

So far we have been considering the lie as a whole. Let us now look into a few of the ramifications of that numerous family. There is, for example, the white lie, the lie indicative, the lie romantic, the lie given; commercial lies, religious lies, political lies, lovers' lies, literary lies, &c. &c.; to enumerate them all would be impossible. We must content ourselves with a glance at a few of the most prominent species.

The white lie. It is a question whether this can be called a lie, that depends a little upon the tenderness of the utterer's conscience: —

"What harm in lying if you mean no harm?
But say 't is perjury, then Hobson quakes;
He'll none of perjury."

It is the lie of society, and is simply a conventionalism to avoid plain speaking, in this polished age termed rudeness. "Not at home" is merely a suppression of "to you," quite justifiable. "Previous engagement" means "think your dinner a bore," and so on. I need scarcely say this branch requires but little science, but all-important memory is still requisite. For instance, you refuse the B.'s invitation to dinner on Thursday, on plea of severe indisposition. A week afterwards you meet Mrs. B., and during your raptures over Lucca she discovers that it was on the evening of her dinner-party that you heard that divine songstress. If she lets you see that you are detected, your imagination is all that is left you to depend on; but, rely upon it, imagination will extricate you but clumsily, if at all, from the scrape want of memory has brought about.

The lie indicative is the very highest branch of the science, only attained by the greatest artists after long and laborious study. I can hardly explain it better than by an aphorism of Palgrave's, who apparently found it existing in great perfection in Arabia: —

"To say nothing and yet lie is an art well known and practised throughout Aared."

To lie by a shrug of the shoulders, a raising of the eyebrows, a smile, a gesture, — this indeed is the culmination of the science: —

"Stab with a frown
And smile a reputation down."

But the lie indicative, though much may be done pantomimically, is by no means dependent on that only. Under this head comes the uttering of words in such manner that your hearer shall place a wrong construction on them. I will give an illustration of what I mean.

A certain nobleman, though verging on three-score, still affected extreme youth. Thanks to padding, wig, false teeth and dyed whiskers, he flattered himself that, to the eyes of the world, he yet stood at five-and-thirty. One day it was his misfortune to encounter one of those dreadful creatures — boisterous in manner, retentive in memory — who, in the first overwhelming rush of their noisy greeting, are apt to remark how gray you have grown, and wonder whether you have quite got over that little affair with Miss Smith. This monster, a stout, florid, gray-headed man, looking fifty-five every day, had been at school with Lord D—. Shaking him vehemently by the hand, he exclaimed, —

“How are you, D—? I have n’t seen you since I was your fag at Harrow.”

Lord D— drew himself up. He was an artist of la première force, and the lie he had acted so many years kept him in continual practice.

“I was always,” he replied, “reckoned extremely like my father.”

Observe the beauty of this. He commits himself to nothing; no failure of memory can betray him. While, “Pardon, it was my father with whom you were at Harrow,” would not have sounded any clearer to the bystanders. A clumsier but more every-day specimen of the lie indicative may be conveyed in the following: —

A. Nice fellow, C—; met him for the first time, last night, at dinner.

B. Ye-e-es. It’s a great pity that — (stops and stares at A).

A. (impatiently.) That what? Is there anything against him?

B. (quickly.) O no; only, — I thought you knew.

A. No; tell me; what is it, — anything wrong?

B. O dear, no! Nothing. Don’t ask me any questions. O no! I know nothing against him. Very worthy fellow, I dare say. Glad you like him.

A will probably wring no more from B, but at the same time go away quite convinced that C has figured disgracefully in the Divorce Court, been suspected of murder, taken up for forgery, or something equally heinous.

The indicative lie is of very common practice in society, though such artists as Lord D— are rare.

We now come to the lie romantic. The followers of this school use a far broader canvas, and must necessarily be imbued with great powers of imagination. I would lay less stress on memory here than in any other branch of the science, although none requires it more. But the fact is, it is hopeless to suppose any memory could possibly suffice a dashing practitioner of the florid school. Yet without dash you must content yourself with mediocrity in this line, and cannot aspire to higher honors. Sportsmen, travellers, more especially old Indians, affect the romantic lie; generally, by their carelessness of detail, appearing quite reckless of detection. In short, audacity of imagination and assurance I should conceive to be the highest attributes of the romantic liar. At best it is but an inferior branch of the science, as all thorough artists would be hurt at detection; in this school so common. Still, I must give an instance. One of the best I recollect, though perhaps rather too well known, is as follows. “Bluster told it me with his own lips.”

“It was in the West Indies, many years ago, a rather curious thing happened to me. I was out shooting humming-birds with a pistol. I had shot two or three, and was coming up the edge of the stream, some twenty feet across, when on the opposite side I espied a splendid specimen sitting on a bush. As I was about to fire, my foot slipped; down I came, and my pistol, escaping from my grasp, fell into the water. Though the stream was only some four feet deep, all my efforts to recover it were useless, and I trudged home without it. About that time next year I was fishing on the same spot, and caught a very fine barracouta. On opening it I found my pistol in its stomach. I was musing on the remarkable coincidence when, happening to raise my head, I saw a humming-bird sitting in the same identical bush as last year. Mechanically I raised my pistol and pulled the trigger. By Jove, sir, the pistol went off, and the bird fell dead. I don’t mean to say it was the same bird; but it was a remarkable coincidence.” For bold coloring that is hard to beat, and it requires some assurance to tell it as “a fact.”

The lie given has come into vogue considerably more since duelling has gone out. In former days the expression, “It’s a lie, sir,” meant a good deal, and the gentleman using it might expect to be called up betimes in the morning. This can hardly be called within the province of the science, and I only touch upon it to show the magnificent gradations laid down regarding it by Touchstone, in “As You Like It.”

“I did dislike the cut of a certain courtier’s beard; he sent me word, if I said his beard was not cut well, he was in the mind it was: This is called the Retort courteous. If I sent him word again, it was not well cut, he would send me word, he cut it to please himself: This is called the Quip modest. If again, it was not well cut, he disabled my judgment: This is called the Reply churlish. If again, it was not well cut, he would answer, I spake not true: This is called the Reproof valiant. If again, it was not well cut, he would say, I lie: This is called the Countercheck quarrelsome, and so to the Lie circumstantial, and the Lie direct.

“Jacques. And how oft did you say his beard was not well cut?

“Touchstone. I durst go no further than the Lie circumstantial.”

However, these days are gone by, and if anybody goes further than the “Lie circumstantial” with you, you had better ask a police magistrate, or inquire of Parliament, what steps you are to take, — unless, by good fortune, you can knock the utterer down.

The commercial lie opens a vast and profitable field for the practitioner, and is consequently much in vogue. Lord Herbert’s axiom of “Whoever would lie usefully should lie seldom” must be in this case read “should lie continually.” From the mantles ticketed 14s. 6d. very large, with the £1 put in very small, thus $\frac{1}{14s./6d.}$, in the shops of the retailers, to the gigantic swindles of joint-stock companies, lie, — lie, — keep on lying. Who does not know the story of the great banker, who for upwards of twenty years lived a lie; who, from the time he entered the old established firm, knew it was all a rotten sham; who by his desperate energies for years upheld the tottering edifice, passing all the time for a wealthy man, no one suspecting him? This man, though living this stupendous lie, yet possessing a keen conscience, and strict notions of honor and probity. Suffering for years the tortures of the damned, with a smiling brow, and every token of prosperity. A liar from force of circumstances. Finally, after superhuman exertions, seeing the whole edifice topple over amidst shrieks of execration at his dishonesty, and then, broken down by his disgrace, sinking into his grave with the epitaph of "Splendide mendax."

Religious lies are a subject too delicate to do more than touch on. Tennyson has given us so perfect a picture of a liar of this class, that I cannot do better than let him speak for me. You may, doubtless, know it well, but there is no need of apology for putting it once more before you:—

"Show me the books:

He dodged me with a long and loose account.
'The books, the books,' but he, he could not wait,
Bound on a matter he of life and death:
When the great books (see Daniel seven and ten)
Were opened, I should find he meant me well;
And then began to boast himself, and ooze
All over with the fat affectionate smile
That makes the widow lean,—'my dearest friend,
Have faith, have faith,—we live by faith,' said he;
'And all things work together for the good
Of those,'—it makes me sick to quote him,—last,
Gript my hand hard, and with God bless you went.
I stood like one that had received a blow;
I found a hard friend in his loose accounts,
A loose one in the hard grip of his hand,
A curse in his God-bless-you; then my eyes
Pursued him down the street, and far away,
Among the honest shoulders of the crowd,
Read rascal in the motions of his back,
And scoundrel in the supple-sliding knee."

Political lies are generally described under the more delicate term of "Change of convictions," or "Change of opinions." When the honorable member for Stoke Pogis, six weeks after his election, votes diametrically opposite to the views he expressed on the hustings, his astonished constituents are informed that he has undergone "political conversion." When a party having steadily opposed certain measures for many years, suddenly finding themselves in power, not only propose to carry them, but to carry them to greater lengths than their original projectors, it is termed "Change of convictions." As that great politician "Mr. Jonathan Wild" says, "What can be more ridiculous than for gentlemen to quarrel about hate?" In this particular branch of the science memory is undoubtedly much required, since your auditors, by reference to "Hansard," can always ascertain to what extent your imagination has carried you on any subject. But then, this artificial aid to memory is also at your command, and if honorable members only looked back to see what they had said before, it would be oftentimes better for many of them. Too lively an imagination is the thing most to be guarded against in this line.

"All is fair in love, war, or diplomacy." What can I say about lovers' lies then? It is a question, I think, whether they should be termed lies at all. Under the influence of the soft fascination we say so much more than we mean, that they might be termed the ravings of mild insanity.

"The debts we make by plighted vows Bear heaviest interest ever."

In the whole science there is no part of it so universally favored and practised as this. It is sometimes confounded with that branch I have denominated "white lies"; but this, I need scarcely say, is a mistake. No need here of placing any check on the imagination. You cannot, on the contrary, give too free a rein to it. The two great points in this portion of the science are assurance and memory. The necessity of assurance is evident to the merest tyro.

But memory, at the first blush, does not appear quite so evident. We must bear in mind that utterers of these lies are generally extensive practitioners. I have known more than one awkward situation from a slight deficiency on this point. A young friend of mine, leaning, let us say, over the balustrade of a moonlit terrace, had arrived at the most sentimental point of a flirtation. The lady was listening most graciously to the soft nothings he was murmuring in her ear. His arm stole round her not unwilling waist, her glossy tresses swept his cheek. "Dearest Jessie," he whispered,—it was like a match to a magazine; in a second she had wrenched herself free,—stood for a moment with flashing eyes:—

"I am sorry for your mistake. You had better go back to your Jessie!" she exclaimed at last, and turning abruptly away she swept down the terrace.

Her name was Annie. He had had a flirtation with a Jessie the year before and she knew it.

Then, do we not promise tickets for this or that, and occasionally forget to send them? Get talking down stairs after supper, and forget Chloe is waiting to be claimed for the valise which we swore an hour ago was the only thing we deemed worth staying for?

But the most confounding case I ever heard of in the whole course of my experience was that of two very handsome twin sisters so like that only those who knew them intimately could tell them apart. They used to go out dressed alike, from each flower on their robes to each turn of their silky tresses, and made it a rule to dance promiscuously with each other's partners. Many a cavalier was covered with confusion, after making desperate running, by the laughing, "I am afraid you take me for my sister." Memory and everything else, unless, perhaps, assurance, was useless in this case. Fancy the confidences of those sisters after a ball, and their strictures upon young men generally.

Of literally lies there have been many. Passing over the forgeries of Ireland and Chatterton, I cannot help bursting forth into a shout of admiration for that arch-liar Sterne. I am not about to speak of his domestic delinquencies, though his letters to his wife and "darling Lydia," while he was carrying on that little Platonic arrangement with Mrs. Draper, showed him a most consummate master of the art. No, let us judge him by his works. Great genial, audacious plunderer that he was. He emptied whole pages of musty old Burton into his Tristram Shandy. His blank chapters were a trick taken from Dr. Fludd. I, for one, reverence him for all. Pshaw! we should never have gone delving into Burton for the fun so deliciously served up to us in Tristram. His stolen jewelry would never have been seen by many, but for the theft; and where should we have found any one who so thoroughly understood the setting of the stones as Laurence Sterne?

According to De Quincey, Suetonius should be looked on as the father of lies, and he proves his case in this wise:—

"All anecdotes, I fear, are false. All dealers in anecdote are tainted with mendacity. Rarer than the phoenix is that virtuous man who will consent to lose a prosperous anecdote on the consideration that it happens to be a lie. All history, therefore, being built partly, and some of it altogether, on anecdote, must be a tissue of falsehoods. Such, for the most part, is the history of Suetonius."

Having thus arrived at who was the father of lies with a reservation, I presume, in favor of his Satanic majesty, it is further interesting to observe that all historians are more or less members of the guild.

Pursuing the subject of anecdotes further, De Quincey continues: "Every memorable propos, pointed repartee, or striking mot circulated as Talleyrand's, was ascribed, in 1814-15, at the Congress of Vienna, to the Prince de Ligne. Fifty years earlier many of the same mots were ascribed to that same Prince de Ligne, then a young man. Twenty or thirty years earlier still they had been ascribed to Voltaire, and so on regressively to many other wits, until, at length, if you persist in backing far enough, you find yourself among pagans with the very same repartee, &c., doing duty in pretty good Greek."

"What do I infer from this? Why, that upon any solution of the case, hardly one worthy saying can be mentioned, hardly one jest, pun, or sarcasm, which has not been the occasion and subject of many falsehoods, as having been au- (and men) diciously transferred from generation to generation. Sworn to in every age as this man's property or that man's, by people who must have known they were lying, until you retire from the investigation with a conviction that, under any system of chronology, the science of lying is the only one that has never drooped."

The author of the "School for Scandal" must have understood the art of lying to perfection. Observe the subtlety of that wonderful comedy. Joseph Surface, the indicative liar; Lady Sneerwell, Sir Benjamin and Crabtree, liars exaggerative of the highest type. No signboard daubers these, but sending forth little finished miniatures of art; the lie of exaggeration, with just a soupeçon of the romantic in it. Look at Sir Lucius, in "The Rivals," a finished specimen of the liar of romance, Hark at that enthusiast, Fag:—

"A lie is nothing unless one supports it. Whenever I draw upon my invention for a good current lie, I always forge indorsements as well as the bill."

I must now introduce one more specimen of the lie romantic, though it hardly comes under the head of literary lies. It was copied into The Times some three years ago from a colonial paper, and is, I think, as fine a specimen of that florid school as I ever met with. It is a Cape story:—

"A Mr. Nel had been annoyed for some time by baboons on his farm, and took his gun one morning with a view of shooting a few of these depredators. On descending a kloof, he was surprised to see a dead bluebok, and, at a short distance farther, another dead buck of a different species. Looking cautiously round, he spied a large tiger in a bush close at hand, and, raising his gun to his shoulder, he fired. The shot only grazed one of the brute's paws, and the infuriated animal at once sprang on his assailant, who was knocked to the ground, and his gun forced out of his hand. Nel, seeing it was a struggle for life, courageously grappled with his foe, and, being uppermost at the commencement of the struggle, endeavored by main force to hold the tiger by the ears,—not bad that! A blow from one of the tiger's paws, however, convinced Nel he had overrated his strength, as he was driven back some distance, when the tiger again closed with him and fastened on his right shoulder, bringing him to the earth this time undermost. Fortunately the blow knocked Nel to the spot where he had first dropped his gun, and, summoning all his force and resolution to his aid, he managed to lay hold of his weapon with his left hand, his right arm being powerless. The tiger still held Nel with his teeth, and was making great havoc with his body; but Nel, getting his gun (fortunately a double-barrelled one) against the body of his fierce antagonist, while the latter still retained his hold, managed to pull the trigger of the remaining barrel with his teeth. The shot told; the tiger rolled over dead, and Nel was saved."

Leave out the tiger, and, in a quiet smoking-room, just pull a trigger with your teeth, if you can.

And now let me tell you what Lord Hervey, who was a great connoisseur in the science,—so great, indeed, that I fear we must look upon those amusing memoirs of the reign of George II. as but a pleasant work of fiction,—says on the subject of a very eminent artist in this walk,—no less a person than Queen Caroline, the wife of George II.:—

"She was generally saying what she did not think, assenting to what she did not believe, and praising what she did not approve; for they (i. e. herself and the King) were seldom of the same opinion, and he too fond of his own for her ever, at first, to dare to controvert it. She used to give him her opinion as jugglers do a card, by changing it imperceptibly, and making him believe that he held the same with that he had first pitched upon."

Evidently the indicative power of the highest type.

Hear what he contemptuously remarks of a sad bungler in the art, to wit, the Prince of Orange:—
"He was as false as his capacity would allow."

One can fancy Hervey's scorn for such a shallow deceiver. And now, like all liars of experience, I must, before I finish, quote a severe philippic against the noble science from the pen of Mr. Carlyle. Your adroit liar ever affects the greatest possible candor, and presents the case to you on the other side by the indicative process, so that you may read it in his favor. "No lie you can speak or act but it will come, after longer or shorter circulation, like a bill drawn of nature's reality, and be presented there for payment, with answer, 'No effects.' Pity only that it often had so long a circulation: that the original forger were so seldom he who bore the blame." You see that, though Mr. Carlyle professes no sympathy with the science, he promises immunity to the artist, though not to the bungler who fails to pass the base coin.

It is time to stop. I think I may modestly claim to have shown some proficiency in the art. Have I not, under pretence of writing an article, given you a mere mélange of other men's thoughts, perverting them to suit my own purposes, after the manner of that arch high-priest of mendacity, Laurence Sterne?

One word of advice: bearing in mind the qualities necessary for success in this difficult walk, imagination, memory, assurance, quickness of observation, and resource, let me paraphrase the American humorist, and observe, "That before a man makes up his mind to become a liar, it is highly important he should examine himself closely and see if he is not better calculated to speak the truth."

LOT 217.

"At forty shangs!—going at forty shangs! Did I hear two guin-ness offered?—Thank you, sir. Two guin-ness is in time. For the first time, at two guin-ness! For the second time! Any advance on two guin-ness? For the third and last time—going at two guin-ness!"

Rap!

"Name, if you please, sir?"

"John Trumway," I said, for the lot was mine, — Lot 217. Whatever made me buy the lot? I am sure I did n't want it. I am afraid I am one of those great grown-up children who are not safe to be trusted out with money in their pockets, unless coppers. The coins in my purse always leap up with frantic desire to buy everything I see, and the result is, that no matter what sum I go out with, I always come home penniless.

What on earth could I want now with a second-hand, patent fire-proof, powder-proof, bomb-proof, thief-proof iron safe, constructed to resist fifty burglar-power (nominal), case-hardened, undrillable, unpickable, to be sold a bargain, owing to the key being lost, and the only man who knew how to make another having gone to sleep with his fathers? When I reflected about my purchase, I began to feel quite hot. There is no doubt it was a bargain, or might have been, to somebody; but then, patent, unpickable iron safes with the keys lost, and owner-proof as well as thief-proof, are not everybody's money, however cheap. I had a cold, creeping doubt if they were mine. While the auctioneer was describing it, and the people all round the room were yearning for it in bids, I seemed to see many remarkable qualities emanating from the safe, like perspiration, so that its acquisition appeared to me then peculiarly desirable. Other people seemed similarly affected, for its value increased momentarily. Some ten or a dozen persons had all in turn desired to be its fortunate possessor, and all at increased rates. The man who bid "forty shangs" certainly must have seen his way to turn the safe to account, or why have bid "forty shangs" at all? And if so, of course it was plain there must be a way to turn it to account, and one which a few moments' quiet reflection, apart from the excitement of the saleroom, would doubtless reveal. It was something of this feeling made me bid the "two guinness," or, it may be, the vaguer conviction that here was an object suddenly become extremely desirable to a number of my fellow-creatures, which evoked a corresponding and envious desire in my own breast. But now that the thing was mine, all the latent value which had before perspired from it under the auctioneer's hands seemed absorbed again into its shamefully rusty iron sides,—it had become a miserable hundredweight of useless old iron,—and I loathed the very sight of it, especially when I thought of Mrs. Trumway.

My wife is not a woman of many words; by no means the kind of woman verbally to upbraid me for buying inconvertible bargains, and she has had previous opportunities for so doing, if so disposed. Mrs. Trumway never says anything. She did n't when I once bought two hundredweight of puffy, bloated cheeses at twopence per pound, and sold portions afterwards to some poor people I knew—as a kindness—at a trifling profit, and made them all very poorly, and got summoned before the magistrates, and fined for selling cheese unfit for human food, and lost cheese, temper, reputation, and £4 10s. No; at such times Mrs. Trumway makes no remark; she only sniffs. But the amount of meaning conveyed by one of Mrs. T.'s sniffs is voluminous,—nay, encyclopædic. It means, "O dear, yes; I knew how 't would be. You've been at it, again, have you? Been out with money in your pocket, and come home with nothing but your pocket left? Just like water in a colander: the colander don't run away,—more 's the pity. No; it's always ready for more. And here am I, pinching and screwing, and saving money, and allowancing the house down to one box of "Tand-stickors" a week, and you going fooling money away like this. Remonstrance, John, is perfectly useless. I have awaked to the conclusion that I have married an incorrigible idiot; but I don't complain. No; a noodle you may be, but I am your affectionate wife, Martha Trumway." It means far more than this; it means every recriminatory epithet which a naturally sensitive person, like me, can apply to himself, after making the pleasing discovery that he has taken himself in.

I went home to dinner, which had been waiting an hour. I said nothing about my purchase. There was a small sniff,—a very small one,—expressive of, "It's not at all unlikely, John, though, mind, I don't accuse you of it without evidence; but, now I come to consider, it's rather more likely than not that you've something on your mind, and nothing in your purse." After dinner, I escaped up stairs to my study. In the evening I saw it coming up my garden-path on a pair of trucks. Should I go down? No, I reflected; I would not go down. How I detested the thing now! It did n't look worth half a crown.

"Yes," I heard the servant say in answer to the man with the trucks; "this is Mr. Trumway's."

"So 's this," said the man; "and I wish him joy of it, and I should n't mind a glass of beer to wish it him in."

Which conversation had the effect of bringing out Mrs. T. Her comprehensive mind must have taken in the situation at a glance.

"Where is this from?" she asked the man.

"From the saleroom, 'm."

"John!" It was the voice of my affectionate wife addressed to her husband. "Have you been buying anything at a sale?"

"O dear, yes," said I, calling down stairs. "Did n't I tell you? It's a—a—safe."

Although two pair of stairs separated me from the partner of my bosom, I was aware of the sniff which succeeded, and implied: "O yes; you're quite right, my man; this is Mr. Trumway's. You need n't be afraid you've mistaken the house. There is n't such another man in the neighborhood as lives at No. 19." But aloud, she proceeded, "Quite right; bring it in, please."—"John! Do you wish the man to leave it in the passage?" Sniff (being interpreted): "Or would I like it taken into the drawing-room, or placed on the dressing-table of the spare room perhaps, or on the study mantel-piece?"

I thought it better to go down-stairs. "O, leave it in the passage," I said. "No one will steal it."

"O dear, no," said my wife with a little smile. "No one will steal it; that's quite certain." I admit it was not a seductive-looking object now.

When we were alone, Mrs. Trumway asked me what I intended to do with the safe, which was the very question I had been asking myself ever since returning from the sale.

"What do I intend doing with it, my dear?" I repeated, to gain time. "Why—yes—ah!—that is—do with it? Why, open it, of course."

She sniffed a sniff equal to two columns of printed matter. Although my answer was not premeditated, I did n't think it altogether a bad notion. Accordingly, for the next two or three weeks my house became the constant resort of blacksmiths, white-smiths, locksmiths, and people in the engineering way, all of whom, however, failed utterly in the attempt to open the unpickable, undrillable fire and thief proof, Lot 217. They fairly owned it beat them.

I wanted the safe opened, however, for the reason that, being opened, it might become an article perhaps useful or salable, whereas now it was neither. One morning, an idea of unusual brilliancy occurred to me, and I put on my hat, and went out to put it in practice. I walked up to our great model jail, and saw the governor, with whom I had previously some acquaintance. I told him I should feel deeply obliged if he could render me assistance, and then came to the purport of my visit.

"Have you, my good sir, such a thing as a good strong burglar on the establishment that you could lend me for an hour or two?" And I explained what I wanted him for. But the governor shook his head, and said he was sorry to disoblige me, but it really could not be done, as all their burglars were in use, and could not be spared off the premises. Very good; but supposing I were to send the safe up to the jail, did he think he could allow a burglar to while away a few hours of his leisure at a congenial pursuit?—No. He did not see that he could: it would be against the rules; besides which, their burglars had become so reformed by attention to the ministrations of the chaplain, that it was exceedingly doubtful if they would be willing to return to sinful ways, such as breaking open safes, lest it might show a worldly spirit that would interfere with their tickets-of-leave; and then, again, there were no burglars' tools in the jail.

"I'll tell you what, though," he said after a bit; "I dare say I could find you a ticket-of-leave man who would do it. They report themselves to us at stated intervals, so that we always know where to find them. Indeed, I think I know just the very man, and will send him to you."

One evening in the twilight, about a week afterwards, our servant came in, in some alarm, to say that two very ill-looking men were at the back door, who said they had "come to crack the governor's money-box." They were not nice-looking men. One of them, a great brawny ruffian, with a head and neck like a bull, and a wisp of colored handkerchief over a shiftless chest, hairy as Esau's, gave me a stolid nod when I went out.

"The boss up at the Model," he said, pointing with his thumb over his shoulder in the direction of the jail, "asked me if so be as I would oblige you by crackin' a little bit of a box you've got. You see, guv'nor, I ain't any tools o' my own, so I've brought a pal who's got his 'Lady's Companion' with him, to do the job"; indicating his friend, who carried a parcel of tools done up in matting. I should say he was not a nice man to have for a friend,—a spare, short, cunning little fellow, with restless eyes; a face that gave you the impression of a weasel's; and a thin nose, with a continual nervous twitching in the nostrils, like a rabbit's, as though he was an animal always on the scent for game or hunters, which perhaps he was. His name was Toney.

I brought them in, and pointing out the safe, asked if they thought they could open it.

"Open it!" repeated Toney, with ineffable contempt, "why, a kid could open it with a pen-knife! It's one of them Unimpeachables, Bill," he said to his mate; "you remember 'em; like what we had at —" (some name I could not catch). "Why, I could blow it open with an ounce of baccer in a quarter of an hour."

"Well," I said, "I would give you five shillings to open it."

"Would you, be-gar?" growled the big man.

"Our terms is 'arf a guv'nor, — me and Toney, — and two pots of beer, and two ounces of baccer; and then it's a favor, on account of our doin' it to oblige the boss. And we ain't a-going to do it here, un'stan'; but if you've got e'er a bit of a private-house out at the back, where we can be private, we'll do the job there on the quiet."

I was obliged to accede to their terms (indeed, they were both persons I would not have had a difference with for the world). So they carried the safe into the tool-house in the garden, where I supplied them with the quantity of ale and tobacco agreed on, and they shut themselves in.

"It's only a case for the 'alderman,' Bill," I heard the little man remark as I left them.

In twenty-five minutes, by my watch, the bull-headed man came and told me it was done. "Not that we've been all this time about it, though, guv'nor, for Toney he prised it open in five minutes, easy as a oyster, but we've been settin' and doin' a quiet pipe together."

They certainly had opened it, — not by picking the lock, as I anticipated, but by wrenching off the back, so that the safe was completely destroyed. They had drilled two holes in the back-plate, to allow of inserting two immensely powerful steel crowbars in such a position that the leverage of the two bars would tell one against the other, and wrench out the intermediate piece. From the appearance of the holes and the smell in the out-house, I judged the men had previously lowered the temper of the steel back with a blow-pipe in the places where they intended to drill. I felt disposed to be angry at the destruction of the safe, and was going to say so, when Toney pointed out a dirty roll of papers lying inside. I took them out, unrolled them, and forgot my wrath immediately. A prize indeed! Fifty share certificates, each for twenty pounds, in the "Undeniable Security and Unlimited Discount Banking Corporation (Limited)"; Offices, Lud Street, City. I paid off my two burglars with a light heart, and returning to the house, I believe I danced a war-dance of triumph round Mrs. T., exhibiting a thousand pounds' worth of property, which had cost me but three.

"There," said I, "that's the good of going to sales!"

"Well, but, John, these shares are not yours."

"But they are," I retorted. "I bought them, and they are 'to Bearer,' and no name on them to indicate whose they are."

"But had you not better see the auctioneer, and tell him what you have found?"

"Why, no. I bought the lot, faults and errors of description, and all; and it is as much mine as if I had paid a thousand pounds for it."

"Yes; but some poor man may be ruined by the loss of these shares."

"Well," said I, "what I will do will be to go up to London, to the company's offices, and ascertain whether these certificates are claimed on behalf of any one else, and if not, to claim them for myself."

I found the offices of the "Undeniable Security and Unlimited Discount Banking Corporation (Limited)" a most imposing edifice of Italian architecture, with immense plate-glass windows, and Purbeck-marble columns, and the name of the company, in mediæval gold letters, running the whole length of the building. Evidently a very prosperous concern. On entering, there was not that amount of business doing which I should have liked to see; in fact, beyond two clerks, — one of whom was paring his nails with the office penknife, while the other, and more elderly, was reading the newspaper, — the place was empty. I stood quite five minutes at the massive Spanish mahogany counter apparently without either of the clerks becoming officially aware of my presence, so intent were they on their duties. I therefore rapped on the floor with my umbrella, which made a great noise in the empty office, which was churchlike for size and echoes. The elder clerk looked up impatiently from his paper, but resumed its perusal immediately. The younger got off his stool, and went to a looking-glass, where he commenced arranging his hair with a pocket-comb.

"I have called," I remarked in a somewhat loud tone, "about some shares in this company, the certificates of which I hold."

"Eh?" said the old clerk, at last detecting my intrusion.

I repeated my business.

"Certificates Nos. 2034 to 2083, — they are in my possession; in fact, I bought them."

"Well, what do you want? Do you wish them registered in your name? — Simpson" (to the young clerk), "get down the transfer-book."

"That is the difficulty," said I. "In the event, for instance, of any one else claiming the shares, for they came into my possession in a rather singular manner."

"No difficulty at all. You say you've got the certificates, and you've bought them. It does n't matter to us if you've stolen them. Just produce the scrip, and write me an authority to register the shares in your name."

He looked over the certificates, and counted them, while I wrote the required authority.

"But," I said, when I had done, with a view to satisfy my conscience in the appropriation of the property, "I assure you the circumstances under which I acquired the certificates are so singular, that —"

"You need n't trouble about that," he interrupted; "our office takes no cognizance of the way you became possessed of them. You are the holder and the registered proprietor of the shares, and you may be quite sure no one else will ever claim them."

This sounded satisfactory in one way; but the man's manner of saying it did not, I confess, leave a favorable impression on my mind. I went home rather uncomfortable, and feeling so oppressed with the notion of having property which my conscience would not concede was mine in strict justice, that it would have been a relief to have had an accomplice with whom to share the proceeds and the responsibility.

It may seem singular that when in town I had taken no steps to ascertain the value of my property; but, in the first place, I know very little of the ways of the money-market, and the share-list is as great a puzzle to me as Bradshaw; and in the next, to tell the truth, I felt timid at asking questions which might lead me to betray how I became the owner of the shares.

A month after this, I had been out for the day to a picnic with my wife. We had both enjoyed ourselves hugely, and come home flushed with the summer heat and braced up with the fresh air. I had got over all my qualms about the possession of the property, and begun to look upon it as promising a very acceptable addition to my income. I am not sure I had not been regarding the scenery of trees and sky and rippling water with something of unusual complacency, for feeling that the acquisition of a thousand pounds removed me so much the farther from anxiety as to enable me to enjoy it in the greater peace.

A great oblong official blue letter awaited my return. It contained a blow, — most letters dated from Basinghall Street do.

Re THE UNDENIABLE SECURITY AND UNLIMITED DISCOUNT BANKING CORPORATION (LIMITED).

SIR, — I beg to inform you an order has this day been made by the registrar, calling upon you as a contributory in respect of your fifty (50) shares held in the above company (now under a winding-up order), numbered respectively from 2034 to 2083 inclusive. The amount of the call is five pounds ten shillings (£5.10s.) per share, making a total of two hundred and seventy-five pounds (£275); which sum must be paid at my office between eleven and four on Thursday next the 26th inst.

(Signed), —

Official Assignee in the Bankruptcy.

O fool! I began to vaguely see now why the clerk told me I might be quite sure no one else would claim the shares. They were not only of no value, but their possession was subject to heavy liability. And I, to be idiot enough to go and claim them when the company was actually bankrupt and worse!

Night as it was, I determined to go at once and see my wife's brother-in-law, Mr. Blode. He was a barrister, — had been one for ten years, — but had never had a brief.

"O, I should n't take any notice of that," he said: "I don't think they can fix you with liability. I'll write to the assignee and manage it for you. Let me know if you hear any more of it. You are an innocent party; you did n't buy the shares, but the iron safe. But how on earth did they know you held the certificates?"

I told him I had given an authority to have them registered in my name.

He drew in his breath, and produced a long whistle like a sigh. "Then you've indorsed their possession. You should have consulted me. However, I would n't trouble about it. Leave it to me."

It would take too long to describe the harassing anxieties which each week brought me, while my case as a contributory was dragging along first through one court and then another; but the different lights which various luminaries of the law shed on my unfortunate two guineas' worth deserve to be particularized.

It was agreed that, in buying the safe, I could not have bought the contents, — that the safe was described in the catalogue as a safe, and nothing more, and that, consequently, as I had only bought a safe, whatever was found in it was no more mine than any other distinct article in the catalogue, and I could not therefore be responsible for liabilities attaching thereto. It was retorted by the opposing counsel, that should his ludship acquiesce in the view of the case propounded, certainly to his astonishment, by his learned friend, and decide that the certificates were not purchased by me, and not therefore mine, he would agree to a verdict, and immediately indict me for felony, for appropriating the shares to my own use, authorizing their registration in my name.

He submitted that if I had bought the shares, I was liable as a contributory; and if not, as a felon. The learned judge said he could not entertain the issue of felony, as that was a question for a distinct tribunal, but he was inclined to rule that I had bought the shares. The conditions of sale were sufficiently explicit to his mind on that point,—"the lots to be cleared with all faults and errors of description." Indeed, the very term employed by auction custom appeared decisive. The item in question was described as "Lot 217,—an iron safe." It was the "lot" which was put up to competition, and, to use a common expression, Mr. Trumway had bought "the lot,"—that was, "all the lot." The question then arose: Could I be held liable as a contributory, when in fact, I had purchased the shares on the very day of the company's bankruptcy, and the registry in my name was not completed until some weeks later? In other words, that seeing the company had contracted no liabilities during the time I held the shares (having, in fact, ceased business), could I be made a contributory? Against this it was urged that shares represented past responsibilities, and that as I should have been entitled to share in a dividend on the past year (had one been declared), so it was just that I should bear my proportion of the burdens. And again; it was clear that somebody must be liable as a contributory in respect of these fifty shares for twelve months prior to the bankruptcy, and the burden of proof as to the person so liable, if not myself, must be supposed to rest with their present possessor. The judge thought not, as it was not to be contended I could have had either interest or liability in the company before the date of the sale. The case, however, was complicated still further by the opposing counsel bringing evidence as to the previous owner of the iron safe, and endeavoring to prove that his liability in respect of the shares actually terminated twelve months previous to my purchase, so as to fix me with responsibility for the interim. It appeared that the safe and its contents, some eighteen months back, had belonged to a Mr. Wendle, a shareholder in the company; that, in addition to the certificates, it had contained his cash-box and a quantity of gold and notes, and that the safe had been stolen from his office, the notes and gold and cash-box removed by the robbers, who had obtained a wax impression of his key, and the valueless safe containing the shares, sold to an ironmonger, who put it into the safe. This Mr. Wendle had applied for duplicates of the share certificates, which were refused by the company until he could prove the destruction of the old ones. Unsuccessful in this, and distrusting the reckless business of the "Undeniable and Unlimited," he at last applied to have the shares standing in his name cancelled, which had been done. It would therefore follow, it was contended, that my liability embraced the whole twelvemonth, from the time Mr. Wendle's name had been erased, to the stoppage of the company, I being the next registered proprietor. Against this it was argued that whatever Mr. Wendle might have written to the company, the certificates, when found, were his property; and that after they were stolen, they none the less ceased to be his property. And if so, my counsel proceeded, there would be a very remarkable point for the decision of his ludship. For he went on to elicit that Mr. Wendle, after losing nearly the whole of his money, had committed suicide under such determined circumstances, that even the charity of a coroner's jury had been constrained to pronounce it felo de se, and he had been buried without funeral rites. Wherefore, as the certificates of which he had been robbed were still his property in the eye of the law, it would follow, from his being a felo de se, that they became the property of the crown, consequent on his act. But if they were the property of the crown, the crown was liable for that twelve months; and again, the safe could not be legally sold without authority from the crown; and his client could not be the legal buyer, nor, consequently, have any right, title, interest, or liability in the shares aforesaid.

In addition to all this— But no; I will spare the reader the further particulars of this involved case; suffice it to say that it was decided in my favor. But it was carried to a higher court, where I was required to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and entered for the plaintiff, on the ground of the decision being contrary to evidence. There it was all gone over again, with the addition that the original thieves were produced, one of them no other than my burglar's friend Toney (and I was threatened with an action by the maker of the safe for stating that Toney broke open the "Unimpeachable" in five minutes in my outhouse). Here the decision went against me. Finally, the case came before the bench of judges, where a majority of one reversed the ruling of the lower court.

I was therefore at last so far successful in the issue as to find myself in the Bankruptcy Court, on account of the legal expenses my precious trial had accumulated. The one satisfaction attending this result was, that I must inevitably have gone there had I lost.

The very sight of a sale-catalogue is now sufficient to produce from Mrs. T. a sniff of about the capacity of a three-volume novel.

THE NEW TESTAMENT UNDER A NEW ASPECT.*

BARON TAUCHNITZ has crowned the first thousand volumes of his well-known "Collection" by an edition of the New Testament, containing a feature at once so new and so admirable as to deserve a few words of gratitude from every intelligent Englishman, whether connected or unconnected with the profession of theology.

Every one knows that the English New Testament is a translation from Greek. But every one does not know that the Greek from which the translation was made is a very imperfect, inaccurate, redundant representation of the original Gospels, Acts, Epistles, and Revelation, as they left the hands of their authors. The printers and scholars who, about the year 1550, at the instigation of Erasmus, first put the Greek Testament into type, did the best they could with the materials at their disposal. They collected and compared all the manuscripts within reach, and they formed an edition (a "text," as the technical word is) which did them credit, and the translations of which have furnished comfort and hope to millions of men and women since their day. But time went on, and fresh manuscripts were discovered, older and more carefully written than those which Erasmus and Stephens had employed; and a number of passages appeared in which their edition was contradicted by more trustworthy readings. Still, the original edition continued to be printed and used as a standard, and acquired the name of the "Received Text"; and all the corrections as they were discovered day by day were not employed to alter this text, but were added to it as notes, by which at some future time, when all the ancient manuscripts had been found, and all the quotations of the Testament in the early Fathers of the Church had been examined, and every conceivable source explored, and men knew everything that could be known on the subject, a more correct edition might be made, which should then supersede the old "Received Text."

In process of time, as libraries were explored and Oriental monasteries rifled, three manuscripts came to be discovered of earlier date and more exact execution than any others. The first of these, known as the "Vatican MS.," is in the Vatican at Rome; the second, the "Alexandrine MS.," in the British Museum; and the third, the discovery of our own generation, the "Sinaitic MS.," is at St. Petersburg. The date at which the first and third were written is somewhere between the year of our Lord 330 and 350; the second is a century or so later, say 450. These three manuscripts are now admitted by those best qualified to speak on the subject, to contain the nearest approach which we yet possess, or are likely to possess, to the original writings of the Testament. No doubt there is a great difference between even these early copies and the books as they left the hands of their authors. If we could compare the original of Gospel or Epistle with what it had become after only 250 years of copying and recopying, we should find an immense difference. It is inevitable. Even in printing, even in our day, when verbal accuracy has become almost a religion, mistakes occur in reprints; some sentences are added, others omitted, others distorted. But where books were reproduced by handwriting, and where minute accuracy was not understood or valued, and where copyists were either over-zealous or very ignorant, the chances must have been immense, overwhelming, against any copy being exactly like that which it was copied from. We shall understand this a little better presently.

Now what Baron Tauchnitz has done — with the help of Professor Tischendorf, the most eminent scholar of our day in this line — is this. He has reprinted the New Testament exactly as it stands in the English Bible; and he has put at the bottom of the page all the variations between it and the three great copies just spoken of. And all this in English, — that is the "new and admirable feature" of which I spoke at the opening of my paper. Scholars have long been familiar with these things; but until now this information has not been brought within the reach of ordinary English men and women; nor has it been published at all at so insignificant a price or in so clear and convenient a form. I shall indicate presently one respect in which I think the book may be still further improved, but meantime I will give a few instances of the nature of the corrections which this new edition discloses, and which are most obviously interesting: —

The first thing that strikes one on looking at the notes at the bottom of these pages is how often the sign "omit" occurs; in other words, how large a proportion of the differences consists of additions to the original. There are many transpositions of words; here and there also words have to be added which have dropped out in the process of copying.

But these are not nearly so many in amount as those which are marked as redundant.

These redundances are of two kinds. First and most numerous are those which appear to have had for their object to elucidate or confirm the text. The owner of a copy of the Gospels, say in the fifth or sixth century, observes that a sentence is obscure and liable to be misunderstood for want of a word of explanation; or a text from the Old Testament is quoted, and, as he thinks, quoted wrongly; or a pronoun is given where he conceives that the proper name would be more intelligible; or the name of a place or person appears to want explanation; or a saying or narrative is stated in different words from the parallel passage in another Gospel.

In these and many other cases what so natural as to seize the pen and add the correction or the supplemental words? And thus in each of these cases (and many others which do not fall within my rough general divisions) the explanatory word has been inserted, the quotation has been corrected to agree with the passage quoted from, the proper name has been substituted for the pronoun, the narrative has been altered to suit the parallel passage, and so on. Sometimes this would be done in the margin, sometimes in the body of the work. In process of time, the manuscript with its alterations went into the hands of a copyist, who then, according to his lights or his bias, inserted the whole or part of the alterations, possibly with some further additions of his own, all which from that day forward became in that uncritical age indistinguishable and inseparable from the original work. I will give instances of each kind of addition before proceeding further.

1. Words added to a sentence to complete and strengthen the sense or make it more intelligible; as, for example: —

Matt. xiii. 51, "Jesus saith unto them, Have ye understood all these things?"

Mark xiii. 5, "And he stretched it out, and his hand was restored whole as the other." v. 40, "He taketh the father and mother . . . and entereth in where the damsel was lying."

Luke vii. 10, "And they that were sent, returning to the house, found the servant whole that had been sick."

John xi. 41, "Then they took away the stone from the place where the dead was laid." xii. 1, "Then Jesus came to Bethany where Lazarus was which had been dead."

Acts xxiv. 15, "That there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." 26, "He hoped also that money should have been given him of Paul, that he might loose him."

Occasionally these additions have a theological motive, as in Luke iv. 41, where "Christ" has been inserted, — "Thou art Christ the Son of God"; or John ix. 35, where "Son of God" has been substituted for "Son of Man."*

But by far the largest number of additions under this head consist of single words put in to remedy halting sentences or obscure construction: "saying," "certain," "yet," "also," "unto them," "unto him," and the like. It is hardly too much to say that one can track the particular editor (as we should say) who made this class of additions almost

* In John xix. 40, the Alexandrine MS. substitutes "God" for "Jesus," so that it is perhaps by a mere accident that we escaped having in our English Bibles the very inconvenient expression, "Then took they the body of God, and wound it in linen clothes." verse by verse along the pages of the Gospels, and can trace his nervous anxiety lest any of the sacred words he loved so dearly should be misunderstood or perverted for want of his too careful additions. The pages literally teem with his affectionate touches. In the ninth chapter of Matthew, for instance, there are ten such insertions:—

2 and 5, "Thy sins be forgiven thee." 9, "As Jesus passed forth from thence." 10, "Many publicans and sinners came and sat down." 12, "When Jesus heard that, he said unto them." 14, "Why do we and the Pharisees fast oft?" 24, "He said unto them, Give place." 27, "Two blind men followed him, crying." 31, "Spread abroad his fame in all that country." 32, "Brought to him a dumb man." 35, "Teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel."

The four consecutive verses 47 to 50 of Luke viii. contain four additions of this kind, namely: "She declared unto him before all the people." "He said unto her, Daughter, be of good comfort." "Saying to him, Thy daughter is dead." "He answered him, saying, Fear not."

So also in Mark i. 40, "Beseeching him and kneeling down to him, and saying," 41, "And touched him, and saith unto him, I will." ii. 5, "Son, thy sins be forgiven thee." 8, "He said unto them, Why reason ye?"

Luke xx. 24, "They answered and said, Cæsar's." 34, "Jesus answering said," xxi. 2, "And he saw also a certain poor widow." 8, "Go ye not therefore after them."

But we need not go to the fifth and sixth centuries for examples of this. The italics in our own Bibles—explanatory words added by the translators with the same pious intention as those just spoken of, and as often unnecessary—furnish instances of the very selfsame things.

2. We now come to words added to complete a quotation, or bring a statement into harmony with a parallel passage. Instances of these are the quotation from Isaiah in Matt. xv. 8, "This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoreth me with their lips"; and the statement in Mark v. 7, "Cried with a loud voice and said, What have I to do with thee, Jesus thou Son of the most high God?" which is possibly completed from the parallel passages in Luke and Matthew.

3. Pronouns displaced for the proper name of the person referred to are incessant: as Matt. xv. 30, "Cast them down at Jesus' [his] feet"; Mark i. 41, "And Jesus [he], moved with compassion"; Luke x. 21, "In that hour Jesus [he] rejoiced"; John iii. 2, "The same came to Jesus [him] by night"; Acts xi. 25, "Then departed Barnabas [he] to Tarsus"; Luke xii. 62, "And Peter [he] went out."

4. Additions to explain a name of place or person are also occasionally found; as John ix. 2, "Go to the pool of Siloam and wash"; xii. 4, "Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, which should betray him"; Luke xi. 29, "the sign of Jonas the prophet."

5. Alterations bearing on the topography of the Holy Land are rare and not very material. The chief one is the substitution of Magdala for Magadan in Matt. xv. 39; Magdala having probably crept into the copies from a desire to connect it with "Mary the Magdalene." In Mark vii. 31 a change of some moment is made by the alteration of "departing through the coasts of Tyre and Sidon" from "departing from the coasts of Tyre he came through Sidon,"—showing that the road was the same then as now.

The transition is easy from these small additions to such longer and more important ones as Matt. xxvii. 35, or Mark xv. 28, which may have arisen from the anxiety of a commentator to square the facts of the New Testament with the prophecies of the Old; or Mark ix. 44 and 46, which have probably been inserted to correspond with verse 48 and with Isaiah lvi. 24; or Luke xvii. 36, added from Matt. xxiv. 40; or Matt. xii. 47, added from Luke viii. 20.

In all the cases of which these are types, there is some motive, more or less obvious, at the bottom of the addition. But it is more difficult to explain the presence of other passages, such as Matt. xvi. 2, 3, Luke xxii. 43, 44, or John v. 4, which are not found in either of the most ancient copies, and for which no authority or hint appears in other parts of the Gospels.

Still more remarkable is the next class of additions, which are in all respects truly startling. I mean those which contain some of the most characteristic and "Christian" sentiments in the whole of the New Testament. There are few who, if asked to name the incident which most clearly embodied the justice, mercy, and tenderness of Christ, and supplied us with the most precious traits of His personal manners, would not quote the story of the woman taken in adultery. And yet there can be little doubt that this story—John vii. 53 to viii. 11—did not exist in the original Gospel; in fact, did not make its appearance in any edition before the middle of the fifth century. And there are several other passages, which, though shorter, are hardly less characteristic than is this story. The beautiful narrative in Luke ix. 54–56 loses not only the reference to the act of Elijah, which has always seemed so appropriate to the locality, but it loses what seems to be the very kernel of its teaching, the whole of the words printed in italics being an interpolation in copies made after the middle of the fifth century.

"And when his disciples James and John saw this, they said, Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven and consume them, even as Elias did? But he turned and rebuked them, and said, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of, for the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them. And they went to another village."

The precept, so parallel to this in spirit, contained in Mark xi. 26, which has formed the motive of so many a prayer, and the text of so many a sermon,— "For if ye do not forgive, neither will your Father which is in heaven forgive your trespasses,"—is in like manner an interpolation of later date than either the Sinaitic or Vatican MS. Even the utterance of our Lord on the cross—Luke xxiii. 34, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do"—must pass into the same category, and be erased from the original draft of the record. To the same purport are the words in the Sermon on the Mount, in Matt. v. 44,— "Bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you," which, although they lie at the very foundation of Christian morality, must henceforward be swept away.

I take the opportunity to notice a saying attributed to Christ, which though it has escaped being inserted in the received text of the Testament, and is therefore not in our English Bibles,—and rightly, since as it is not found in any of the three manuscripts which form the basis of our examination, it can hardly have been written by the Evangelist, — is yet so full of wisdom and goodness, and so appropriate to some of the questions of our day, that we can as ill afford to lose it as any of those just quoted. It occurs as an interpolation in Luke vi. 4, and is as follows: "On the same day he saw a certain man working on the Sabbath, and he said unto him, Man, if indeed thou knowest what thou doest, blessed art thou; but if thou knowest not, thou art cursed, and a transgressor of the law."

What shall we say of such sentences as these? They cannot surely be the invention of those who inserted them in the later MSS. There is something about them which forbids us to question their authenticity, or to ascribe them to any one but Jesus himself. On the other hand, the fact of their omission in the oldest copies seems to show that they did not form part of the Original Gospels. They must belong to the same category with those "words of the Lord Jesus," which are preserved in the Acts of the Apostles, — "It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts xx. 35), and with those countless "things" that might have filled the "world itself," the recollection of which, so many years after, at the close of a long life, forced St. John to speak of his own Gospel as a mere skeleton sketch of the life of his Master.

Certainly, if in many respects we have lost by the inaccurate and redundant edition of Erasmus and Stephens, in other respects we have gained; for a Testament without the story of the woman taken in adultery, and without the other gracious words just quoted, would be robbed of some of its most precious gems, even though it be the fact that those gems did not form a part of the Gospels as they left the hands of their authors.

The longest of the interpolations in the Gospels, and the only one which remains to be noticed, is the conclusion of St. Mark, in which the verses from verse nine to the end of the chapter, though a very ancient addition, are not found in the oldest copies, and therefore cannot be accepted as from the hand of the Evangelist. But this passage is of a very different nature from those just noticed, and of secondary interest; and its loss would be of far less moment than theirs, — since while in one portion is a mere résumé of the narratives of the other Gospels, in another it breathes a far less Christian spirit than that which distinguishes them.

My examination, which I now bring to a conclusion, has been done only in the roughest and most imperfect manner, and must be taken as the work of a mere layman, anxious only to excite others to acquaintance with that which he has himself found so attractive and useful.

I have confined myself to the Gospels; but the Acts, Epistles, and Revelation, though perhaps less exquisitely interesting, will be found hardly less fruitful than the Gospels. And in the Gospels I have dealt with the redundances only. The questions of the age and authority of the three copies adduced are so fully and authoritatively treated in the clear and interesting preface which Professor Tischendorf has prefixed to the volume, as to render any further remarks on these heads unnecessary.

Any one who will take this Testament of Baron Tauchnitz's, and will mark out with a pencil the passages specified in the notes as omitted in the three MSS. or in two of them, will be astonished at the alterations in the face of those familiar pages. And if at first the phrases often seem balder and the sentences less fluent and abrupt than before, he will find these deficiencies made up for by greater life and greater reality, and will have the satisfaction of knowing that he has come much closer to the original condition of a document which all must desire to possess as nearly as possible in its original form, and has caught a trifle less faintly the echoes of that divine voice, for the tones of which men were never more eagerly listening than they are now.

The only suggestion that occurs to me for the improvement of this pretty little volume is that some means should be taken of showing in the verses themselves the alterations indicated in the notes. Without this it will never produce its full effect. But when so done — as any one may try for himself with a pencil — the effect is most unexpected.

The redundances might be shown without difficulty, and the other kinds of alteration might be indicated, at least where they are of material importance.

FOREIGN NOTES.

M. HAUSMANN is to pay $ 50,000 to Mlle. Déjazet for her theatre, which has been demolished by the march of improvement.

SOME Parisian vandal has thrown ink over Carpeaux's beautiful piece of statuary, The Dance, which decorates the façade of the new Opera House. Paris is naturally very mad about it.

DR. SPIERS, author of a well-known French and English dictionary, and other valuable educational works, died a few weeks since at his residence at Passa. His age was sixty-two.

Mlle. MALLINGER, the swimming prima donna of Herr Wagner's new opera, is about to marry Herr Düringsfeld, a comedian, who once saved her from an assassin's pistol at the expense to himself of a serious wound.

It will be remembered that last year Mr. Charles Dickens was left executor by that eccentric clergyman, the Rev. Chauncy Hare Townsend. Mr. Dickens is now about to publish an account of his late friend's "Religious Opinions."

A PROPOSAL was recently made by the Physician-General to the Prussian Navy that a uniform flag of distress should be adopted by all civilized nations. The North German Correspondent now announces that the French Government has already given its consent to this proposal.

MADAME OLYMPE AUDOUARD, a literary lady, feeling herself aggrieved by an article in the Figaro, has called out M. de Villemeessant. This fiery authoress begs to inform the editor of the Figaro that he need have no scruples as to accepting her challenge, seeing that she is a widow, and has neither father nor brother. She is, moreover, a capital shot, and informs her adversary that a ball fired by a feminine hand is quite as murderous in its result as any other.

THE Emperor of China is fifteen years old, and is to be married this year, with immense pomp, to his first and chief wife, — his Empress. He will be simultaneously provided with second and third wives; and from all parts of the empire victims are being collected to swell the list of his harem. Every Tartar family, we believe, is obliged to contribute its quota. Local selections are first made, and the holocaust is sent to Peking, where a fresh selection takes place, and a "chosen" number are condemned to a life-long seclusion. They are not allowed to see their relations; many never see their lord and master, and in the event of his death they are still condemned to perpetual isolation and celibacy.

MONSIEUR LIEBREICH has presented a memoir to the Académie des Sciences, which contains some interesting details concerning a new anæsthetic he has just discovered. An important difference between this new chemical compound, which he calls "chloral," and all other substances used for the purpose of producing insensibility, is, that it is administered by absorption instead of inhalation, and this enables the dose applied to be measured with greater accuracy. On passing into the system it becomes decomposed into formiate of potassium and chloroform, and produces more perfect insensibility than either ordinary chloroform or ether. Its use is said to be unattended by any danger. In a very painful and difficult operation lately performed on a woman M. Liebreich applied chloral with perfect success, the patient being kept under its influence for over two hours.

THE English journals received by the last steamer, are crowded with editorial articles and communications, touching Mrs. Stowe's "True Story of Lady Byron's Life." That the story is true, is admitted by the best authorities. The letter addressed to the newspapers by Messrs. Wharton and Fords the solicitors of "the descendants and representatives of the late Lady Noel Byron," is anything but a refutation of charges brought against Byron. "These gentlemen," says the London Times of September the 3d, "as having acted 'for upwards of half a century as solicitors to Lady Byron's family,' may no doubt claim to speak with considerable weight upon any subject connected with Lady Byron's domestic affairs. It seems that the subject now under discussion was not kept strictly secret within her own breast, but was imparted to certain advisers, and even committed formally to paper, and under these circumstances few would, perhaps, be so likely to learn, either directly or indirectly, a correct history of it as the family lawyers. Besides, we need scarcely express our belief that Messrs. Wharton and Fords would not come forward in the matter as they have done, unless they had ample grounds for doing so. If, therefore, they distinctly contradicted Mrs. Stowe's assertion, we confess we should be inclined to prefer their evidence to hers, as the more likely to be accurate. But for these very reasons it seems to us a most significant fact that, though thus coming forward apparently in direct opposition to Mrs. Stowe, and manifesting the greatest anxiety to discredit her story, Messrs. Wharton and Fords do not, nevertheless, altogether contradict it. They do not say, as they would naturally be glad to say at once, if they could, that Mrs. Stowe's story is in the only important respect incorrect, — that Lady Byron never imputed to her husband the criminality now for the first time revealed to the world; but they only deny that Mrs. Stowe's statement is 'complete' or 'authentic,' and that it 'can be regarded as Lady Byron's own statement.'"

The Pall Mall Gazette remarks: "It will be observed that Messrs. Wharton and Fords, in their carefully composed letter, make no charge of material inaccuracy against Mrs. Stowe, but dwell on the incompleteness of her statement. It is to be inferred that substantially Mrs. Stowe's statement is correct, and that more remains to be told: worse cannot be behind."

The Saturday Review, while it takes strong exceptions to certain parts of Mrs. Stowe's paper, is forced to admit its belief in the truth of the main charge, and furnishes the following circumstantial evidence of the guilt of Lord Byron: —

"We have gone through Moore's Memoirs relating to this period, 1813-1815, and it is unquestionable and undeniable that it affords great corroboration to Mrs. Stowe's — or Lady Byron's — narrative. Byron's life up to that time had been bad enough; but now there appears something secret, mysterious, and hidden, a frequent reference to some especial guilt and agony, which shows that something had happened very different from all that had happened before; some guilt different in kind from the unclean and coarse and drunken life of the previous years. It is not so much on what Byron says, as on what he hints, that we found this judgment. There is, we all know, in cases of great sin, a strange, unnatural, or perhaps natural, dallying and playing round the fatal secret. It is concealed perhaps, but it is always on the very point of being revealed, as though, which is perhaps true, there were some horrid fascination in crime which all but compels the criminal to avow it. Read by the lurid light of Mrs. Stowe's narrative, what Byron said in his letters to Moore at this time, what he inserted in his Diary, and the poems which he wrote become of the highest interest and significance.

"Some passages from Moore's book we extract. The very first mention of Augusta Leigh occurs in the Diary: "March 22, 1814. She is a friend of Augusta's, and whatever she loves I can't help liking. March 28. Augusta wants me to make it up with Carlisle. I have refused every [sic] body else, but I can't deny her anything; so I must e'en do it. April 10. I do not know that I am happiest when alone; but this I am sure of, that I never am long in the society even of her. I love (God knows too well, and the Devil probably too) without a yearning for the company of my lamp."

"And a week afterwards the journal was discontinued. We turn to the correspondence with Moore: —

"Feb. 4, 1814. Mrs. Leigh is with me at Newstead. March 3 [after returning to London]. I have a great mind to tell you that I am uncomfortable if only to make you come to town . . . there is no one to whom I would sooner turn for consolation . . . The truth is, I have no lack of argument to ponder upon of the most gloomy description, but this comes from other causes. . . . There is nothing upon the spot either to love or hate, but I certainly have subjects for both at no very great distance. . . . March 12. Guess darkly. . . . At present I shall say no more, and, perhaps, — but no matter. April 9. I have more or less been breaking a few of the favorite commandments; but I mean to pull up and marry, — if any one will have me."

"At this moment Byron declared a sudden resolution, which, however, he did not keep, never to write again; and from other notices, the exchange of books and letters, we find that he was in daily communication with his half-sister. May 4, he sends Moore a song, which, by the way, was never published till after his death, which seems at this time significant: —

"I speak not, I trace not, I breathe not thy name,
There is grief in the sound, there is guilt in the fame;

Too brief for our passion, too long for our peace
Were those hours — can their joy or their bitterness cease?
We repent — we abjure — we will break from our chain,
We will part — we will fly — to unite it again!
O! thine be the gladness and mine be the guilt."

As we have said, not one of these expressions is conclusive, but taken together they become important.

"As soon as Byron was clear of England, he wrote the famous verses 'To Augusta,' which were never published till after his death, beginning:—

'My sister, my sweet sister.'

It is certainly open to anybody to say that it might be only fraternal love which dictated the very strong language of this remarkable poem; it is also certain, on the other hand, that, read by the light of Lady Byron's story, these strange lines are also susceptible of a very different and blacker interpretation. As we have said before, taken by itself, this poem concludes nothing; taken in connection with other things, it seems to mean a good deal. The person to whom they were addressed, it must not be forgotten, had a husband, and, as the Peerage tells us, 'issue.' Poets may address their sisters in very affectionate language, but they seldom talk of living, and living forever, with a married woman, even though she may be a favorite half-sister:—

"Go where I will, to me thou art the same,
A loved regret which I would not resign.
There yet are two things in my destiny,—
A world to roam through, and a home with thee.
The first were nothing,—had I still the last,
It were the haven of my happiness:
..... even at moments I would think I see
Some living thing to love, but none like thee.

O that thou wert but with me!

Had I but sooner learnt

I had been better than I now can be.
The passions which have torn me would have slept,
I had not suffered, and thou had not wept.

We were, and are,—I am, even as thou art,— Beings who ne'er each other can resign:

We are entwined, let death come slow or fast.'

"Byron's first literary work after the separation was to write 'Manfred,' a ghastly tale, the interest of which centres on incest. We are quite aware that poets and dramatists are not to be identified with the characters or plots which they draw. Racine wrote 'Phèdre,' but this is no proof that he or any other tragedian practised the vices of the characters which he draws. We certainly cannot agree with Mrs. Stowe's wild assertion that 'anybody who reads "Manfred" with this story in his mind will see that it'—the story we suppose—'is true.' But when it is said, on the other hand, as has been said by a writer in the Times, 'that it is almost impossible that a man with the secret of incest on his soul would have written "Manfred,"' we should say, for the psychological reason to which we have already referred, this is a very likely thing for him to do. This view of the real significance of 'Manfred' is illustrated by a remarkable passage in a letter to Murray of July 9, 1817, soon after its publication, and referring to a critique which had been sent by Murray to Byron: 'Send me the rest; and also p. 270, where there is an "account of the supposed origin of this dreadful story";—in which, by the way, whatever it may be, the conjecturer is out, and knows nothing of the matter. I had a better origin [for "Manfred"] than he can devise or divine, for the soul of him.' But this summer of 1816, was spent not only in writing 'Manfred,' but in Shelley's company; and Shelley at that very moment was engaged in writing the 'Revolt of Islam,' a direct and elaborate vindication of incest,—and which, if we remember rightly, in its original form as 'Laon and Cythna' was even more offensive than it now is. We have heard an ingenious but over-fanciful speculation that Astarte, the strange name of the incestuous sister in 'Manfred' contains a sort of anagram of the principal letters of the name of Byron's half-sister. But this is probably a casual coincidence. The drama of 'Cain,' on which Mrs. Stowe rests so much as confirming the charge of incest, is of much later date.

"To conclude. Is it probable, or even possible, that Mrs. Stowe invented this history? Most improbable,—all but impossible. Is it probable, or even possible, that Lady Byron invented this history? Most improbable,—all but impossible. Is it probable, or even possible, that Lady Byron, without intending to misstate or misunderstand, did take au sérieux some foolish and culpable affectation of vice, some swagger and boast on her husband's part of some great and secret crime, which only existed in his own morbid imagination, and was only uttered for the sake of annoying his wife, and in his ordinary or extraordinary evil temper? Just possible,—but very improbable. Is the story an hallucination on Lady Byron's part? Not at all likely—but of course possible. If therefore there is nothing absolutely to discredit Mrs. Stowe's truthfulness, or Lady Byron's truthfulness, and if the probabilities against illusion or misunderstanding are so great, we are driven to the conclusion that, on the whole, the history in its essence—that is, as a charge of incest—is more likely on all accounts to be true than not.

SUMMER WEATHER.

I.

THE sun was shining on the hills
And gilding the purple heather,
As you and I were roaming, love,
In summer weather.

The birds were singing in the trees,
The lark sung in the sky,
But ah! I heeded not their songs
As they winged by.

For sweeter than the sweetest song
Of bird upon a tree
Was the music of your voice, love,
As you spoke to me.

Blue was the sunny streamlet
And blue the summer skies,
But bluer, oh! a thousand times
Were your soft eyes.

Sweet is the breath of wild flowers,
With dew-drops newly wet,
But sweeter was the moment, love,
When our lips met.

Warm was the golden sunlight
On fields that gladly shine,
But warmer was your true heart
That beat with mine.

II.

The year is growing old, love,
The sun has hid his light,
My life is growing dark too,
And turning into night.

The flowers bloom no longer,
The birds have hushed their song,
And the music of the streamlet
No longer flows along.

But sweeter than the sweetest song
Of bird upon a tree,
Is the music of your voice, love,
As you speak to me.

Come, love, and sit beside me,
And lay your hand in mine,
Look full into my heart, love,
With those true eyes of thine.

Is there aught changed within it?
Has it grown strange or cold,
O love! though life is weary,
Now that the year is old?

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF JOHN ACKLAND.

IN THIRTEEN CHAPTERS. CHAPTER I.

[In the following extraordinary narrative nothing is fictitious but the names of the persons.]

ABOUT thirty-five or forty years ago, before the border Territory of Texas had become a State of the great American Union, a Virginian gentleman living near Richmond, received from a gentleman of Massachusetts, living near Boston, a letter pressing for punctual payment of a debt owing to the writer of it by the person to whom it was addressed. The debt was a heavy one. It was a loan for a limited period, contracted partly on mortgage and partly on other less valid securities. The period for which it was originally contracted had been frequently renewed at increasing rates of interest. The whole capital would shortly be due; and renewal of the loan (which seems to have been asked for) was firmly declined, on the ground that the writer of the letter was now winding up his business at Boston preparatory to the undertaking of an entirely new business at Charleston, whither it was his intention to proceed very shortly. Such was the general purport of this letter. The tone of it was courteous, but peremptory. The name of the gentleman who received it we shall suppose to have been Cartwright, and that of the gentleman who wrote it to have been Ackland. Mr. Cartwright was the owner of an estate, not a very large one (which, with the reader's permission, we will call Glenoak), on the banks of the James River. The Cartwrights were an old Virginian family, much esteemed for their antiquity. Three generations of male Cartwright babies had been christened Stuart (because, sir, the Cartwrights had always fought for the Stuarts, sir, in the very old country, and in Virginia a very moderate amount of family antiquity has always commanded for the representative of it as much consideration as is accorded in England to the lineage of a Beaufort or a Howard. The personal reputation of this present Philip Stuart Cartwright, however, was not altogether satisfactory. It was regretted that a man of his parts and property should have contributed nothing to the strength and dignity of the territorial aristocracy of old Virginia in the legislature of his State, — a legislature of which the Virginians were justly proud. The estate of Glenoak, if well managed, would have doubtless yielded more than the income which was spent, not very reputably, by the owner of it, whenever he had a run of luck at faro. But the estate was not well managed, and between occasional but extravagant hospitalities on this estate, and equally extravagant indulgence in the stimulant of high stakes and strong liquors at the bells and bars about Richmond, Mr. Philip Cartwright passed his time unprofitably enough; for pulling the devil by the tail is a fatiguing exercise, even to a strong man. Mr. Cartwright was a strong man, however, and a handsome man, and a tall. "Quite a fine man, sir," said his friends. "You may have seen Philip S. Cartwright as drunk as a hag, sir, but you will have always found him quite the cavalier." And, in truth, he had grand manners, and pleasant manners, too, this hard-living, devil-may-care gentleman, which embellished the impression of his vices. And he was a bold rider and a crack shot, accomplishments which, in all Anglo-Saxon communities, insure easy popularity to their possessor. Then, too, he had been left, early in life, a widower; and if, since then, he had lived too hard, or lived too loose, this was an extenuating circumstance. Moreover, he had but one child, a pretty little girl; and to her he had ever been a careful, tender, and devoted father. That was another extenuating circumstance. He was doubtless no man's enemy but his own; and the worst ever said of him was, that "Philip S., sir, is a smart man, smart and spry, but wants ballast."

Mr. Cartwright lost no time in answering Mr. Ackland's letter. He answered it with the warmest expressions of gratitude for the consideration and forbearance which he had hitherto received from the writer in the matter of this large, and all too long outstanding debt. He confessed that only a month ago he had been greatly embarrassed how to meet the obligations now falling due; but he was all the more rejoiced, for that reason, to be now enabled to assure his correspondent, that in consequence partly of the unusual excellence of the present rice harvest, and partly owing to other recent and unexpected receipts to a considerable amount, the capital and interest of the debt would be duly paid off at the proper time. As, however, Mr. Ackland, in his letter, had expressed the intention of going to Charleston about that time, he (Mr. Cartwright) begged to remind him that he could not reach Charleston without passing through Richmond on his way thither. He trusted therefore, that Mr. A. would afford him that opportunity of offering to his New England friend a sample of the hospitality for which old Virginia was justly celebrated. He was naturally anxious to be the first Southern gentleman to entertain his distinguished correspondent on Virginian soil. He, therefore, trusted that his esteemed friend would honor him by being his guest at Glenoak for a few days; the more so, as he was desirous not only of introducing Mr. A. to some of the most distinguished men of Virginia, but also of furnishing him with letters to many influential friends of his in South Carolina, whose acquaintance Mr. A. would probably find useful in the course of his business at Charleston. If therefore, Mr. A. could manage to be at Richmond on the — proximo, he (Mr. C.) would have the honor of meeting him there, and conducting him to Glenoak, where all would be in readiness for the immediate and satisfactory settlement of their accounts.

When Mr. Ackland received this letter, he was sitting in his office at Boston, and conversing with his cousin, Tom Ackland. Tom Ackland was a rising young lawyer, and the only living relative of our Mr. John Ackland, of the firm of Ackland Brothers. Ackland's other brother, who was also Ackland senior, had died some years ago, and Ackland junior had since then been carrying on the business of the firm, not very willingly, and not very successfully.

"What do you think of that, Tom?" said Mr. John Ackland, tossing over the letter to his cousin.

"Well," said Tom, after reading it through, hastily enough, "I think you had better accept the invitation, for I suspect it is about the only thing you will ever get out of Philip Cartwright. As to his paying up, I don't believe a word of what he says on that score."

"I don't much believe in it neither," said Mr. John, "and I'm sadly afraid the debt is a bad one. But I can't afford to lose it; and 'twill be a great bore to have to foreclose. Even then, too, I sha'n't recover half of the capital. What do you think, Tom?"

Mr. Ackland spoke with a weary tone of voice and an undecided manner, like a man who is tired of some load which he is either too weak or too lazy to shake off.

"Well, you must pass through Richmond, Jack, and Glenoak will be as pleasant a halt as you can have. Drink as much of Cartwright's wine, and smoke as many of his cigars as you can; for I doubt if you'll get back any of your money except in that kind. However, you can afford to lose it, so don't be so downhearted, man. And as for this Charleston business —"

"Oh!" said John Ackland, impatiently, "the best of the Charleston business is that it is not Boston business. I am longing, Tom, to be away from here, and the sooner I can start the better. Have you heard (I did yesterday at the Albion) that Mary, I mean Mrs. Mordent, and her husband are expected back in Boston next month?"

"Ah, Jack, Jack!" exclaimed Tom, "you will get over this sooner than you think, man, and come back to us one of these days with a bouncing, black-eyed Carolinian beauty, and half a dozen little Ackland brothers and sisters too."

"I have got over it, Tom. At my time of life, I don't think there is much to get over."

"Your time of life, Jack! What nonsense!"

"Well, I am not a patriarch, certainly," said Mr. John Ackland. "But I don't want to be a patriarch, Tom: and I don't think I ever shall be a patriarch. The best part of my life was short enough, Heaven knows, and I hope (now that is over) that the worst part of it won't be very long. I don't think it will be very long, Tom. Anyhow, I have no mind to meet Mr. and Mrs. Mordent again just now, so I shall accept Cartwright's invitation, and now, for mercy's sake, no more about business for to-day, Tom."

He did accept the invitation; and, at the date proposed, John Ackland arrived at Richmond late in the evening of a hot June day. He was much fatigued by his long journey and the heat of the weather; and not at all sorry to accept an invitation (which he received through Cartwright, who met him on his arrival) from Mr. D——, the accomplished editor of the Richmond Courier, to sup and sleep at that gentleman's house before going on to Glenoak. Mr. D——, having heard from Cartwright of Mr. Ackland's intended visit to the South, and knowing that he could not arrive in Richmond till late in the evening, had, with true Virginian hospitality, insisted on the two gentlemen passing the night at his house in town; and it had been arranged that Cartwright should drive Mr. D—— and Mr. Ackland over to Glenoak on the following day. Mr. Ackland was very cordially received by his Richmond host, an agreeable and cultivated man. The fatigue of his long journey secured him a good night's rest; and, being an early riser, he had indulged his curiosity by a solitary stroll through the town, before the three gentlemen met at breakfast the next morning. After breakfast he was conducted by his two friends to see the lions of the place. When they had visited the court-house and the senate-house, —

"Now, Mr. Editor," said Cartwright, "I shall ask permission to leave my friend here under your good care for an hour or so. I am going to fetch my little girl from school. You know she is at Miss Grindley's finishing establishment for young ladies; and though she is only ten years old, Miss G—— assures me that Virginia Cartwright is her most forward pupil. We will take this little puss with us, if you please. What o'clock is it now?"

Cartwright looked at his watch, and Mr. D. looked at his watch. Yawning and looking at your watch are infectious gestures. John Ackland also put his hand to his waistcoat pocket, and then suddenly remembering that his watch was not there, he felt awkward, and blushed. John Ackland was a shy man, and a lazy man in everything but the exercise of self-torment. He was in the habit of interpreting every trifle to his own disadvantage. This unfortunate way of regarding all external phenomena was constantly disturbing his otherwise habitual languor with an internal sensation of extreme awkwardness. And whenever John Ackland felt awkward he blushed.

"Twenty minutes to one," said Mr. D.

"Good; then," said Cartwright, "in one hour, as near as may be, I and my little girl will be at your door with the wagon, and phaeton. Can you be ready by then?"

"All right," answered the editor, "we shall just have time for a light luncheon."

"Will it be out of your way, Mr. D.," said Ackland, after Cartwright had left them, "to pass by D'Oiley's, the watchmaker's, in — Street?"

"Not at all. How do you happen to know the name of that store, though?"

"I noticed it, whilst strolling through the town this morning. My chronometer has been losing time since I came south; and I asked Mr. D'Oiley to look at it, saying I would call or send for it before leaving town this afternoon."

When the watchmaker handed back the chronometer to Mr. Ackland, "That watch was never made in the States, I reckon, sir?" said he.

"No. It is English."

"Geneva works, though. I'll warrant your chronometer, sir, to go right for six years now. Splendid piece of workmanship, sir."

Mr. Ackland was much pleased with his pretty little new acquaintance, Virginia Cartwright. She was a dark-eyed, lively child, who promised to become a very beautiful woman, and was singularly graceful for that awkward age in the life of a young lady which closes her first decade. Her father seemed to be immensely proud of, as well as tenderly attached to, the little girl. Every little incident on their way to Glenoak suggested to him some anecdote of her childhood which he related to his guest in terms, no doubt inadequately expressive of her extraordinary merits. Once he said, "Good God, sir, when I think what would become of that child if anything were to happen—" But he finished the sentence only by whipping on the horses.

A large assembly of Virginia notables had been invited to Glenoak to meet Mr. Cartwright's New England guest. "I am going to be shown off," thought John Ackland to himself; and he entered the house, hot and blushing, like the sun rising through a fog. Among these notables was Judge Griffin, "our greatest legal authority, sir," whispered Cartwright, as he pushed his guest forward, and presented him to the judge with expressions of overflowing eulogy and friendship.

Mr. Ackland, of Boston City, was a representative man, he said, "a splendid specimen, sir, of our great merchant princes of the North, whom he was proud to receive under his roof. More than that, he himself was under deep obligations (why should he be ashamed to avow it?), the very deepest obligations to his worthy friend and honored guest, John K. Ackland!" Here Mr. Cartwright, apparently under the impression that he had been proposing a toast, paused, and prepared to lift his glass to his lips, but finding that he had, just then, no glass to lift, he informed the judge and his other guests that dinner would soon be served, and expressed a hope that in the mean while Mr. Ackland would favor him with a few moments of his private attention for the settlement of a matter of business to which, indeed, he partly owed the honor of that gentleman's visit. The two gentlemen were then closeted together for nearly an hour. When they rejoined the rest of the company at dinner, Mr. Cartwright appeared to have made (during their recent interview) a most favorable impression on his New England guest. Host and guest were already on terms of the most cordial intimacy with each other, and Cartwright himself was in the highest possible spirits. One of the company present on that occasion, a very young gentleman, who had had some betting transactions with the owner of Glenoak, — transactions from which he had derived a very high appreciation of the remarkable 'cuteness' of that gentleman, — expressed to his neighbor at table a decided opinion that his friend Philip S. must certainly have succeeded, before dinner, in getting a pot 'o money out of the Yankee, who looked as well pleased as people usually do when they have done something foolish. After dinner, when the gentlemen lit their cigars, and strolled into the garden, Cartwright linking one arm in that of Judge Griffin, and the other in that of John Ackland, exclaimed, —

"I wish, Judge, that you, whose powers of persuasion are irresistible, would induce my friend here to listen to reason. No, no!" he continued, as John Ackland made some gesture of impatience, "no, my esteemed friend, why should I conceal the truth? The fact is, judge, that Mr. Ackland and myself have had some pecuniary transactions with each other, in which he has been creditor, — let me add, the most forbearing and considerate creditor that ever man had, — and I, of course, debtor —"

"A highly honorable one," put in John Ackland.

"My dear sir, that is the very point in question. Allow me to deserve the flattering epithet. Judge Griffin shall decide the case. You must know, judge, that the unfortunate force of circumstances (why should I be ashamed to own it?) has compelled me to keep this gentleman waiting an unconscionably long time for the repayment of a considerable sum of money which he has been good enough to advance to me, partly on my personal security. Under these circumstances, I was naturally anxious that he should not, finally, be a loser by the generosity of his patience. It is, therefore, needless to say that the rate of interest offered by myself for the renewed postponement of the liquidation of this loan was, in the last instance, a high one. I am happy to say that I have, this afternoon, had the pleasure of refunding to my friend the entire capital of the debt. On that capital, however, a year's interest was still owing. Of course I added the amount of it to that of the capital. But he (wonderful man!) refuses — absolutely refuses — to receive it. Tell him, judge (you know me), that he is depriving me of a luxury which I have too seldom enjoyed, — the luxury of paying my debts, — and that the capital —"

"Was a very large one," interrupted Mr. Ackland, who had been listening with growing impatience to this speech. "Pardon me if I confess that I had not counted on the entire recovery of it, — especially so soon. The interest to which Mr. Cartwright has referred was fixed in accordance with that erroneous impression. For which — ahem — my excuse must be, sir, that — well, that I am not — never was — a man of sanguine temperament. Sir, Mr. Cartwright has greatly embarrassed me. Under present circumstances, I really — I could not — ahem — tax my friend here so heavily on a debt of — of — well, yes — of that amount, which has been so unexpectedly — ahem. I really — I — am not a usurer, sir, though I am a merchant."

Mr. Ackland said all this with the difficult hesitation of an exceedingly shy man, which he was, and blushing up to the roots of his hair. As soon as he had struggled through the effort of saying it, and thereby worked himself into a state of feeling so defensive as to be almost offensive, he extricated his arm from the embrace of his host, and, with an awkward bow, hastened to join the ladies in the arbor.

"Odd man, that," said Judge Griffin.

"Shy and proud," said Cartwright, "but as fine a fellow as ever lived."

John Ackland wrote from Glenoak to his cousin Tom, expressing much pleasure in his visit there. The change of scene and air had agreed with him, notwithstanding the great heat of the season, and he already felt in better health and spirits than when he left Boston. He related the result of the interview which had taken place between himself and his host on the day of his arrival at Glenoak. He had the cash now with him in notes. But the amount was so large that he should of course exchange them at the Richmond Bank for a credit on their correspondents at Charleston. It was a strange notion of Cartwright's to insist on paying the money in notes.

"He seems to have been under the impression that I should not have been equally well satisfied with his signature, which made me feel very awkward, my dear Tom."

He had felt still more awkward in consenting to take the last year's interest on that loan at the rate originally stipulated. Tom knew that he would not have raised it so high if he had ever had any hope of recovering the entire capital at the expiration of the term. However, there was no help for it. Cartwright would have it. Cartwright had behaved exceedingly well, very much like a gentleman. He had really conceived a great regard for his present host. In despite of some obvious faults of character, and he feared also of conduct, there was so much good in the man. C. was a most pleasant companion, and had shown the greatest delicacy in this matter. The man's affection for his daughter, too, was quite touching; and the child herself was charming.

John Ackland then described his impressions of a slave plantation at some length. His abhorrence of the whole system was even more intense than before. Not because he had noticed any great cruelty in the treatment of the slaves on this plantation, but because the system was one which rendered even kindness itself an instrument of degradation; and these unfortunate blacks appeared to him to be in a mental and moral condition which, without justifying it, gave a hideous plausibility to the cool assertion of their owners that colored humanity is not humanity at all. He avoided all discussion on this subject, however, for, as Tom knew, there was nothing he hated so much as controversy. At first he had felt "a little awkward" at being the only Northerner amongst so many slave proprietors. But now he felt quite at his ease with them all, especially with Cartwright. "T was a pity that man had been born South. He had been brought up there to idleness and arrogance, but his natural disposition fitted him for better things. Glenoak was a very pleasant place, so pleasant, that he was reluctant to leave it. And, in fact, there was no real necessity for going to Charleston so soon. The weather was horribly hot. He had not yet been up to the exertion even of going to Richmond to deposit the notes he had received from Cartwright. He thought he should probably remain some days longer — perhaps a fortnight longer — at Glenoak.

On the evening of the day he wrote this letter, however, an incident occurred which changed Mr. Ackland's disposition to prolong his stay at Glenoak.

OLDTOWN FOLKS.

WHEN a novelist who has won popularity at one grand coup goes on playing for fresh fame, his game becomes a heavy one in spite of himself. The chances are he loses at it; but, if he win, the new reputation it brings him must be in proportion to the difficulties of satisfying the expectations he has raised. The more richly he is gifted with the sensibility of genius the more will an intensity of self-consciousness be likely to embarrass him. He feels he has dazzled the public into indiscriminating admiration and taught them to be too exacting. Mrs. Stowe, then, is to be congratulated as being more than doubly fortunate. She has emerged with fresh laurels from a formidable ordeal, and in her case a first great success has only served to glorify a later one. With the instinct of genius, she once caught the popular ball on the bound, and produced in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" a work that will live when the institution to which it owed its birth has become a remote tradition of her country. She rose to fame on the waves of the conflicting feelings that were then convulsing America, and have since revolutionized it. But it was sheer genius that buoyed her up where so many others had been swamped, and if she was indebted for the completeness of her success to adventitious circumstances, that ought scarcely to detract from her well-earned fame. Her story was sensational in the highest sense of the word; but then it moved one, not by the extravagances of a depraved fancy depicting coarse eccentricities of crime, but by the reproduction of possible scenes that appealed with an intense reality to the deepest and best feelings of our nature. Highly colored the scenes might have been, but that was a question between the author and her conscience. Studying them as works of art, critics found nothing to condemn, for, however some of them may have revolted nature, unfortunately they were quite in harmony with the probable.

It is a rare proof, then, of the fertility and versatility of Mrs. Stowe's powers that this later work will infallibly enhance her fame, and in "Oldtown Folks" she appeals to the taste and sympathies of a more appreciative circle of readers than she fascinated with "Uncle Tom's Cabin." This story must make its way, as it is easy to predict it will, by its intrinsic merits. It exhibits a more delicate and careful analysis of human nature than the other; a simpler and truer pathos; a humor richer, perhaps, certainly as fresh and frolicsome. Generally as a work of art it is altogether of a higher type. Far from being thrilling and sensational, it is much what its title professes, — a simple domestic tale, and theological and religious as well as domestic. As the serpent lurked among the flowers of Eden, so villains and worldly schemers glide into Mrs. Stowe's Christian Arcadia; but their doings are episodic, and the parts they play in what slight plot there is subordinate themselves to the general course of the story. In "Uncle Tom's Cabin" the subject ran of itself inevitably to tragedy. The interest of "Oldtown Folks" is altogether independent of what we may call the conventional exigencies of novel-writing. Mrs. Stowe lets her talents follow what now seems their natural bent, and she moves more naturally among the quiet inmates of those peaceful New England homes than among the brutal slave-drivers of the old South. The striking realism of her pictures is unimpeachable. Knowledge does not help us much in pronouncing on resemblances in an age and a country of which our impressions are of the vaguest, but our instinct tells us all must be taken from the life and by no ordinary observer. It would be paying any novelist an extravagant compliment to suppose that creations like these owe their existence to fancy. The period is happily chosen to embrace and perpetuate a wide range of primitive characters long ago bustled off the face of the country, and fast fading out of the memory of its inhabitants. The scenes are laid where a profusion of violent contrasts insured a variety of striking effects. The time is shortly after the Revolutionary War, when society with its ideas and opinions was in a state of transition. The colonies had broken away from their leading strings, but had scarcely habituated themselves as a people to walking alone. Loyalists and rabid Republicans were living side by side in a general tolerance, claiming extreme liberty of speech and conceding within reasonable limits a practical freedom of action. The leaven of rationalism, imported from sympathetic France, was seething in a population of Calvinists and Arminians. Religious "profession" was really a profession like any other, and religion was so mixed up with the affairs of every-day life, that the most solemn subjects were treated without a suspicion of profanity in the most familiar language.

Oldtown was a quiet little Massachusetts village, within an easy drive of the State capital. In those days a part of the consignment of the historical tea was yet supplying loyalist teapots, and Boston, still a town, had not grown into a city. The districts even in its immediate vicinity remained nearly as primitive as in the days of the Pilgrim Fathers. An Indian remnant lingered in the parish of Oldtown, and negroes took social rank not according to color, but thews and sinews, and were treated as equals or superiors accordingly. We fancy if magic and science combined were to reflect for us in a camera the Oldtown of 1790, we should see it just as it appears in the pages of Mrs. Stowe. In the introductory chapters, the landscapes and the people stand out in so many photographs, and clear as photographs taken in the pure American atmosphere generally are. We have Dutch pictures of interiors in which we cannot conceive a feature omitted or caricatured, — those of the farms, with their bustling inmates lightening "chores" of work with easy chat on predestination, free grace, and kindred topics; the great kitchens with their vast hospitable fireplaces and blazing pyres, based on the ponderous log that tasked a couple of powerful men to move to its place; the open larders and cellars where pies and brown bread were on cut for all comers, and the cider casks stood continually on tap. In those golden days, if the natives held unpleasantly fast by the letter of the law of the old dispensation, at least they were liberally punctilious in the observance of the charitable precepts that recommend the poor to the care of the rich. We see the village tavern with its creaking signboard, its broad veranda, and its open taproom, with its row of beer barrels on draught, whither the minister himself would come in all his dignity to illustrate use and abuse, addressing a sharp word in season to its ragged frequenters, while sipping his mug of warm flip. We have the huge, barn-like meeting-house, where even in the infant Republic the pews were graduated on the wealth and station of their occupants, from the stately orthodox carriage folk down to the shabby Indian, who had still some lingering faith in the superstitions of his fathers. The use of fire was absolutely interdicted by principle or custom, and in their rigorous climate the worshippers had to freeze through the interminable service as they could. Mrs. Stowe's description of the dogs and children is in its way inimitable. Providence seemed to have tempered the wind to these shorn lambs by admitting the one for the solace of the other. The yellow dog hand with a sober face to patter on his four solemn paws behind the wagon as it went to meeting of a Sunday morning. And in meeting who can say what an infinite fund of consolation their yellow, honest faces and great soft eyes were to the children tired of the sermon, but greatly consoled by getting a sly opportunity to stroke Bosc's yellow back? How many little eyes twinkled sympathetically through the slats of the high-backed pews as the tick of their paws up and down the broad aisle announced that they were treating themselves to that meditative locomotion allowed to good dogs in summer time."

Or, leaving the grim chapel, we may refresh ourselves with a glance at the beauties of nature: —

"It was as pretty a village as ever laid itself down to rest on the banks of a tranquil river. The stream was one of those limpid children of the mountains whose brown clear waters ripple with a soft yellow light over many-colored pebbles, now brawling and bubbling on rocky bottoms, dashing hither and thither in tiny cascades, throwing white spray over green-mossed rocks, and then again sweeping silently with many a winding curve through soft, green meadows, nursing on its bosom troops of water-lilies, and bordering its banks with blue and white violets, snow-flecked meadowsweet, and wild iris. Hither and thither, in the fertile tracts of meadow upland, through which the little stream wound, were some two dozen farmhouses hid in green hollows, or perched on breezy hill-tops; while close alongside of the river, at its widest and deepest part, ran one rustic street, thickly carpeted with short velvet green grass, where stood the presiding buildings of the village."

Then we are presented to the inhabitants one by one, all of them with something of the universal type, although each is marked out from his neighbors by sharp, distinctive touches. At the top and the bottom of the social ladder, and especially conspicuous as striking portraits, are Mr. Lothrop, the portly clergyman, and Sam Lawson, "the village do-nothing." "In the little theocracy which the pilgrims established in the wilderness, the ministry was the only order of nobility."

The parishioners treated their clergy with a strange mixture of reverence and familiarity; the honor in which they held the office being tempered perhaps, by the knowledge that their minister was their stipendiary as well. Mr. Lothrop, however, having married a wealthy member of an old colonial family, as was natural among Republicans, was treated with exceptional deference. While he has a profound sense of his own exalted station and of the dignity of the ministry, he keeps himself punctiliously at the beck of his humblest parishioners; goes in full dress to his spiritual labors as Buffon did to his literary ones; smooths down his lace ruffles and arms himself with his gold-headed cane to attend the death-bed of a pauper; and soothes the anxious man by dwelling on the infinite distance of the Almighty, while impressing on him the paramount duty of resignation in any case. But, next to the heroine, the village good-for-nothing is certainly his author's favorite. Perhaps as much as any one else he is the hero of a novel that can scarcely be said to have one, and from long and grave theological dialogues Mrs. Stowe turns away to unbend in Sam's exhilarating society. "Tall, shambling, loose-jointed, with a long, thin visage and prominent watery blue eyes," Sam is every one's friend but his own, and can turn his hand to anything with a will so long as his labor goes unrewarded. Quite in his place in a circle so primitive as that of Oldtown, he would be an impossibility anywhere else. Welcomed on something like a

"Went out with the children when they went roving in the woods Saturday afternoon, and was always on footing of equality to all the houses in the parish, while his family was indebted to them for daily bread, idle, with work going a-begging all around him, and out of elbows in the middle of general plenty; pitching in the loftiest key theories of life and morals, hopelessly at variance with his practice, and expressing them with half-conscious humor in Scriptural phrase without an idea of irreverence. Quaintly as his talk reads, we have come to know him so well that we fancy we can conjure him up before us in flesh and blood, and let his air and manner point his words and stimulate our sense of the ridiculous. "Why, Lordy Massy, boys," he would say when he takes the juveniles out a-fishing, "I can't bear to see no sort o' critter in torment. These 'ere pouts ain't to blame for bein' fish, and ye ought to put 'em out o' their misery. Fish has their rights as well as any on us."

In the following eloquent words he laments the departure of the young light of the village, who has the rare gift of soothing his termagant wife, and bringing peace to his dilapidated hearthstone:—

"Why, Lordy Massy, I don't know what we're any of us goin' to do when Tiny's gone. Why, there ain't a dog goes into the meetin'-house but wags his tail when he sees her a-comin'. I expect she knows about every yellow bird's nest, an' blue jay's, an' bobolink's, and meadow lark's that there's ben round here these five years, and how they's goin' to set and hatch without her's best known to themselves, I s'pose. Lord Massy! that child can sing so like a skunk blackbird that you can't tell which is which. Wall, I'll say one thing for her; she draws the fire out o' Hepsy, an' she's 'bout the only livin' critter that can; but some night when she's ben into our house a playin' checkers or fox an' geese with the child'en, she'd rally git Hepsy slicked down, so that 't was kind o' comfortable bein' with her."

But any analecta from Mr. Lawson's facetiae must do injustice to his extraordinary conversational and social powers. He has the rare quality of being always up to his own level, and, moreover, the language loses its flavor unless you have something more than a slight acquaintance with the man. A very charming woman in her way is old Mrs. Badger, the bustling mistress of one of the snuggest farmhouses in the parish, whose austere religious tenets are always being falsified by her natural softness of heart, and whose rough, cocoa-like shell is overflowing with the milk of human kindness. There is a world of character in her outbreak against a highly respectable woman who comes to reclaim an orphan child whom her harshness of treatment has driven away:—

"Done! why, you've done what you'd no business to. You'd no business to take a child at all; you have n't got a grain of motherliness in you. Why, look at Natur', that might teach you that more than meat and drink and clothes is wanted for a child. Hens brood their chickens and keep 'em warm under their wings, and cows lick their calves and cosset them, and it's a mean shame that folks will take 'em away from 'em."

"'Tain't just feedin' and clothin' back and belly that's all; it's broodin' that young creturs wants, and you hain't got a bit of broodin' in you."

In short, it is hard to tear ourselves away from those primitive folks of Oldtown, and, although we have made the acquaintance of so many of them, we only wish there were more to know. Their life may have been a monotonous one to them, but it is new to us, and if their talk was homely, it is fresh inimitable, and make one revel in the promise of a novel of which every line will well repay the reading, while many will bear reading again and again. As we go on, the nature of the charm changes with the scenes. From simple village life and primitive country people, we are carried to towns and into higher society. Cities and good society have always and everywhere much of the same general character, fewer distinctive traits and distinctive qualities, and, therefore, here the story begins unavoidably to lose something of its unique individuality. But the exhaustive theological discussions come in to lend a graver interest to its pages. It is clear the religious element must be all-pervading in a novel of New England whose personages had religion always in their hearts or on their tongues. As a study of American religious opinion of the day in its different shades Mrs. Stowe's work must have real and permanent value. She amply redeems the pledge of the preface, where she disavows beforehand any unfair exhibition of personal bias. Calvinist, Arminian, Pelagian, sceptic, has each his turn, and each has fair play, nor can too high praise be given to the versatility with which Mrs. Stowe identifies herself with each in turn, arguing from their different points of view. She never resorts to the uncandid device of setting up a feeble adversary to be knocked over by a very moderately gifted friend. To borrow American election phraseology, opinions of every shade have their platform, the planks of which are carefully and dispassionately laid. We have no doubt she admirably reproduces the play of conflicting opinions that then divided parishes and households, going forward in season and out of season. She is to be congratulated on making her novel carry its load of controversy so lightly, but then she cleverly makes the queer ideas and quaint phraseology of the disputants help to grease the wheels. In this connection, as the Americans would say, we cannot resist quoting a bit of counsel tendered by old Heber Atwood, the wood merchant, to his minister, along with the pile of hickory logs which had formed part of Heber's contribution to his pastor's stipend:—

"I was tellin' my old woman this morning that I did n't grudge a cent of my subscription, because your preachin' lasts well and pays well. Ses I, Mr. Avery ain't the kind of man that strikes 12 the first time. He's a man that'll wear. That's what I said fust, and I've followed y' up pretty close in your preachin'; but then I've just got one word to say to you, — Ain't free agency a-gettin' a leetle too top heavy in yer preachin'? Ain't it kind o' over-growin' sovereignty? Now, ye see, Divine sovereignty has got to be took care of, as well as free agency. That's all, that's all. I thought I'd just drop the thought, ye know, and leave you to think on't. This 'ere last revival you run along consider'ble in 'Whosoever will, may come,' and all that. Now, p'r'aps of you'd just tighten up the ropes a leetle t'other side, and give 'em sovereignty, the hull load would sled easier."

In its construction the story is somewhat peculiar. It is cast, for the most part, in the autobiographical form, and is told by one Horace Holyoke, commencing from his early childhood. Then he suspends it while he in the third person, or the author, relates the history of two orphan children, brother and sister, whose companionship and intimacy are to influence his life. That done, Horace's story is resumed, and the novel finishes in the form in which it had begun. Among her children, Mrs. Stowe is thoughtful of home, and writes as only a woman can. The way in which the orphans are cast on the cold charities of the world, their sufferings, and their rescue by the kind-hearted inhabitants of Oldtown, open a congenial field for the simple pathos she is so strong in. Tina Percival, in her quickness and intelligence, is a lovely little white Topsy. Even as a child she has her way with every one she comes in contact with, with the single exception of her early taskmistress, and she is sure to win the hearts of all Mrs. Stowe's readers as well. A benevolent old spinster, Miss Mehitable Rossiter, adopts the child in fear and trembling, reasonably dreading the disapproval of a stern old domestic, who is at once her servant and mistress. But Tina twists even the formidable Polly round her little fingers, and shakes the awful despotism the veteran housekeeper had established in the regions of the kitchen. The child is a mimic by nature, and delights the puritan parish by performances where they can conscientiously taste something of the forbidden delights of the stage. She presses all the world into acting in her private theatricals, and one exquisite scene demonstrates the abject subservency to which she had broken even the grim Polly. The children were getting up a sort of private play founded on the history of Queen Esther:—

"The great trouble was to find a Haman, but as the hanging of Haman was indispensable to any proper moral effect of the tragedy, Tina petted and coaxed and cajoled old Bose, the yellow dog of our establishment, to undertake the part, instructing him volubly that he must sulk and look cross when Mordecai went by,—a thing which Bose, who was one of the best-natured of dogs, found difficulty in learning. Bose would always insist upon sitting on his haunches in his free-and-easy, jolly manner, and lolling out his red tongue in a style so decidedly jocular as utterly to spoil the effect, till Tina, reduced to desperation, ensconced herself under an old quilted petticoat behind him, and brought out the proper expression at the right moment by a vigorous pull at his tail. Bose was a dog of great constitutional equanimity, but there were some things that transcended even his power of endurance, and the snarl that he gave to Mordecai was held to be a triumphant success; but the thing was to get him to snarl when Tina was in front of him, where she could see it, and now will it be believed that the all-conquering little mischief-maker actually kissed and flattered and beguiled old Polly into taking this part behind the scenes!"

Perhaps it was but natural that this piquante spoilt child should become less interesting if not less captivating when she has to submit herself as she grows up to proprieties and conventionalities. As a girl she witches every one, even to the unflappable old divines who direct her studies; but somehow, if she has much of a heart, we never seem to get at it, and if we always admire, we never feel in thorough sympathy with her. Her end is a sad one. She is captivated by the showy villain of the tale, and begins on the very afternoon of her wedding to pay the penalty of her failings in a shock of disillusion which is followed by long years of wretchedness. Not until we are taking leave of her at the end of the book does she subside into peace and domestic happiness with her constant early admirer, Horace Holyoke. To adopt what might have been the language of her Oldtown friends in the circumstances, justice is finally tempered with mercy, and so far all is right.

Still, we cannot help thinking Mrs. Stowe might have made better use of a subject so promising by giving us glimpses at a deeper underflow of passion beneath the ripple of Tina's caprices and graces. Henry Percival, her brother, as a child, is little less taking than his sister, and his steadfast, unhesitating faith in the Almighty love and mercy is brought in as an admirable foil to the uncompromising teachings and practice of the Calvinistic dogmatism around him. Horace Holyoke himself has a most felicitous talent for Boswellizing his village neighbors, and letting us see them in the very flesh and spirit. Everything that is tinged with local color becomes a reality to us, and we get so charmed with the company of the country folks that we are loath to leave them for more distinguished society. We quit the homely settlements and their pure American atmosphere of genuine drollery and rough eloquence to find ourselves with regret back among the more familiar characters of our ordinary fictions. Fortunately the one infinitely predominates over the other, and we see but little more of the latter than suffices to make us appreciate the former. In the rich and brilliant Ellery Davenport, with his foreign training and air of high society, we recognize one of our acquaintances. It is fair to remark, however, that even him Mrs. Stowe credits with an individuality all his own. His absence would have left a blank in her comprehensive scheme of opinion, and he figures as the representative of a certain school of cultivated rationalism, a novelty in those early days of the Great Republic. But any one of half a dozen of the Oldtown folks could make the reputation of an every-day novel. If there is, perhaps, some unavoidable iteration in the theological dialogues and disquisitions, they are so pregnant with original ideas and suggestions throughout that one is amply repaid for reading them conscientiously. Then Mrs. Stowe's theological teachings are heightened and lightened by the drollest little episodes. As, for instance, when Horace, moved by the morbid curiosity that has preyed on his childish mind, speculates on the possible consequences of a horrible form of crime until he is compelled to commit it,—on the effect of uttering the awful "damn," instead of the popular "darn." Retiring to hazard the daring experiment in private, he feels degraded and half disappointed when no signal judgment follows on the impiety. "The Lord apparently did not think him worth his notice." Yet with all this treading the edge of ground so delicate, Mrs. Stowe never degenerates into profanity nor does she even pass the bounds of good taste. Hers is a book that seduces one into quotation, and you lay it down after all with a dissatisfied feeling that your quotations might have been happier, and that you may have only done the author injustice, while deluding your readers with the idea that you have been making a selection of her gems.

LIFE AND DEATH AT ST. BREACA'S.

IN EIGHT CHAPTERS. CHAPTER VI.

"I SHALL go to St. Breaca's to look after that poor fellow this morning," said Mr. Hoskins to his wife, ten days after Augustine's return home. "The fright has sobered him by this time, and I don't mean to 'whistle him down the wind.'"

"That's right, John; and find out what upset him; he'll have told his mother, I'll be bound. Old Betty has heard that he is mad after that French girl at the Gray House. If his father was like any one else, he would soon settle the business, but he only spoils what he meddles with; and soft-spoken as he is, I believe Mrs. Secker dare n't say her soul's her own. I hope you'll bring the lad back; the house is not the same without him."

"No. I miss him, I can tell you, and I doubt if I could replace him if I would. I shall try to see his mother alone."

Mr. Hoskins's fast-trotting mare, Jenny Quick, carried him briskly to St. Breaca's. Mr. Secker was reading prayers, — Friday; Augustine had gone with him. All served the good doctor's purpose; and as Mrs. Secker was simplicity itself, he was quickly in possession of all the information he wanted.

"Just as I feared," he said; "but keep up your spirits. I think I see my way, but I won't reckon my chickens yet. Tell Augustine that my wife wants him to come to-morrow, and stay till Monday. She has forgotten the proportions of a vile compound of senna, quassia, and ginger which he mixes, and she persuades some poor bodies to swallow. You can let him know that I am not savage. Poor fellow! there never was a better lad. What a blessed thing it would be if your sex would let ours alone! — You don't like that. Never mind. No one could ever suspect you of weaving snares for a poor fool. Kind regards to Mr. Secker. He does n't need to be told that he's welcome to a glass of the old brown sherry as often as he'll come for it. — I can't stay to see him, thank you. — The big boys are at school, I suppose? Those are fine bouncing fellows; you ought to have a premium for them."

"Poor, dear fellow," said Mrs. Hoskins, when her husband had told her all he had gleaned; "no wonder he did n't know what he was about. What a pity! I wonder if Mr. Monsey did really annoy her, or if she only said so to make Augustine jealous? Whichever way it was, a proper-minded girl would not have told him anything of the kind; but I suppose foreigners can't behave decently. Is not Mrs. Secker very angry?"

"I should think so. The quiet little woman was like a sheep stamping at a big dog, by way of protecting her lamb. She does not approve of the girl."

"Well, what do you mean to do?"

"In the first place, I won't let Secker go back. She can't come after him here. I must watch that he does no mischief. I shall tell him that, of course, she cannot stay at the Gray House, and that he must tell her to give notice at once."

"But where is she to go?"

"Why, oddly enough, those dear old maids at Myldmouth complained to me only yesterday that people were gone so mad after French (Jemima interjected that she really believed they thought no other language was spoken in heaven) that their school was going down for want of a resident Parisian. They dreaded the expense of bringing one from Paris, or even London, and could hear of none in the neighborhood. I shall represent Ma'amselle as put providentially in their way. I'm sure they'll bite." Mrs. Hoskins shook her silvered head, and looked doubtful. "Now, that I call straining at gnats, Sabina," said her husband. "I'd by no means send the girl into a private family, for there she might make more misery; but I defy her to get at the other sex while she is under Miss Wiseman's whalebone rule."

"But she may injure the girls."

"I don't think so, upon my word. I really believe that a poacher makes a good keeper."

"Well, I hope it may answer."

"At all events, we'll try."

Mrs. Hoskins threw her arms round Augustine's neck when he returned, and Mr. Hoskins's eyes were moist when he gave him his hand. The poor fellow himself was choked with emotion. They comforted him, and he fell into their views readily; and before he went to bed the first night, he wrote to propose the plan to Jeanne, and his letter ended thus: "I cannot eat or sleep; application to my business is simply impossible, till you are safe with kind good women. Under the most favorable circumstances, it must be long before I can give my Jeanne her own home, but I want to be fit to begin to work for that object. Myldmouth is thirty miles hence. We will write often, and hope to meet sometimes. Can you guess how often your eyes float before me? how often I hear your light footstep, the rustle of your pretty dress? All, all, so wonderfully, so indescribably dear. How cruel it is that anything approaching to a decent likeness is beyond the reach of poor people like you and me! But if I had yours, I should waste half my time in pondering over it, and finding it unworthy of you. I am impatient for your answer. I kiss your dear little hands, especially that mystical finger, and am your fondly devoted

"AUGUSTINE SECKER."

Jeanne replied: —

"MY VERY MUCH LOVED, — I have kissed your letter over and over again, laid my cheek on it, tied it up in my curls, with my tears wetted it. Of course I want to leave this odious place. I have all arranged. I have seen Mrs. Monsey, and said to her that I could no longer stay. She said I was in the right, and she would speak well of me. Your friends will write to her to inquire about me, — that is the proper thing. Oh! I do want to go; but when shall I see you? How hard it is to love as we love, and be separated! Is not this life very strange and miserable? How good you are to forgive me all the harm I have done you! Your mother will never. But you will not change. All the books say how inconstant is man; but no, you are not. You will never break the heart of your Jeanne, who adores you."

CHAPTER VII.

The Misses Wiseman engaged Jeanne to go to them after the Christmas holidays. The coach in which she must travel passed Mr. Hoskins's door daily. He and his wife agreed to invite her to stay two days, and to start from their house. They hoped the engagement would come to nothing, but decided that, so long as it existed, its business ought to be conducted openly and respectably. Prejudiced though they were, Jeanne's tact brought them to the admission that her lover's infatuation was not without excuse. He was very happy. Her coming, a guest, where he lived, seemed an earnest of a future home together. She was going where all was unexceptionable and every one good. She had made a favorable impression, and he might hope to welcome her back again. He whistled as he stood at the garden-gate, watching for the mail. He had never thought the white frost, the holly-berries, the robins, the early sunshine, so joyous. The guard's horn, the crack of the whip, the steam even from the horses, all was cheery; and the coach was empty, and would be for the next stage. It had been settled that he should go so far, and walk back. It was almost like starting on one's bridal tour. That Jeanne was subdued, gave him, for once, no pain. It was so very sweet to comfort her as man is meant to comfort woman, and to be sure that she was sorry to part from him. The drive seemed strangely short. The last loving words were exchanged, the last kiss was given, and Augustine was on his way home. He walked fast, as a young man with full heart and busy mind does walk, and he did not observe the changing weather till heavy rain began to fall. He was very warm, and it chilled him. He had no umbrella, and was wet through, when he had yet four miles to go. When he came in, Mr. Hoskins shook his head; Mrs. Hoskins sent him into a hot bed, and gave him stimulants; but next day, and many days after, he was feverish, and racked with pain. "He has no stamina, and his mother's family are consumptive, and this, coming after all his worry, is serious. If it goes to his lungs, we shall not save him," said Mr. Hoskins.

If there was one person more odious than another to the Misses Wiseman of Hayfield House, Myd-mouth, it was a flirt. The moment they saw Jeanne, their hearts contracted, and they would have rid themselves of her at once, unexceptionable as seemed her testimonials, if it could have been done honorably. "We must keep her for a quarter before we give her notice," said Miss Margaret to her eldest sister, when they returned from church after Mademoiselle Royer's first appearance there with them. "The way she threw those great eyes of hers all round, especially on that young curate, was such a distraction to me, that I could think of nothing else. I have no more idea of the text than if I had not heard it; and I have to find fault by and by with the children who cannot give a good account of the sermon!"

"We need not keep her so long as that," returned her sister, "unless she conduct herself well, and that, I think, is very improbable. What a trial it will be to go out to walk with her! She cannot stand, hold her head, use her handkerchief, do anything like any one else. She is an embodiment of vain self-consciousness. Nothing can be worse than her example for the elder girls, especially as they think her very pretty, and have taken a great fancy to her. I cannot help suspecting that Mr. Hoskins recommended her from compassion, or to oblige a friend, or from some other motive which will not bear investigation. Very unfair, if he did."

"I will set Mrs. Sharpe to try to find out something about her," said Margaret; and that lady, visiting a great deal, was not long in ascertaining the connection between the French girl and Mr. Hoskins's handsome assistant, with its concomitant disagreeables. Thenceforward, the sisters could hardly repress a wish that she would commit herself; but there was no denying that she was clever, industrious, and peculiarly obliging.

Mr. Secker had not accepted current events; that, indeed, could not have been expected from him. Through the suspension of amity with the family at the Gray House, he lost many pleasant hours; and though he was addicted to expressions of contemptuous pity for men or women who had "no resources in themselves," time hung heavily on his hands. Taste for study he had not; his temperament was incapable of concentration. His parochial work was light between Sundays, for the sick — and he did not resent it — preferred the Wesleyan minister, who did not read prayers out of a book. Even when he was good tempered, the inevitable discomforts of his poor home irritated his delicate nerves and affronted his tastes; and it was all so much worse in winter. In summer evenings, he would have taken long rapid walks, while his imagination ran wild in framing conversations never to be held, and letters never to be required. He was very sore about Augustine's sudden summons back by Mr. Hoskins. "Had I been a man of fortune," said he, "or even the incumbent of a small living, he would not have presumed to treat my son so." When he became aware that Jeanne Royer had been the Hoskinses' guest, he declared that he and his family were victims of a conspiracy to crush them to the dust. That step did indeed seem unkind even to gentle Mrs. Secker, and she could not refrain from saying, "I never would have believed it; I thought they would do all they could to keep her out of his way." It is very difficult to do good, and we have to mourn sometimes over the success of our plans. Mr. and Mrs. Hoskins had alienated the Seckers, displeased the Misses Wiseman, placed Jeanne Royer in a position which was thoroughly irksome to her, and the youth whom they had striven to serve was dying! The cold caught on that walk home had settled on his lungs, and his most attached friends had provided the inducement to take the walk, had even proposed it to him!

Who, that is not very young, does not know the deceitfulness of consumption? Its pauses, its fluctuations, its hopefulness. The weather is to be milder or steadier; something unusual or unsuspected in the case or the constitution will be developed: this victim will certainly not die. Some one else was as ill — worse even — years ago; had at first identical symptoms; and look at him now! Think of all the fine healthy men he has out-lived!

Thus had Augustine Secker's loving watchers talked when May came; and then he was too weak to leave his bed. He had gone home early in April. Mrs. Hoskins would have nursed him; but he wanted his mother, and his mother wanted him. The women understood one another by that time, and compromised. Mr. Hoskins was to see him often; and from his house was to come every comfort.

"The one thing I dread daily and hourly," had the poor fellow said, "is my father's tongue. It would not be intolerable if he would let that poor girl alone; but to be bound by filial duty to hear silently all that he says and insinuates about her, is maddening. Setting affection aside, she is a woman, and young and unprotected. He should reflect that Sophia may be situated some day as she is."

"He never does reflect," returned the mother, incautiously: "he would not hurt your feelings if he did, for he is miserable about your illness."

"And yet he retards my recovery! I wonder it does not occur to him that it is hard, very hard, for us never to see one another: you understand that, though you don't like poor Jeanne."

"I can, my darling; and I will never say a word against her, or do anything that you would dislike."

Many similar conversations had these two; and long silences, when often she yearned to know if he were aware of his real state, or if she or anybody ought to tell him. If his father had been like her ideal of a Christian minister, how gently he would have broken the awful news! how soothingly they would have read, and wept, and prayed together!

Mr. Hoskins was of opinion that Augustine's professional knowledge prevented his being in the dark; that he talked cheerfully, partly to keep up his mother's spirits, partly because self-delusion was contingent on the disease. A bright morning came, when he wished his mother would air his summer clothes, he should want them soon. She did air them; and the following night was far advanced when he said, abruptly, "My head is becoming very odd; read the seventeenth of St. John."

She did read it.

"Call my father. — Kiss me."

He was gasping, when Mr. Secker fell on his knees by the bedside sobbing, "My boy, my first-born, has it come to this?"

"He wants to kiss you — quick," urged the mother.

He placed his cheek close to the trembling lips, and heard their last utterance: "All forgiven — don't be unkind — poor little Jeanne!"

When Jeanne received, in a kind note from Mrs. Hoskins, the intelligence of Augustine's death, she, according to Miss Wiseman, "threw herself into violent hysterics." How, that lady argued, could a girl, who, though engaged, and aware of her lover's illness, spared no pains to make the best of her appearance, and did all she could to attract other men, have any real sorrow for his death, though it lay at her door? But Jeanne was prostrate. She had loved him as deeply as she could love any one, better than she should ever love again, and she knew how fondly he had loved her, how entirely he had believed in her. She was sure that he had died without regretting that he had known her; but might he not, disembodied, be aware of all her duplicity? Would his spirit, reproachful, though tender, be near her in the loneliness of the night? Would not an intolerable horror surround her in the darkness? Death had never confronted her before; it had been an indistinct something that happened to other people, — no affair of hers. But here was a man, very little older than herself, — full of vigor, handsome, — dead! and if he had never known her, he might still be living. Again, she had been taught her religion early and carefully. She had never lost the conviction that she had committed a deadly sin in denying it. If she had been true to it, she might have converted this man; he would have listened to anything she said. But she had led him to believe that she despised popery, and worshipped with him, and he had died without the sacraments!

But the Misses Wiseman could guess none of this, and thought she was acting, and had "no patience with her." On the following morning came a letter from Lotty Monsey, saying that if she liked to go and pay a visit at the Gray House, mamma would be happy to see her, and she could come as soon as she liked, and need not write; that they, the girls, should be delighted to have her; they had no new governess, and Suzanne was generally cross, and they were very dull. Jeanne kissed the writing over and over. Anything was preferable to the Hayfield House rigid routine. It would be a relief to get away from the place where she had first realized Augustine's death. She felt as if he had died in her room. Miss Wiseman made no difficulty about her going; and when she asked how long she could be spared, said that it need not be decided then, — that she would write to her. So she started by the mail.

When she reached St. Breaca's next morning, the church-bell was tolling. She guessed for what purpose; and when she entered the Gray House, there were more hysterics; and Mrs. Monsey said that people who were violent in their grief soon got over it. Her daughters were very compassionate; and Suzanne showed an amount of kindness to the poor girl which she had never shown for her before, and put her to bed, and stayed with her till sleep came.

Next day she was well enough to send for materials, and begin making mournings. She was a born milliner, and it suited her taste as well as her pocket to make her own clothes. No one whom she could afford to employ would have adapted them so skilfully to her. She put a widow's cap into a coquettish bonnet; and having, according to Mrs. Hoskins's advice, written to ask Mrs. Secker to let her call on her, she set out with that purpose on the day fortnight of Augustine's burial. The last time she had walked to the house had been with his father, and his evident admiration had been acceptable to her vanity. "The foolish old man has never forgiven me for preferring his son," said she to herself. But shame and sorrow oppressed her as she went on, and her knees were weak and her heart was sick when she reached the door. It helped her, and indeed every one, that Mr. Secker was at home, and that, acting as he conceived "a perfect gentleman and man of the world" should act in such circumstances, he talked on indifferent and trifling subjects. They, on the brink of tears, could not. Miss Secker and Sophia had kissed her, and she had whispered to each: "Pity me, and try to forgive me"; but she could say nothing of the kind to him. By and by, in a thick voice, she asked if she might look among Augustine's papers for her letters to him. Mrs. Secker started, and replied that none of his things had been touched yet, meaning to convey that she could not yet bear to do anything with them; but Jeanne did not understand, and suggested timidly that perhaps Miss Secker would go with her into his room, and stay with her while she found them. So they went. As soon as they were there, the awful sense of death present, which Jeanne hoped she had shaken off, rushed over her, and with it came tenderness and compunction. She threw herself on the bed, and cried aloud. Mr. Secker had expected "a scene" — rather wished for it, in fact; the softness evoked by his dying son's last words had passed for the time, and his inferior nature predominated. In a minute he was at the bedside, with cruel indifference in his eyes and voice.

"Dear Miss Royer," he said, "I have a wife and children whom I cannot allow to be excited in this manner. They have suffered very much lately, as you are aware. You must let me take you into the other room. You may rely upon my sending your letters to you."

She submitted, cowed, and said she would go. He made no opposition; but Sophia's soft young heart was touched, and she was about to offer to walk with her, when a stern glance from her father, and a warning one from her mother, checked her. "Poor little thing," she said afterwards; "I could not bear her going alone; she looked so young, so childlike, except her eyes, in that cap; and she must have been very miserable." Yes, she was; quite as miserable as culpable. As she chose back streets, that she might weep unheeded behind her thick veil, she breathed air defiled by stale tobacco and refuse of fish; squalid children quarrelled for disgusting trifles, and women scolded as they scold only in low marine districts. Further on—it was low water—the black timbers of the pier, and the mud in the shipwrights' yards, suggested to her disturbed imagination horrors going on secretly in lately filled graves. The dogs at the Gray House barked savagely till she was admitted, and slunk away snarling afterwards. Mr. and Mrs. Monsey were wrangling in the drawing-room, their daughters keeping out of the way in their bedrooms.

CHAPTER VIII.

"Tell me if you think this will do, Margaret," said Miss Wiseman to her sister a fortnight later, giving her a note to read:—

"DEAR MISS ROYER,—My sister and I are of opinion that it will be more satisfactory both to you and ourselves that you do not return hither. We do not feel that it is necessary to write more explicitly, and we enclose the amount of salary which would be due to you if you remained with us three months from the present date. We shall be obliged to you for a receipt, and glad to find that the luggage you left reaches you safely: we forward it to-day, carriage paid. Should you think it expedient to refer to us, we will state that you are fully competent to teach your own language, and by no means deficient in industry.

"I remain yours truly,

"LUCRETIA WISEMAN."

Another blow! Not that she regretted that formal establishment, but it threw her completely on the Monseys, and she had perceived that they did not wish her to stay long. Mrs. Monsey had spoken more than once of her return to Hayfield House as a fact to be speedily accomplished. She knew that the whole family watched her while she read the note, received at breakfast. She must tell them its purport, because her boxes would arrive. Laying it before Mrs. Monsey, she said, "More trouble for me."

"Very provoking, indeed," was her observation, as she passed it to her husband.

He read it slowly. "Deuced awkward, upon my word, Mademoiselle. It was only yesterday that Mrs. Monsey and I were lamenting that circumstances would prevent our offering you a bed for more than a week longer. I should recommend your advertising. Or what do you think of returning to Paris? Your English experiment has not been successful; and no doubt you have friends there who could take care of you for a time."

It was no surprise, but bitterly painful. A shadow darkened her pale face, and she said, "Thank you, Mr. Monsey, I will take a long walk, and consider what I had better do." She left the room.

"I shall be glad when she is safely off the premises," remarked Mr. Monsey. "It was confounded folly to bring her here. I can't imagine what possessed you to do it. The girl is ill, and desperate. A pretty business it would be if she had a fever in the house, or took it into her head to destroy herself."

"I wish you would n't say such horrid things, Arthur; you make me quite nervous. I asked her here to please the girls; they were wild to have her and it made a little change for them."

Jeanne kept tears back till she reached her room, then let them flow passionately for a while. She bathed her face, took a strong dose of lavender, wrote a receipt for Miss Wiseman, and two letters. Next she took a packet from her desk, put it in her pocket, and dressed to go out. Lotty looked in, and asked if she should go with her.

"No, dear; thank you; I should be a wretched companion to-day, and I could not make any plans if I had you to talk to."

"Well, don't be longer away than you can help," said the good-natured girl, kissing her. "If we are to lose you so soon, we must make the most of you."

Out of that desolate house, and away; first to Augustine's grave. It had been her intention to place a headstone there as soon as she could afford it. The act would soothe her, and be some reparation to his family. Had he lain where no one could see her, she would have thrown herself on the ground, reproached herself, and implored his pardon and pity aloud; but the churchyard was overlooked on one side, and hundreds of eyes might watch her. She did not stay long; she wanted solitude; wanted to be where there was no indication of human existence. It was easy to indulge the feeling. Just round a promontory nothing could be seen but the little bay and its beautiful wild coast. The tide was high, the day calm. She scrambled down into a cove where she and Augustine had often sat and talked. She remembered that the last time they were there together she had thought as she looked down into the clear placid depth, and watched the graceful sea-plants waving gently, as if they sought to prolong to the utmost their enjoyment of the delicious water, that it was no wonder weary wretches sprang into such places to end their woes. She had even said so to him, and he had shaken his head, and replied, "A bad thought, my sweet: depend upon it, suicide is the most atrocious of crimes,—don't try to throw any poetry over it."

And she had really wondered, and returned, "Now, I can't see that; I can see that it is horrible to take another's life, but one's own —"

"Is not one's own, my Jeanne, and taking it is the sin which puts repentance out of the sinner's power. See how that aggravates its wickedness."

Why did she think of this at that moment? she asked herself. Was it an impulse of grace beckoning her to the only safe course left? Return to Paris, candid avowal of her faults, meek submission to their consequences, commencement of a life in which gratification of vanity and worldly aggrandizement should not be principles of action. "It is not in me," her mind went on; "I cannot do it. I was born for pleasure, born to be admired, loved, worshipped; I am fit for nothing else, and all this is denied me,—there is no patient drudge in me." She took out the packet she had brought,—Augustine's letters to her, hers to him. She kissed his, read some of her own, torn them all as small as possible, and scattered them to the sea. She was cold; she got up and walked to and fro the little beach as fast as the shingle would let her. Then she thought she would like to look at St. Breaca's, and began to climb a high rock whence part of the town could be seen. She was near the summit when her foot slipped, and she fell backwards. She shrieked with all her strength, and stretched out eager agonized hands. In vain! Her skull was fractured in her descent, and the sea received her a battered corpse.

Men in a distant fishing-vessel heard her last cry, wondered what it was, then supposed they had fancied it, but remembered it with terrible surmises when, three or four weeks later the county paper mentioned the finding of a woman's body some miles down the coast. It defied recognition, and was buried by the parish, after a verdict of "Found Drowned."

Jeanne had left a letter on her dressing-table, directed to Mr. Monsey, but placed under the looking-glass, in order that it might not be found too soon. She said:—

"DEAR MR. MONSEY, — I will not intrude longer on your hospitality. I enclose you a letter which will explain my intentions. When you have read it, will you have it posted? I cannot write it twice, and I want you to understand that you need not fear my troubling you any more. I will only ask you to order all that I have left in your house to be given to Suzanne. I remain yours truly,
"JEANNE ROYER."

The letter was directed,—"Madame Royer, Poste Restante," Paris. It ran as follows:—

"When you receive this, I shall be dead, and there will be no clew to me. I am ill, wretched, mad perhaps. Those women have forbidden me to return to them. I cannot stay in this house. Where shall I go? There is no place in the world for me. The good do not trust me; the bad do not want me. It is not easy to forgive you for being my mother; but I try to do so, for I believe that you have loved me. Farewell.

"JEANNE."

Mr. Monsey was not much surprised, — not shocked, but very uncomfortable during the succeeding fortnight, lest the unhappy girl's remains should be brought to his house.

Madame Royer had a fever, which reduced her to the gates of death; and after her recovery, devoted herself humbly to works of mercy.

Mrs. Secker and the Hoskinss grieved for Jeanne, as the thoughtful and feeling ought to grieve for one so pitifully wrecked.

It has been stated that even the most terrible husbands have soft moments. Mrs. Secker took advantage of such an interval, — with what object is not evident, — to represent to hers that had he been influenced by her, and avoided the Monseys, Augustine might be living and prosperous, and Jeanne Royer, differently circumstanced, might have turned out well. "But, my dear child," said she to Sophia, "it is really of no use whatever to talk to your father: he cannot, or will not see anything as any one else does. All I could get out of him was, 'Very logical indeed, Mrs. Secker. Upon my word, I congratulate you; your conclusions are so perfectly satisfactory to yourself. Now, for me, I confess humbly that whenever I meddle with cause and effect I get completely adrift.'"

DOMESTIC SERVICE ILLUSTRATED BY THE NOVELIST.

WHEN a certain advanced school of philosophy has had its way we shall hear no more of fidelity as a virtue. It will be gone out of fashion as a half-developed canine phase of humanity. In the mean while, however, it is invaluable to the novelist, and will continue so to be as long as there is a craving in people to be loved and looked up to for something unearned and beside their merits. When once the gauge of desert comes in, the proudest and vainest has an inner qualm and shrinks back to another standard. We like to be convinced that there is something in us and about us, independent of our occasional lapses, that insures not only obedience but willing submission. It is pleasant to escape the penetrative scrutiny of equals by withdrawing into a region where our will is law, not only because it is strongest, but because it is ours, and therefore taken for granted, where we may repose upon a deference that accepts our definitions of right as unquestionable. It is this feeling that makes the portrait of a faithful servant always attractive. A sort of virtue is there depicted which is admirable in its self-denial, and at the same time makes no heavy demands on our own practice. No doubt the very nature of service implies the duty of some suppression of the critical faculty on the part of him who serves. The master may judge his man, where the man had best not judge his master. Blind loyalty, once the gentleman's fidelity, we may be said to have outgrown as a political virtue, but we still delight to see it portrayed as a domestic one. Hence, whenever fiction condescends to delineate service at all, to hold up examples of it for our admiration, it is in the exhibition of a blind, unreasoning fidelity.

Even comedy, the recognized form of satire on human folly and baseness, makes the servant — greedy and grasping as he is — take his view of life from his master, and run personal risks to serve him. But it is in the novel that we must look for the passion of fidelity set off by the humors which make delineations of our social inferiors so especially stimulating to self-esteem. It is in the novel that we may see how dear to the heart of man is the notion of being the object of an unreasoning, instinctive faithfulness. A hero is twice a hero with his inseparable follower, comic or tragic, whether that hero be Mr. Pickwick, with Sam Weller qualifying himself to be still his master's body servant in the Fleet, or old Caleb Balderstone starving and thieving for his master's credit in the bleak tower of Wolf's Crag. It only needs the vivid impersonation of a servitor so in love with service that he shall without effort, without thinking of sacrifice, have no private interests — or else, as a matter of course and without a struggle, make them give place to his master's — to excite in the reader's mind a very peculiar gratification. Old Orlando, who so well exemplified the constant service of the antique world when servants sweated for duty not for meed, did it without requiring a return, but looked forward to the time as simply inevitable

"When service should in my old limbs be lame,
And unregarded age in corners thrown."

It is so recognized a feature of the conventional servitor to have no plans for the future, that it is made a trait in the venal crew of "High Life below Stairs" that one thinks himself sure of a place in the Customs, and a selfish couple look forward to keeping a public-house together. So entirely are we removed from inconvenient personal applications in these fancy pictures of self-devotion, that we expect as a matter of course that the master's interests should be always uppermost. The ideal retainer need not be perfect; if his sins are committed for his chief, he finds us lenient judges. Everybody sympathizes with the "savage fidelity" of Elspeth of the Craighurnfoot, in which she found a stern and stubborn satisfaction. "No man in old time parted frae his chief for love of gold or of gain, or of right or of wrang." She had served the head of Glenallan as she was required to serve her. "None shall say I betrayed my mistress, though it were to save my soul."

A thoroughgoing popular novel constantly owes its popularity to the relation between master and servant. What would Robinson Crusoe be without his man Friday? What would Sterne's Uncle Toby be apart from Corporal Trim, his master's humble double, — nurse, dog, and confidant in one, — with always a thought between them: —

"Trim! said my Uncle Toby after he had lighted his pipe and smoked about a dozen whiffs, — Trim came in front of his master and made his bow, — my Uncle Toby smoked on and said no more. Corporal! said my Uncle Toby, — the Corporal made his bow, — my Uncle Toby proceeded no further, but finished his pipe. Trim! said my Uncle Toby, I have a project in my head."

For our part it would be a bore to have to wait upon the slow smoky workings of another man's brain, but Trim is supposed to like it. The whole fits in with the ideal much better than if Trim had had even the most retiring, modest interests of his own, which could not fail to make indefinite suspense on his master's cogitations irksome. Sam Weller is for the same reason one of the most popular of modern creations; his wit would not tell half as much without his exuberant and jealous fidelity: —

"I could serve that gentleman till I fell down dead," says the repentant Job. "I say," said Sam, "I'll trouble you, my friend — none o' that. None o' that, I say, young feller. No one serves him but me."

And when Mr. Pickwick wants to settle him in life with his Mary, not even love offers a moment's temptation: —

"If you want a more polished sort o' feller, well and good, — have him; but vages or no vages, notice or no notice, board or no board, lodgin' or no lodgin', Sam Weller as you took from the old inn in the Borough sticks to you come what come may; and let everythin' and everybody do their very fiercest, nothin' shall ever perwent it."

All this, though not according to our experience, sounds an excellent recipe for making life easy, and is appreciated accordingly.

Scott delights in portraying the manners of domestic service. He does not often venture to attribute to a fellow-countryman an absolute deadness to personal considerations, but he does not care to paint an unfaithful servant; and he had a power in himself of creating strong attachments in those who served him, which justified his portraits. The astute Cuddie throws himself into the lion's very clutches when with blundering gallantry he seeks the aid of Claverhouse and his dragoons for his master in the hands of fanatics. The incomparable Jenny will run more hazards for her mistress's sake than for her own. Richie Moniplies, pragmatical as he is, is profuse of his newly gained wealth in his master's service, as well as faithful under difficulties; and even the self-seeker Andrew Fair-service waits with real zeal on his rescued young master in that funereal "stand o' claes" which he had thought fit to order on his supposed death. The antiquary, to be sure, has an unfavorable experience to report which influences his view of the question: —

"Why did the boy Tam Rintherout, whom at my wise sister's instigation I, with equal wisdom, took upon trial, — why did he pilfer apples, take birds'-nests, break glasses, and ultimately steal my spectacles, except that he felt that noble emulation which swells in the bosom of the masculine sex, which has conducted him to Flanders with a musket on his shoulders, and doubtless will promote him to a glorious halberd, or even to the gallows; and why does this girl, his full sister, Jenny Rintherout, move in the same vocation with safe and noiseless step, shod or unshod, soft as the paw of a cat, and docile as a spaniel? Why? But because she is in her vocation."

This might seem to degrade the virtue of which we speak in quite a modern spirit, but that we are informed economical considerations prejudiced the speaker; and besides, all boys occupy a distinct place in fiction. The boy is universally thrown over, and is quite the reverse of the father and the man. Even Bailey Junior has no attachments, but transfers himself from mistress to master solely for his own pleasure.

It is interesting to observe how fascinating this absolute disregard of personal interests, which we understand by "fidelity," is to American writers. The New England help knows nothing of it of course, and never will. The best white servant there avowedly considers her own convenience and prospects first, and will leave her employer at any pinch when her end is served; but fiction has the negro, — has had, we should rather say, — in whom to personify an entire self-abnegation. Old Tiff, one of Mrs. Beecher Stowe's best characters, though not quite so familiar to English readers as Uncle Tom, has no private feelings of pleasure, pain, or pride. It is impossible to please or hurt him in his own person. He lives in the consequence of the "Peytons, one of the fustest families in Old Virginny," to whom he had belonged; he has no sensitiveness that is not connected with them; he works and slaves for their descendants, and teaches their children manners by setting himself up as a scarecrow and warning; and we should feel it quite a falling off if he expected even thanks in return for this wholesale self-dedication. Mr. Wendell Holmes has a picturesque old negress of the same type, granddaughter of a cannibal chief, who worships with soul, body, and instinct the mysterious Elsie Venner, living in her movements, watching her night and day with lynx-like observance, and dying on her grave, as part of her duty, when her task was done. In contrast with this self-annihilation the same story gives us in Abel a respectable representative of the New England "hired man," who, having sold his time to the doctor, took care to fulfil his half of the bargain, but could never stand the word "servant," or consider himself the inferior of the "high contracting parties," making up his mind to dismiss the old gentleman (his master) if he did not behave himself.

There is a sympathy between this view of the subject and that taken by the disciples of progress amongst ourselves. With them the virtue of fidelity takes but a low stand; subservience to one person being supposed to dilute to nothing the sense of duty we owe to society at large, whether that one be husband or master. The author of "Felix Holt" gives us an unsympathizing but very clever analysis of a retainer's fidelity in Denner, the miserable Mrs. Transome's devoted servant; one of those "faithful creatures" whom the aristocracy of mankind find so useful to their needs:—

"The physical contrast between the tall, eagle-faced, dark-eyed lady and the little peering waiting-woman, who had been round-featured and of pale mealy complexion from her youth up, had doubtless had a strong influence in determining Denner's feeling towards her mistress, which was of that worshipful sort paid to a goddess when it was not thought necessary or likely that a goddess should be very moral. There were different orders of beings,—so ran Denner's creed,—and she belonged to another order than that to which her mistress belonged. She had a mind as sharp as a needle, and would have seen through and through the ridiculous pretensions of a born servant who did not submissively accept the rigid fate which had given her born superiors. Denner identified her own dignity with that of her mistress. She was a hard-headed godless little woman, but with a character to be reckoned on as you reckon on the qualities of iron."

The same almost animal inferiority of nature makes Harold Transome's Dominic in this story the valuable servant he is:—

"O, he is one of those wonderful Southern fellows that make one's life easy. He's of no country in particular. I don't know whether he's most of a Jew or Greek, or Italian or Spaniard. He speaks five or six languages, one as well as another. He's cook, valet, major-domo, and secretary, all in one; and what's more he's an affectionate fellow. I can trust to his attachment."

We can understand how all this must offend the advocate of progress, to whom such a one is a "creature," as that word used to be applied by historians,—a thing rather than a man,—a civilized, modernized edition of Front de Bœuf's Saracens, who knew no will or conscience but their master's, and had no choice in executing his behests, whatever these might be. In fact, it may be observed that domestic service is represented in favorable colors or otherwise according to the political and moral leanings of the writer. If we recollect rightly, Miss Edgeworth and her school, representing the new lights of their day, are all hard upon servants as a low, venal, corrupting, and corruptible race. It is their aim to separate the young from all intercourse with them. Rousseau was for doing without them altogether. Men were to be waited on by their wives; they were to have no other dependants. People who resented all this flying in the face of social order exalted service on principle as a nursery of the humbler virtues. An authoress of high aims amongst ourselves, whose stories are largely accepted by readers who like a strong infusion of moral in their fiction, has actually made one of her heroines descend to it from no other necessity than the call of friendship. She is the daughter of a leading tradesman and the humble friend of a lady of rank, and for the sake of serving her friend more effectively she renounces her home for the society of ladies'-maids and butlers; she takes her seat in the rumble and frequents the back stairs, and gets into and surmounts the difficulties incident to such places and scenes.

Mr. Trollope has some good servants among his characters. He makes them faithful, for he always likes to make his readers comfortable, which the mere picture of a good servant tends to do; but being a realist, he keeps their good qualities down to a natural standard, and by no means supposes them indifferent to their names being down in their mistress's will for a reasonable legacy. We may say the same of Mrs. Gaskell, who has some lively portraits of the faithful type, not to be forgotten. The mode of treating or avoiding this subject constitutes a marked distinction between novelist and novelist. It occupied Thackeray's mind rather as a humorist than a novelist. His "Jeames" of the "Diary" is like nothing else either in nature or art, and his ballad of the nefarious butler is founded on fact. Miss Austen never attempts to portray character out of her own sphere. Richardson does not do much in this way; we recall that her malicious sister's maid is one of Clarissa's early trials, but with him the servant is invariably the reflection of the master's temper and the obedient instrument of his will. In fact, independence in this relation is, wherever we find it, a sign of modern ideas.

GUSTAVE DORÉ AT HOME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

M. TAINE said of Alfred de Musset, "He had the most precious of gifts for captivating an aged civilization,—youth." In Doré, also, this is the captivating quality. He is of his time, and in the van of the time. A strong, valiant, independent, alert mind; sharp in resolution, intensely clear and bright in vision, and wide in range. The appearance of the man is in complete harmony with his function and his force. He has the boyish brightness of face which is so often found to be the glowing mask of genius. The quick and subtly-searching eye; the proud, handsome lip; the upward throw of the massive head; and the atmosphere encompassing all,—an atmosphere that vibrates abnormally,—proclaim an uncommon presence. The value of his work apart, he is a remarkable figure of his time. He has that universality of desire, in intellectual matters, which is the distinguishing character of present mental activity. No man can have a moderately just idea of Gustave Doré who estimates him only for his executive art skill. The range of his subjects, and the speculative audacity of treatment which he shows in fervid searches after true interpretation, announce a mind that probes before it expresses itself. A critic, who visited the exhibition of his pictures in Bond Street, and, pausing before his head of his beloved friend Rossini, in death, observed that "one does n't bewail the loss of a friend, and then turn a shilling by the exhibition of his death mask," showed in his few coarse lines that he was incapable of understanding the master whose years of labor he described collectively as—trash. Such a writer is of too coarse a grain to feel the fine vibrations of a nature like that which responds generously to every enthusiasm, and glows when a new fact in science is reached, as brightly as when a Rossini creates, and a poet wakes his lyre. The reverence of Gustave Doré for the memory of the illustrious maestro can be understood in its entirety and thorough genuineness, only by those who have heard him play as well as seen him paint, and been with him at a table in a mixed society of his celebrated contemporaries. If ever a man obeyed the laureate's lesson to the author of the "New Timon," by resting heart and soul in art, and all that pertains to art in its highest and widest province; that glory belongs to the greatly gifted boy who, in his teens, took up the page of Rabelais, and showed a pictorial genius with grasp and variety enough even in its young day, to apprehend every grief, and turn, and subtlety, and humor of his glorious countryman. The outside world has been busy — zealously misinformed by critics of the grain and knowledge of the writer I have quoted — with gossip on Doré's fecundity. The secret of the produce is the prodigious strength for work of the cultivator. Sovereigns, and princes, and statesmen, making a turn in Europe, take Doré's studio, in the Rue Bayard, as one of the places of interest which the cultivated man must visit. And it is, indeed, a noble temple, lifted out of the earth by the prodigious labor of the patient and passionate lover and priest of art, who toils the day through, under its massive beams and broad-spreading top-lights.

But I can go back many years, hand in hand with the architect; and respect him the more for the travel. Chez Doré, we are now in the splendid comfort for work, which the successful man who remains a true man, loves to put about his labor. But suppose we turn back the records of fifteen years, and light upon the young artist who has just finished his Wandering Jew! I may observe, by the way, that a popular publishing firm have, with much ado, proclaimed themselves as the first introducers of Doré to the English public; the fact being that, fifteen years ago, when I was in the habit of seeing the artist at work upon the great blocks of the Wandering Jew, I suggested that it should be published by an English firm as well as by Michel Levy Frères; and it was accordingly issued by Messrs. Addey & Co. as a Christmas book, the plates being carefully printed in Paris. The rich imagination which conceived the visions, and the cunning hand that wrought them and fixed them upon paper, awoke that interest in the young illustrator of Rabelais, which has increased among unprejudiced English connoisseurs year by year, and which gave that solid basis of popularity by which Doré's enterprising English publishers of late years have profited.

When the Wandering Jew went forth to the world from the Rue Vivienne, the artist was struggling against enemies in the Academy and elsewhere, who would not rest in their malignity, and derided the genius that was not cut to their ancient pattern, as the romantic school were mocked and refused honors when Hugo, Lamartine, De Musset, and Theophile Gautier, and the rest, alive to the warmth as well as the light of the sun (just the distinction, it occurs to me, between the so-called romantic and classical schools), were threatened with intellectual death under the lash of Viennet, and other contemporary wearers of classical staves.

In the young artist, whose work for the publishers was the solid fulcrum by which the painter was to raise himself presently, there was the lion heart, the confidence which is inseparable from real power, and the broad intellectual range. The nature of the gifted man was liberal in its proneness to absorb knowledge, and to profit by every aptitude for gathering that which is beautiful in life and nature. The eye was ever gypsying on the mountain or in the valley; the ear was absorbed by the witcheries and grandeur of music; and the speculative mind was hastening always from point to point of the glittering intellectual horizon. The general man must be understood, before the special form in which he is impelled to express himself to the world can be wholly comprehended and accounted for.

In Doré, that which is most respectable, I will even say venerable, is the quality for which no credit has been given to him. The world has been taught to accept for sleight of hand that exquisite easy skill which is the growth of laborious hours passed in the earliest gray lights of mornings; when holiday, and much of working, Paris, was still under the édredon! It was in the early working days I first knew him, when he was drawing hard in the morning, at home, and spending his afternoons in his studio in the Latin quarter, — painting against the unfriendly present, for the future. The delightful pictures of the field flowers and grasses which are among the gems Doré has brought to London this summer, are but perfect presentments of patient and familiar interviews with nature held fifteen years ago. The foolish, ill-directed spectator sees the labor of a few hours consummated by a swift hand; whereas he should recognize the fruit, slowly ripened, of a noble life passed in art. The artist is still the student, taking the pleasures of the world soberly, and pushing them sternly away when they threaten to infringe on the holy part of life, — that in which every good man works.

I met Doré at an Embassy ball last autumn, gay in the midst of the soft light and softer laughter, and full of ceaseless talk. He broke away suddenly, seeing the early morning hour, saying, "I must to bed. Three hours are barely rest enough for a worker!" The time was something under 3 A. M.

There is work in the pleasure, there is study in the street. We were driving through Windsor Park last summer, and Doré's eyes covered the landscapes as they were unfolded before us, but he made no note, great as his delight was in the grandest of parks. A lady asked whether he would not like to stop at some of the points, and make some sketches.

"No, no," he said, never taking his eyes off the scenery; "I've a fair quantity of collodion in my head."

When we were at Bologne together in 1855, to see the disembarkation of the queen, Doré intently watched the leading points of the great ceremonial, and by way of fixing a few matters of detail in his memory, made some hasty pencil marks in a tiny book he carried in his waistcoat pocket. This power of fixing a scene in the memory correctly belongs to the student who has been true and constant to nature. Just as Houdin so educated his son's observation as to impress every article in a toyshop window upon his memory at a glance; so the student whose training has the grandest object — that of giving enduring forms to beauty — acquires the power of eliminating his material from a confused scene, through which he is fleetly travelling. But only the artist who honestly lives in art obtains complete power over art material, and thorough command of beauty hidden to the common world, in all kinds of out-of-the-way places. I have often heard sympathetic students of Doré's genius notice the head and tail pieces of his Don Quixote, as exquisite bits of observation rendered in masterly sketches. The village scraps are racy stories told with a stroke or two of the pencil. A touch of the brush plumps you in Seville. Let those conscientious dwellers on an artist's work, who love to get on terms of familiarity with his genius, and to mark all the richness of its by-play, turn from Don Quixote to a less known series of illustrations by the same thinker and observer with his pencil.

I remember running through some twenty numbers of the Tour du Monde, one morning in the Rue Bayard, having found them lying about the studio. Doré's Spanish pencillings, by the way, were scattered through the pages. The variety of interest in the subjects was the most striking characteristic of the series. The artist had caught every phase of life, — from the palace, in the fierce light and heat, to the dusky poor-house gate, and the beggars' haunts by the church doors. He touched upon each incident and peculiarity of interest, as he carelessly turned the pages with the paper-knife, cutting as he went. The man had been thinking, while the artist had been taking in local form and color. Here was the work of the artist of broad sympathies, of constant speculation, the beloved of men of all the arts. For that which distinguishes Doré, chez lui, is the art atmosphere in which his pleasures take their rise. In the spacious salon of the Faubourg St. Germain, covered with his work, is a little world of art. The professor of science, the man of letters, the gifted songstress, the physician, the composer, the actor, make up the throng; and the amusements are music and discourse of things which are animating the centres of intellect.

A happier and nobler picture than this handsome square salon, alive with the artist's friends, each one specially gifted, and with the painter-musician in the centre, dreamily talking of some passing incident of scientific interest, with his fingers wandering listlessly over the strings of his violin, could not be — of success turned to worthy ends. The painter has been through a very hard day's toil. You have only to open a door beyond the salle-à-manger to light upon a workroom packed with blocks and proofs, pencils and tints and sketches. A long morning here, followed by a laborious afternoon in the Rue Bayard, have earned the learned leisure among intellectual kindred upon this common ground of art, where all bring something to the picnic. Frolic fancy is plentiful. Old friends are greeted with a warmth we formal people cannot understand. The world-famous man is mon cher Gustave, with proud motherly eyes beaming upon him, and crowds of the old familiars of childhood with affectionate hands upon his shoulders. Dinner is accompanied by bright, wise, unconstrained talk; coffee and cigars in the lofty saloon; and music and laughter, the professor parleying with the poet, the song-bird with the man of science!

I make no vulgar intrusion upon Gustave Doré, gentleman. I but pursue my theme from its starting-point, insisting that the artist is astonishingly various in subject, because his mind sweeps greedily through the various spheres of intellect of his day, and he is active over a broad surface. Also, that he has much work to show, because he is an insatiable worker, and cannot get out of his art. Such art-atmosphere as that in which Doré passes his life is not in England; for the sufficient reason that the standard of the admirable is, with us, falsified, and people, become great, affect fashion with the idle and the wealthy. In France, men of letters, professors of science, physicians, composers, make together an aristocracy that is as exclusive as birth and fashion are in London. The duke goes to Doré, and is proud and privileged to go! Crowns and coronets jostled upon Rossini's staircase in the Chaussée d'Antin, and in no sense to patronize the maestro's maccaroni. The corps diplomatique is proud to repair to the salons of the regular authors in the Champs Élysées. I was reading a few days ago that the Emperor added some of his illustrious subjects to the banquet he gave his new deputies; among these, Gustave Doré.

I doubt whether our narrow circle could produce a Gustave Doré. Certainly there is no want of jealousies and heart-burnings in the literary salons and the ateliers of Paris; but there is in them an art-atmosphere which we have not got in London. In Paris there are crowds of authors and artists who live wholly in their vocation, who delight in it and want nothing out of it, and to whom it brings glory in the shape of respect from all classes of their countrymen. The very servant who dusts the scholar's books reverences the learning of his master. The artist's servant, waiting upon him, is happy in the light of his genius, and associates his humble self with the splendor which shines from the easel. This intelligence, beaming around, above, and below him, is favorable to the full and happy development of the creative powers. The artist knows that all he can produce will be understood and loved. Take the difference of direction by which the English critic and the French approach to judge.

The English critic has a few favorites, and many aversions. Mr. Ruskin is intensely English. Vain of his intellect and flash, he endeavors to force his opinion upon his readers by the brilliancy of the clothing in which he presents it. He will not see beauty many ways, and in many things. His imagination is obstinate. Beyond a sharply marked circle it never travels. He has dull imitators by the score, who dwell in coteries, and adopt a little school, and put a single painter of their acquaintance under the wing of their goose-quills. He, and he alone, is to fall under the beaming eyes of posterity. All else, in the way of contemporary art, is trash. This narrowness and false-sight may be safely said to be the effect of the art life of England, which is split up, devoid of broad sympathies, in spirit mean and vain.

Such an atmosphere is too thin for the robust lungs of the painter and pictorial poet, who can, in his light moments, throw off amusing caricatures (I take a page from my portfolio, caught when we were at Boulogne, over an after-dinner conversation and a cigar); who could plan a noble art life from his first difficult moments in obscurity, and keep steady on the giddy way through the flaming passages which lead to the temple. He must be nurtured in a whole race of artists, of all conceivable developments; in the country which shows lovers of art in blouses; that casts its salon gates wide open — free and genial as the south wind; and that can strew through a Palais de L'Industrie, such industrial learning and taste and skill as may now be seen in the Champs Élysées. In France, the servant who sweeps the atelier floor, I repeat, reverences the man who works upon it. The respect to the artist is not grudging, nor confined to a coterie. The vocation is respectable. We could have nothing in England, unfortunately, equivalent to the Quartier Latin of Paris; because we have not the general art-spirit which creates a youth full of lofty enterprise in intellectual spheres, and that will see the admirable only in the gifts of Nature.

It is the fashion — in which there is something of wicked design, I am inclined to think — to dwell on the fertility of Gustave Doré. I return to this point. His art inferiors would fain have the public believe that the power which comes of patience, is the slap-dash work of a gifted, uncultivated, careless, and greedy man, with an eye fixed on the market for his works. The truth lies in an opposite direction, as I have already observed; but this I should add,—the pictorial-poet (for Doré adds to those poets at whose fires he lights his imagination) and the painter, who illustrates at the call of publishers that he may be able to paint according to the free bent of his ambition, is a prolific illustrator, but a slow and conscientious artist.* Observe the care with which he prepared himself for the glory that is only now coming to him. For two years he pursued the anatomical courses at a Paris hospital, and dissected with the rest of the students, until he knew every muscle and articulation of the human frame, and could see, in his mind's eye, all the harmonies of motion in distant points of the frame which follow the movement of a limb. Similarly, he lay in the long grasses on summer days, and marked the intimacies of the great nature which he loved. He has travelled far and wide,—always, as he happily expressed it, on our Windsor expedition,—with plenty of collodion in his head. On the bridle-roads of Spain he has gathered rich stores of the picturesque. And, lately, in the highways and by-ways of London he has been an intrepid wanderer, as the world will know shortly. He can tell you scores of anecdotes of his travels up mountains, and of hair-breadth escapes. He is familiar with the old dens of the Montagne St. Geneviève; and we have been together among the opium-eaters of Whitechapel, in the penny gaff, and in the thieves' kitchens and bedrooms of the East End of London.

How many artists prospect so far as this, and with courage, and all-encompassing liberality, see art everywhere, and express it by any known vehicle? The men who narrow their realm to the pigsty and the poultry-yard resent the universality of their brother as an invasion of a series of specialties. The flower-painter is in high dudgeon because the creator of the "Neophyte" presumes to reproduce the glories of a hedgerow. He is denounced as an accapareur; the fact being that he is much plus the artist, as ordinary men understand the painter of pictures.

A man may have fine executive skill, be unsurpassed at the lights and shades of a satin dress, and, within his range, a faithful lens, casting a scrap of nature, a corner, upon a panel. And yet he shall not be an artist, in the highest sense and power of the vocation. The special men are the sworn enemies of the Dorés, as the trader in a single article is of the general dealer. It is the very width of his range which has raised the host of the artist's enemies. He has travelled over a continent, and has stirred a score of hostile tribes,—who, individually, are to him what the tinker is to the architect. The sharpness of the hostility proclaims the doughty force of the knight who is in the field. I have not the slightest doubt that when, in the flush of his youth, Doré climbed to the cock crowning the steeple of St. Ouen, at Rouen, and descended by the lightning conductor, he moved the wrath of the professional steeple-climber, who said, "This is an invasion of my special territory."

In a society like ours, it is almost impossible for the universal observer to escape the condemnation of the special man. It is freely conceded that Doré is a remarkable illustrator, on the condition that he is admitted to be no painter; as though the hand that wrought the terrors of Dante and the beauties of Elaine could be other than that of a painter of the highest order. Doré has made mistakes with his brush (his Baden picture was one of them, albeit there were splendid passages in it), and his color is open, on many occasions, to fair condemnation; but it is only the pettiness of jealousy, born of knowledge as limited as that purveyed at a dame's village school, which can collect these errors, and be unrighteous enough to put them before the beauty of such a picture as the "Neophyte" or the "Francesca de Rimini." Critics of this mind, meeting an antagonist after the fight, would befriend him by covering up his uninjured eye, and leaving the blackened one exposed. Severe men may be just occasionally; but the rule is otherwise. When a critic surveys the works of a man of the calibre of Gustave Doré, and after singling out one picture, tells his readers that the rest are "trash," he proves that the journal through which he speaks to the outside world, in search of an anatomist has found a slaughterman.

French art-criticism is open to censure on more than one ground, and none of our time have suffered under its tyranny more than the subject of this paper. It has a vicious tendency to be, in a literary sense, brilliant at the cost of truth. This vice was conspicuous throughout the sprightly volume in which M. Edmond About reviewed modern art, in 1855. Among the lesser critics who are employed to make the salon the basis of an amusing series of articles,— "point" is the sole aim; the writer has not the qualities necessary to the judge. He is not wanted for his judgment, but for his mechanceté. His criticism is not worth that comprehended in the series of charges which Cham is wont to publish. The caricaturist gets his effects by exaggerating defects or weaknesses or peculiarities which are neither; but the sportive writer on art fetches blood, and the applause which he gets is bestowed in the spirit which raises the bravos of the matador's admirers. But we show ill-nature equal to any sarcasm,—without the point. Our instrument is blunt, and depends, for wounding, on its weight. When an artist comes under it, pretending to do more than one thing, to make a fine appearance in more than one field of art, it bruises him with its heaviest blows. It having become settled in the common mind that a man can be only one-sided, he who advances showing two sides is set upon, as an intolerably vain man, who must be belabored until he elects the one side he will show henceforth. Thus Doré is a fine illustrator, and, no painter, albeit the producer of the "Neophyte," a dozen Spanish pieces equal in glow and depth and truth to Phillip, and a score of noble landscapes,— the finest, the latest, exhibited in the Saloon of Honor of this year's National Exhibition! The passing critic, with his settled idea (a false one) and his own pet painter under his wing, refuses to hear anything about the new painter's purpose, and the method of his life. This unfairness appears most monstrous to those who have the closest knowledge of the victim of it.

I resume my starting-point, to conclude. Gustave Doré remains to be studied by his contemporaries in his intellectual entirety. His range of travel in art is wide, because his sympathies are generous beyond artificial political frontiers; and he passes from scene to scene, from race to race, from realm to realm, storing his treasure as he goes. No man could have a more abiding reverence for every form of progress. He will pass an evening discussing anatomy and physiology with doctors. Recreation takes always, with him, Mr. Gladstone's splendid definition of it. He rests from art, in the domains of harmony and melody. He takes the lower, or less ambitious, walks of his profession, that he may get the strength and means to climb to the highest range; so that the snow shall fall upon him as upon the mountains he has hugged so often, at his highest. It has been with an impatience difficult to master that the companions of an art life of this chivalrous quality, have read the unhandsome and incompetent criticism to which Doré has been subjected, in one or two directions, in this country. If this criticism have wounded, it is because the highest intellectual aptitudes abide only with the most sensitive natures. The delights of the imagination are paid for by nervous pangs, which the mass can never understand.

The man of genius who has submitted to the lesser forms of his art, that he may gain the power to climb to its empyrean, has that intrepid patience by which—to quote the Persian proverb—the mulberry leaf is wrought into satin.

A DRIFTING STAR.

Few of the statements made by Professor Stokes in the address with which he opened the recent meeting of the British Association attracted more attention than the assertion that Sirius is receding from the earth at the rate of nearly thirty miles in every second of time. Amazing as the fact is, it was not the fact that attracted so much attention; for even such a tremendous rate of motion is no uncommon attribute of the orbs which deck our skies. Astronomers have shown that our own sun sweeps ever onward through space with a velocity altogether inconceivable by us. Our own earth speeds around its central luminary with a velocity of more than eighteen miles per second. Even minute bodies like the meteors which flash in momentary splendor across the heavens, and then vanish forever, have a velocity of motion almost equal to that with which the stately orb of Sirius courses onwards through space. It was not, then, the enormous velocity ascribed to the fiery Dog Star that attracted men's notice. The wonder was how astronomers could measure the motion with which the star is rushing from us. Knowing that, vast as is the velocity of its motion, countless ages must pass before the star could seem to be diminished in splendor through its recession, it seemed indeed an amazing thing that any process we can apply could tell us anything respecting a motion whose primary effect is absolutely inappreciable.

As the time is approaching when the same method which has revealed to us the recession of Sirius is to be applied with increased instrumental powers under the able management of our leading spectroscopist, it may interest many to learn something of the strange mode of inquiry which can deal successfully with a problem of so much difficulty. Already the new telescope is approaching completion, and before long a series of questions which Mr. Huggins had found beyond the powers of his 8½-inch telescope will be solved by means of the increased powers now placed at his disposal.

The new mode of estimating the stellar motions is in reality sufficiently simple, though the principle on which it depends is the result of a long series of labors by the most eminent physicists of the age. We must conceive our earth as placed within a wave-tossed ocean extending on every side into infinite space. The waves which traverse this ocean are the minute light waves and heat waves and chemical waves which every celestial orb is ever generating. Transmitted through the ethereal ocean with a velocity altogether inconceivable by us, these waves not only generate a myriad forms of force and motion, but tell us all that we can learn about the habitudes of the celestial bodies. Our earth is a part of the shore of the infinite ethereal ocean, and the waves which roll upon that shore bring from beyond the ever-tossing ocean waifs and strays of knowledge, which our astronomers are busily piecing together,—waif by waif, and stray by stray,—until a noble structure is rising under their hands, built though it be of the mere sand and shells brought to us by the ethereal waves that lave our shores.

Like the waves of our own seas, those which traverse the ethereal ocean of space are of unequal dimensions. From the long heat-waves which Tyndall has termed the rollers of the great ether ocean, to the billows of the light-waves, and so to the tiny ripples of the actinic waves, we have every gradation of length. But there is this peculiarity in the waves that come to us from any particular star, that while the same gradations of length are observed, waves of a certain definite length are wanting. Still, comparing ethereal with sea-waves, it is as though the waves which travelled to our sea-coast before some particular wind had nearly every length, from that of the roller to that of the ripple, but that waves exactly ten feet from crest to crest, and waves of exactly certain other lengths, were invariably found to be wanting.

Now, let us conceive of our earth as a ship in the vast ocean of space, and no longer as a fixed part of that ocean's shore-line. As a ship speeds over a wave-tossed ocean, there is an obvious apparent change in the length of the waves she crosses. If she is meeting a long series of rollers, for instance, she crosses them more quickly (that is, more pass her in a given time) than if she were at anchor; and if she is moving in the same direction as the rollers, fewer pass her in a given time, and if those on board of her were not aware of her motion, they would think the rollers narrower or wider than they are in reality in the respective cases mentioned.

Supposing, however, that such a crew had some exact method of measuring the apparent length of the rollers and billows which passed under them, and that they knew beforehand that waves exactly ten feet long were wanting in the sea they were traversing, then they would be able to tell whether their ship was moving or not, and in what direction. For instead of waves of ten feet in length being absent, waves of exactly nine feet in length might seem to be wanting; and then they would know that these were in reality the ten-foot waves, only that their ship's motion had reduced them to nine feet. So they would know that they were travelling one tenth as fast as the sea-waves and meeting them. And if waves of eleven feet in length seemed to be wanting, they would know that their ship was travelling one tenth as fast as the sea waves and in the same direction.

One more illustration, and we shall be ready to show how certainly astronomers have become assured of the recession of Sirius. Suppose the reason why waves of all, save certain definite lengths, came from a particular direction, was that a number of buoys lying far away in that direction were tossing, each with its own rhythmic motion, only that no buoys were tossing with the motion which would supply certain definite waves. Then it is perfectly clear that if the fleet of buoys were suddenly to begin to move away from or towards the shore, a change would take place in the length of every order of waves. A tossing buoy, for example, which was generating a twenty-feet wave, would generate a longer wave when travelling quickly away. When it was at its highest it would mark the crest of a wave, and when next at its highest that crest would be twenty feet away if the buoy had not travelled, but if the buoy had travelled a foot in the interval the crest would be twenty-one feet away, and all the waves generated by the buoy would be twenty-one feet from crest to crest. This being true (mutatis mutandis) for all the buoys, instead of ten-feet waves being wanting (say), there would now be no eleven-feet waves. On the other hand, if the fleet of buoys were approaching the shore at a similar rate, there would be no nine-feet waves. Thus in every case a motion of approach is indicated by the shortening of wave lengths, a motion of recession by the reverse.

Now, the waves which Sirius sends across the ethereal ocean are of all, except certain lengths; and our physicists have recognized the missing waves as corresponding to those which certain known gases have the power of absorbing. When we look at the spectrum of Sirius, we see the waves of different orders separately, and we see the gaps distinctly marked. These gaps ought to correspond to the places where waves of a certain length should fall. But if Sirius is not at rest there will not be this exact correspondence. Now, fortunately, we can tell whether this is the case or not. We can cause the light from the very vapor which is absorbing certain of the light waves of Sirius to produce a bright-line spectrum side by side with the spectrum of Sirius; and the fundamental principle of spectroscopic analysis teaches that the bright lines should correspond with the dark gaps in the star's spectrum. If not, it must be because the recession or approach of the star is lengthening or shortening all its light waves, and so displacing the dark gap.

Now, when the spectrum of Sirius is thus compared with the spectrum of hydrogen it is found there is not that exact correspondence which was to have been looked for if the star were at rest. The dark absorption-line of hydrogen in the star's spectrum is shifted in a direction indicating that the wave lengths have been increased. In other words, it is found that the star must be receding from us. The indication is one of extreme delicacy, however, and nothing but the enormous velocity with which the star is really travelling away from us would have sufficed to render the motion accessible with the instrumental means applied by Mr. Huggins. Now that he is to be placed in possession of improved optical appliances we may hope for information respecting the motions of many other stars. The knowledge thus acquired cannot but have an important bearing on the theories which we are to form respecting the sidereal spaces. Hitherto we have been forced to be content with the measurement of those apparent motions which our telescopists have been able to detect. Ignorant of the stars' distances, we could form but the vaguest notion of the true significance of these movements. Now, however, we have a mode of measurement which tells us of the actual velocity of stellar motions, and will thus enable us to form much clearer conceptions than we have yet been able to obtain respecting the grand processes of cosmical evolution which are in progress around us.

OUR ARTIST IN WINDOWS.

I.

How we first came to go to the glass-staining factory I hardly remember. Some one mentioned the place, and then some one else mentioned it again with a word of interest. Then a new window was put in our church, bearing a wonderfully quaint and sweet design of the Saviour as a child. Our senior warden had seen the original drawing at the factory. Suddenly Cecile seemed seized with the greatest desire to visit the works: she said it was a shame, when there was a place of such importance in the town, that we should know nothing about it. After that, Jo read an article somewhere on mediæval architecture and saints, which made her feel interested too; so at last it happened, without any special thought on my part, that one afternoon we stood hesitating before the half-open factory door.

"Shall we enter?" I asked, feeling for the moment a strange reluctance.

"O yes, Miss Burney," said Cecile, in her languid, decisive way; "we will go on now, no matter what it costs." And lifting her hand she knocked at the door.

One of the workmen turned and bade us enter. We told him our errand; and, as there was no proprietor or foreman present, he offered with rude courtesy to explain things to us a little. This was a busy room; the men in it were cutting glass into all sorts of shapes that could be used,—rounds and arches, circles, diamonds, and parallelograms. Our guide explained to us that these, after they were stained and the colors burnt in, would be fastened together with slender links of metal, and so composed into windows. Then he led us to the more intricate department, where skilful workmen were transferring the outlines of ecclesiastical designs to these shapes of glass, and laying on the colors which were next to be made fast by fire. After that we visited the kiln or oven, glowing with perpetual heat. Jo asked a great many questions, which the man obligingly answered, and at last, spying a heap of broken glass in a corner, she stooped down to it, and began to examine the pieces.

"May I have some of these bits?" she asked, eagerly, holding up a deep blue one, and looking through it at the sun.

"Certainly," said the man, smiling; "take as many as you please. The children often come to ask for them, but young ladies seldom care for such things."

"O, I think they are lovely!" cried Jo, with enthusiasm; and she gathered up fragments of purple and crimson, and intense azure.

I heard a window-shutter open, and our guide glanced upwards.

"But," said Cecile's soft voice, "where do you get your first designs for your pictures on glass? Are those also done in the factory?"

"Yes, miss," answered the workman; "we have our own artist. He makes the designs in a room up stairs. He is the best we ever had."

The man spoke warmly, as if he felt a personal friendship for the artist.

"Might we not visit his room?" asked Cecile, in a persistent sort of way. "Will he think it an intrusion?"

Our guide glanced upwards again. Jo, unheeding our talk, was just holding up to the light a broken diamond she had found, with a yellow oak-leaf on it.

"I think we may venture to try," said our guide, cheerfully; "though he does not often receive visitors."

So we called Jo, and then all went into the building, groping one by one up a dark flight of stairs. Cecile made me walk first, as being chaperon, but I hardly realized where we were ascending, or why. At the landing, our guide paused and knocked, then, opening the door ushered us in, and withdrew.

The room was large and light. From a sort of confusion of things by the window, a young man came to meet us, with a pleasant welcome in his face and voice, as he asked in what way he could serve us.

He wore a blue jacket, which gave him a sailor-like air, and his hair was tumbled, as if he had been running his fingers through it. Wavy brown hair it was; and he had a half-dreamy, half-keen look in his gray eyes, such as I used to see years ago in the eyes of a hero of my youth. Either this, or something in his manner, took me by surprise, and I could think of only the most commonplace words to tell him that we should like to see his designs, and to learn a little about them.

He glanced past me at Cecile. That was a way people always had of doing, even when she was my pupil, and I kept her mind full of lessons. Now that she was emancipated, and become a ruler herself in the small world, the little gray governess might well be content to keep in the background, and console herself with honest, plain Jo, who had scarcely outgrown books and tasks. Cecile was our beauty, large and fair, slow and stately; one could watch her a long time in silence, like a statue or a painting. She never said much; there seemed to be no need that she should; people were always falling in love with her, and she flirted indolently right and left without taking any trouble at all about it. Our beauty seemed rather bored with life sometimes, but we made much of her, and smoothed her way as far as we could.

The artist glanced past at her. She stood in the sunshine like a queen, her rich silk and India shawl draping her right royally, and a delicate pink was creeping into her cheeks like that of apple-blossoms. There was a slight look of animation about her too, which I had often thought the only thing lacking to make the beauty of her face perfect.

"Pardon me," he said, after an instant, "you made me think of a painting of Bathsheba I once saw. Come this way, ladies, and I will show you any of my designs that you care to look at."

He had drawn them on great sheets of creamy tinted paper almost as thick as parchment. They were mere outlines sketched with charcoal, but the whole spirit of the thing was there, and much more powerful and suggestive than if done with fine-pointed pencils toned and shaded to the minutest perfection. He unrolled one after another, holding each before us for a moment. First there was St. Peter with the keys.

"How fine!" murmured Cecile. He rolled it up and then brought out another,—St. Andrew with the few fishes that were to feed the multitude.

"Very charming," said Cecile, letting a slow, lingering glance of her beautiful eyes fall upon the artist; and she had her word of praise ready for each picture in its turn. There was Lazarus just risen, and still bound with the grave-clothes, ghastly, yet rejoicing. There was John the Baptist, with his leathern girdle and raiment of camels' hair; there was Mary, who sat at the Saviour's feet, and that other Mary, with unbound hair, penitent, and bearing her box of precious ointment. These were all so simply, quaintly, forcibly sketched, like old carvings where there is not a line to spare: and then the round, solid ring of halo behind each saint's head was so unlike what it represented, and yet expressed it so perfectly, that there grew to be a charm in watching for unexpected severities of outline; and the most antique and, at first glance, ungraceful came to seem the most to be admired.

He unrolled and held before us one of his largest designs,—Christ blessing the Little Children. It was instinct with majesty and sweetness.

"How very charming!" murmured Cecile, making an effort to comprehend it artistically, and poisoning her chin upon her exquisite hand.

"O, how beautiful! how beautiful!" exclaimed Jo, pressing forward; "just see, Miss Burney, the dear little, pure, baby faces, not afraid to look up at Him! Their very robes look pure,—how can such straight, stiff lines seem to mean so much! I should think it would be like being in a cathedral all the time, and worshipping, when one does such things as these!"

The artist smiled, and unrolled another picture, where the Madonna appeared, leading the children Jesus and John, with that ineffable look of holy innocence in the faces of the three. Jo held her hands tight together in an ecstasy, and Cecile, in her soft, lingering accents, said, "What a wonderful genius you must be, Mr. Hunter!"

It occurred to me as singular that she should know his name, but I supposed the workman who had been our guide must have mentioned it when I was not paying attention.

He was taking down one or two others, and carelessly unrolling them.

"How very beautiful!" said Cecile, in her lady-like monotone.

"Why, what a difference between this and the others!" exclaimed Jo. "I do not like it as well. Is this your design too, Mr. Hunter?"

He looked pleased at her quick discernment.

"No," he said, "this was done by my predecessor. He always drew in the modern style, but I prefer, for my own part, the mediæval and antique."

"So do I," said Jo, heartily; "this one is yours, I know. The dear little cherubs look as if they were shouting praises with those open mouths and rapt eyes!"

"You paint on canvas, sometimes, do you not, Mr. Hunter, besides sketching these paper pictures?" asked Cecile, slowly raising her eyes to his.

The slightest tinge of color seemed to come into his face as he answered, modestly, "I do a little in that way sometimes. I keep my easel over by that corner window."

And stepping to it, he lifted off some light covering that had lain over it, and allowed us to see the half-finished painting. It was the face of a fair, queenly woman, with dreamy languor in her eyes, and a careless sweetness in the curve of her lip. Her hair had half escaped in ripples from the close Greek fillet, and in her hands she held red lilies.

"Why," said Jo, after a little pause, "I think she looks something like you, Cecile!"

"It is meant for Helen of Troy," said the young man, quietly replacing the covering.

Cecile was all in a flutter for a moment; the color rose in her face and she pulled her shawl a little nervously about her shoulders; but it all passed before I had time to wonder whether she found the room too warm, or whether she was vexed because she looked liked Helen of Troy. But it was a beautifully painted picture.

II.

Cecile being no longer under my especial care, I frequently only knew of her guests and her plans by the fragments of each day's sayings and doings that floated to me. I was almost all the time with Jo and the little ones. But I confess to being rather surprised when one day Jo came into the school-room and told me that Mr. Hunter was below in the library with Cecile. She had heard his voice and seen him as she passed the open door. It startled me for a moment; I had not thought of our visit to the factory being foundation enough for future acquaintance.

But it was a visit that had not been soon forgotten. Jo had hunted up an old, curious book of illuminations, which, if not the work of some pious monk himself, must have been done by a very clever imitator. Jo pored over it and delighted in it, and really began to gain a new impetus in her own graceful drawing; sketching windows in Gothic arches, with diamond panes encircling some fair cherub face in the centre. She had put her broken pieces of stained glass up in her own room, where the sun shone through them and made tinted lights.

That day, after Jo came in and told me that Mr. Hunter was down stairs with Cecile, we got out our books to read history, as it was the usual hour, and, the afternoon being warm and sunny, we betook ourselves to the summer-house in the garden. We were growing very much excited over a graphic account of the meeting of the two queens Elizabeth and Mary, in the garden at Fotheringay, when steps came down the path towards us, and there was a sudden meeting in our own garden. Cecile and Mr. Hunter came into the midst of our group, and the smaller forces dispersed.

"I am sure I did not know you people were out here," said Cecile.

"But I am very glad you are here, — very glad to meet you again," said the artist, shaking hands with Jo and me. There was no knit jacket to-day; no tumbled hair; in every point of dress and manner. Mr. Hunter appeared before us as genuine a gentleman as any in the land.

"Miss Dormer kindly invited me to call," he said, turning his cool, gray eyes full upon Cecile as he spoke; "and as we had a short but pleasant acquaintance at the Lakes a year ago, I felt justified in yielding to the temptation now."

"One of Cecile's old flirtations!" I thought to myself, feeling a little vexed, I hardly knew why, for it had been rather our custom to be proud of the number of our beauty's conquests. But this one seemed singular; for why had they met so coolly at the glass-works without any allusion to their earlier acquaintance?

"Did you know each other before?" asked Jo glancing from the artist to her sister. "Why did you not tell me, Cecile? for then I should have felt privileged to ask Mr. Hunter if he could not give me some more broken pieces of glass."

"Pieces of glass!" exclaimed the young man.

"Yes, with all the beautiful colors in them, you know; and perhaps you could have found me some with a head, or a hand, or a lily not quite all broken, which would be of no use in the factory. I should be so glad to have them!"

"You shall," said Mr. Hunter, smiling brightly. "I will look some up on purpose and bring them to you. I remember, when I was a boy, nothing delighted me so much as gathering up the fragments of stained glass that the workmen let me have. I made kaleidoscopes of them, and they helped me to study effects of color."

"O, thank you!" said Jo. "I mean to make transparencies of mine, — one for Miss Burney, one for Cecile, and one for me." And she turned towards her sister.

Cecile was gathering ferns; she fastened two or three in Jo's dark hair. Jo looked at her fondly.

"What a brown, brown hand mine is against yours!" she said, with a caressing touch on the soft white fingers.

"There are shades of white," remarked Mr. Hunter; "at least my sister Flora used to say so, when she went out shopping to match worsteds."

"That is true," said Cecile; "I have worked a great deal on canvas."

Mr. Hunter shortly after took his departure, and Cecile went back to the house, leaving Jo and me to finish our history, and the account of the queens at Fotheringay. We hurried through it all, and then Jo carried the books away, leaving me in the summer-house, in a thoughtful mood, pondering over my pupils and my responsibility.

Mrs. Dormer had died three years before, but I had gone on keeping my old place as governess in the family ever since, and in default of daughter or sister of my own, my heart was fain during these long years to cling, with whatever affection it had left, to these girls and to my younger charges.

Mr. Dormer was a good-natured man, absorbed in business. We went on in a quiet, contented way, as a general thing, except when Mr. Dormer's sister came down upon us for one of her semi-annual visits. She would wake us up, scold us, and criticise us, and give us new notions; and then sweep away again; usually carrying Cecile off with her for a month of gay life in some town or summer resort. After that we would once more settle down into quiet. I had seldom had cause to feel any far-reaching anxiety about my dear girls; but on this day I got to thinking rather gravely how terrible it would be if, through any inefficiency of mine, harm or sorrow should come into their young lives.

But what was there particularly to be done? I went back to the house and tried to satisfy myself by working all the evening on a lovely puffed berthe for Cecile, and setting Jo a double lesson in mathematics.

"I don't know," said Cecile, a few days after, tapping the table thoughtfully, with her white fingers, — "I don't know whether to stay at home, lie on the sofa and read that last novel, or whether to go over to Mrs. Dawson's and learn her new pattern. On the whole, I think I will go to Miss Dawson's, and you need not wait lunch for me, Miss Burney."

So she made a packet of her worsteds and huge crochet-needle, threw on her shawl carelessly, yet so that it seemed to become of itself a classic drapery, put a veil over her head Spanish fashion, and sallied forth, slow and graceful, with "A color in her cheek and a light within her eye."

My pupils in the school-room up stairs plodded away faithfully at their lessons, till all were finished, and then the boys, with a whoop and hurrah, whistled for the dog, and rushed off on a forest expedition. Jo and I went down to the veranda, — she with her old book of illuminations, I with my sewing; and there we sat in the shadow of the vines enjoying the lovely summer day.

It was an interruption when we heard the gate open, and a footfall on the gravelled walk. But it was Mr. Hunter, and he looked so honestly glad to see us, and carried a jagged parcel so promising of delight to Jo, that I forgave him on the spot for breaking up our little dream of rest.

"What is that? A missal?" he asked, seeing the book Jo held. And then he sat down by her on the step, and looked at the quaint designs in corner and margin, as she turned over leaf after leaf. "See that grave old monk at the door of his cell, looking upwards," said he; "is n't that well done?"

"And there is what he is looking up at," replied Jo; "that little bird's-nest in among the vine-branches, and the bird's mouth wide open singing. I suppose it makes him think of praise."

"Ah, there is Santa Maria," remarked the young man, as she turned another leaf.

"And O, look!" cried Jo, enthusiastically, "see the row of little white lilies all wrought into the hem of her garment. I never noticed that before. Is n't it beautiful?"

"But what is this?" asked Mr. Hunter, as something came fluttering down to the ground from the leaves of the book. He picked it up.

"O," said Jo, looking at it, "that is where I tried to copy a head of St. John. But it is n't good. I made a failure of it."

"It is good," he answered, holding it off for a critical glance. "I might have known you would draw. If you had been a nun, you would have made a missal yourself, I am sure."

"Yes, I should have liked that," she replied, simply, and then, laying the book aside, glanced at the package he had brought.

He opened it, and gave it into her hands. I did not know what he would think of the child, she was so wild with delight over those bits of glass.

"O, here is a cross!" she exclaimed, "right in the centre of this diamond, and it is hardly broken at all. I am so glad! And O, how queer this is, — do look, Miss Burney, — why, it must be the tree in Paradise, there are apples on it, and a serpent climbing up to them! Is n't that odd? And here is this beautiful little lamb! I'll hang that up in Willy's room. And, O Mr. Hunter, what have you brought me? It is — it is the face of a saint, — see what beautifully waving hair, and what loving eyes!"

"That is the head of my figure of St. John," he said, "the first copy in glass was broken on its way from the oven, and I happened to save the head. I am so glad you like it, Miss Josephine, — it seemed as if I had very little to bring you, after all."

Jo laid her treasures one above another beside her, on the corner of the veranda, and pushing back her brown hair from her face, sat looking outward in a sort of dreamlike attitude, that made me wonder what the child was thinking of now. Jo was not pretty; no one had ever called her that; but she was such a brave, earnest, cheery little thing; and life was so fresh to her, that she made me think, more than anything else, of a little brown bird singing the sweetest of songs over every crumb it picks up.

"I know," said Jo, slowly, after this pause, "I know something that I wish you would paint in a little picture by itself, Mr. Hunter. It is a rock down in a corner of the woods, just beyond our garden. The top of it is hollowed out, so it catches the rain like a little cup, and that makes moss grow around it! Then the birds fly down and drink from it. I wish you would paint that in a tiny picture, Mr. Hunter. I never told anybody about it before."

He looked at her wistfully, and I looked at him. Just in that brief moment I seemed to realize that the man before me, though young in years, perhaps, had lived and suffered much. But the next instant I blamed myself for the fancy, he laughed so brightly, and there was such a charm of buoyant enthusiasm about him, as he answered, —

"That is just what I should like to paint. St. Robin's Well, we will call it. Won't you show it to me, Miss Josephine?"

Jo looked up at me.

"Shall we go, Miss Burney? it is only down the garden and over the wall in among the maples."

"You may go, my dear," I said, "and show Mr. Hunter the way. It is a good while since I climbed a wall, and I will sit quietly here till you return."

So the two left me, and walked away together down the winding garden-path. As I watched them, now going out of sight and now reappearing again among the shrubbery, somehow I began to think of Mrs. Browning's poem about the swan's nest, and of the child who sat "alone 'mong the beeches in the meadow," dreaming child-fancies of what it would be to be loved, and saying to herself, that, when the true knight should come, victor over all, —

"Riding on his steed of steeds,
Unto him I will discover
That swan's nest among the reeds!"

III.

I suppose I had sat there musing for some time, when the sound of the gate aroused me, and there was Cecile coming, queen-like along the walk. She had twined a spray of sweetbrier roses in her hair; it helped to keep her veil on, she said; it certainly touched her calm fair beauty with the charm that such flowers always have.

"Ah, Miss Burney, how comfortable you look!" she said. "See, I have fairly begun my work, the centre square is half done. Is n't that a splendid shade of maize? But you should see Mrs. Dawson's."

I looked and admired, and began to wonder why Jo did not come back.

"Why, there she is!" exclaimed Cecile, with an air of surprise, "coming through the shrubbery; and Mr. Hunter is with her! That is very singular, is n't it, Miss Burney?"

"No," I replied, "they went together to find some place Jo thought would be pretty in a picture, — a rock, I believe."

"A rock?" echoed Cecile, not taking her gaze from the two, who had almost reached us.

"Good afternoon, Miss Dormer," said the artist, pleasantly. "I would shake hands, but for this great clump of moss I am carrying."

"Clump of moss!" uttered Cecile, seeming only able to reiterate.

"Yes," said Jo, "it's to plant down by the rock under our larch-tree. I always wished moss grew there. Do you suppose it will die? And, O Cecile, Mr. Hunter is going to paint a picture for us of the dearest spot down in the woods!"

"Yes," assented Mr. Hunter, as he put down the moss; "your sister has shown me one of the loveliest spots my eyes ever met, Miss Dormer. She has a true heart and an artist's eye."

Cecile smiled politely, and turned to carry her pattern and worsteds into the house. An unlucky sweep of her long dress dislodged the little heap of stained glass lying on the veranda floor, and two or three pieces fell crashing to the ground. Jo started forward with a cry of dismay, and Cecile looked round to see what had happened.

"O, it is the saint's head!" said Jo, mournfully.

"Why, what have I done?" asked Cecile.

"Only broken some old glass," said the painter, with an odd tone in his voice. "Not quite so much pastime as breaking hearts, is it, Miss Dormer?"

I was startled by the look Cecile cast upon him, — an appealing, tender look, — and she seemed moved out of her usual quiet. But he did not see it; he was stooping to help Jo pick up the pieces.

"Never mind," he said; "I'll bring you something better next time."

"O, I don't mind," said Jo, good-naturedly; "it was a bad place to leave them in. I might have thought they would get knocked off."

Cecile quietly went into the house to put away her crochet. She remained in her room a short time, and when she came down to us again, calm and shining, Mr. Hunter had gone.

The next few days passed peacefully by. Mr. Dormer was away from home on a business expedition, so we had the house to ourselves, and made the most of it too, for the weather was not propitious for out-door excursions. Cecile seemed indefatigable at her crochet, and though sometimes when I came into the room the needle would be lying still in her listless fingers, yet afterwards it would fly through the meshes with greater rapidity than ever, and marvellous results in maize, green, and violet were already produced.

I heard Jo and the children recite their lessons, and after that either took work of my own or read aloud for the general benefit, while Cecile crocheted and Jo busied herself over some mysterious drawing, in which at present I could see nothing but a succession of straight lines and arches. She had spoiled two or three sheets of paper in its service, but went on making measurements, and every few moments carefully adding a pencil-mark.

We were left wholly undisturbed by callers. Only once the bell rang, and Cecile looked eagerly up. It was the postman, and he brought her a letter. She opened it without haste, and began to read, letting the envelope fall on the floor. Little Willy Dormer picked it up, and spelled out the postmark with great distinctness, — Brentford. Brentford! I knew there was a certain Colonel Freeing living there, whom Cecile had once easily flirted with, and as easily refused. Could the letter be from him? I watched her a little anxiously, but her face did not change, and when she had read it all, she crumpled it up and threw it into her work-basket.

"Do sit up straight, Jo," I said, "you are getting round-shouldered."

Jo started into erectness, and looked dreamily her drawing.

"I know who's coming here this evening," said Willy, beginning to grow talkative.

Nobody asked whom he meant, and after a minute's pause he went on.

"Mr. Hunter is coming, because this morning he asked me if the ladies were all at home. And I told him yes."

"Where did you see Mr. Hunter?" I asked, wondering to myself how it is that boys always get everywhere without one's knowing it.

"O, I was down at the factory," said Willy, with a business-like air. "I went to get colored glass like Jo's, to break all up in little bits. I am going to make a kaleidoscope. So Mr. Hunter and me, we got talking."

"You should say Mr. Hunter and I," I answered.

This was all that was said to his communication; in fact, I thought very little of it myself, for boys are always imagining. But when we met at tea, I wondered if Willy's words had had anything to do with Cecile's appearance; she had dressed with such care, and she looked so queenly and full of grace, with an unwonted brightness in her eye and cheek. I glanced at Jo; she had a pleased, pre-occupied look in her earnest brown eyes, which were bent upon her plate. She had not changed her dress of brown serge, and her short dark hair was pushed back plainly and smoothly under her school-girl net. I wondered, as I poured out the tea, what the child could be thinking about. All of a sudden she looked up brightly from the plate she had been studying, and exclaimed, "What pretty china this is, Miss Burney! This is the plate that has an old castle painted on it, and there is such a lovely window that I never noticed before; such a singular, quaint shape. I don't know whether it is proper, but it is lovely."

"Who ever heard of an improper window?" asked Cecile. "Please pass the muffins, Jo, while they are hot."

"O Cecile, how beautiful you look!" said Jo, admiringly, for the first time regarding her sister's toilet.

"Do I?" said Cecile, with a little smile.

After tea we all betook ourselves to the drawing-room, though I was speculating uneasily in my own mind whether Cecile would wish me to go up stairs in case any gentleman should call. I instinctively held some good old-fashioned English notions about young ladies and their chaperons; but Cecile was always allowed so much freedom at her Aunt Wild's, and she was really in some things so much more experienced and self-controlled than I, that I felt something like a nervous hen chaperoning a fair young swan, who was sure to take to the water in spite of me. Still, we had always got along together very amicably, and circumstances generally settled the course of things without vexing or thwarting any one of us.

It happened so this evening, for when Mr. Hunter came he asked for the "ladies." And why not? I was vexed at myself for having been so premature in imagining any approach to one of Cecile's flirtations. She was at the piano when he came in, and he begged her not to leave it. Jo looked up with a friendly glance of welcome, and, as he passed her, he said, in a low voice, "The picture of St. Robin's Well is-almost done, Miss Josephine. I will bring it to you when it is finished."

"O, thank you!" she said, in her quick, eager way; and then, as he took his station by her sister's side at the piano, after a moment's pause, she bent closely over her drawing again.

How well Cecile sang that night! her very best; her voice was a pure soprano, with far-reaching notes; her music-teacher was an artist, and made her sing better than she knew. Her beautiful white hands wandered over the keys as if akin to the pure cold ivory. She went on singing as she had done before Mr. Hunter came in, snatches of sweet ballads, gay little troubadour songs with a flash of passion in them, finishing with one I had never heard before, and which I dropped my work to listen to.

"My ornaments are arms,
My pastime is in war,
My b-d is cold upon the wold,
My lamp, you star,

"My journeyings are long,
My slumbers short and broken;
From hill to hill I wander still,
Kissing thy token.

"I ride from land to land,
I sail from sea to sea,—
Some day more kind I fate may find,
Some night kiss thee!"

"O, that is exquisite!" said Mr. Hunter, drawing nearer, as if in a sort of fascination, his eyes fixed upon the beautiful singer. "What is it?" he asked.

"A wandering knight's song, written three hundred years ago," answered Cecile, in a soft monotone almost like sadness.

"Cecile," interrupted Jo, without looking up from her work, "sing that about Ruth and Naomi."

And Cecile sang it. It was grand and pure, and touching beyond compare. Her soul seemed to go forth with the words, making her voice lofty, sustained, and noble; and when she reached and sang that heart-penetrating strain:—

"Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried —"

Then it seemed as if she herself were pleading through the words of Ruth, and her dewy blue eyes were upturned to meet Mr. Hunter's. I wondered that he did not seem to notice it more, for he only said, gently, —

"Your voice is improved since last year, Miss Dormer; you could not have sung like this then. What a noble recitative it is!"

"It is a pretty piece," said Cecile. The pleading look still brooded in her eyes, but it found no more expression in word or manner, because she had ceased to sing, and it was as if a magic key had locked her nature up again. She replaced her music in the rack, and drew her light shawl up about her graceful shoulders. There was a brief silence in the room, and Mr. Hunter still stood thoughtfully by the piano.

IV.

I have designed a cathedral!" exclaimed Jo, in a clear, triumphant tone, throwing down her pencil.

We all started. I laughed nervously, and Cecile turned round on the music-stool. Then we drew about the table, to see what the girl meant. So this was why the straight lines and pointed arches had been so carefully jotted down; they had really grown into a harmonious shape.

"Four rows of columns, eight columns in a row, and each row supporting nine arches. That is on quite a grand scale," said Mr. Hunter, with a smile.

"O, don't laugh at it please!" entreated Jo.

"Indeed, I will not!" he replied. "The perspective is not quite perfect, and there are a few other mistakes, which none but an architect could very well avoid, but apart from that it is a very good design. I can see the idea of a beautiful church in it."

Jo's lip quivered; she really seemed to care for his praise. I believe her whole heart had been so wrapped up in her drawing that it had become dear to her, and she could not bear to have it condemned.

"But where in the world are the pews?" asked Cecile, after looking at it a few moments in wild amazement.

"Why, all down there, between the columns. I could not stop to mark them all, but you can imagine them," said Jo, laughingly.

"That's a unique window in the transept," said Mr. Hunter, laying his finger on a point that much resembled the window in the quaint old castle, painted on the China tea-plate. Jo gave me a merry glance.

"Well," said Cecile, slowly, as if considering the matter, "I don't see, Jo, what in the world ever makes you think of such things. I never do!" And our beauty looked with a grave air down at her exquisite white hands.

Mr. Hunter smiled almost imperceptibly. Then he took up Jo's drawing, and made a proposition.

"Miss Jo," he said, "will you let me keep this, in return for something which I am just now reminded lies wrapped in paper, by my hat, in the hall?"

Jo looked up in great curiosity.

"I will get it and see," she said, and started for the hall. I heard the rattle of the paper as she pushed it aside; then there was a little silence; and after a moment more Jo came back in a maze of delight.

"O, look at it, Cecile!" she exclaimed. "Look at it, Miss Burney!"

It was a round piece of stained glass, fitted to hang like a transparency in a window, the outer border of golden brown, the centre a heavenly blue, on which was pictured a cup or goblet, with a hand reaching out above as if in blessing.

Mr. Hunter was pleased with her pleasure, and showed it. The drawing of the church plan went, without remonstrance, into his coat-pocket, and Cecile, retreating from the table, stood by the window looking out at the dark night. She did not play or sing any more; in fact, the evening was ended, and our visitor rose to depart.

Cecile went immediately up to her room, after giving an even-toned good-night, but Jo sat still at the table, her head resting on her two hands, and her eyes fixed upon her present. I put away my work, closed the shutters, and fastened down the windows.

"Come, Jo," I said, then, "early to bed and early to rise, you know, and then you will be fresh to study that hard geometry lesson in the morning."

She looked up at me dreamily.

"Miss Burney, I am nineteen now," she said, "and I am not tired of books and study, for I do love them dearly. But when shall I go out into the world,—when shall I see more of life? It seems so new and wonderful to me; I have never thought much about it before."

"It will come soon enough, dear; God knows it comes soon enough to all of us," I answered, with a sigh in my heart.

"Not that I am impatient," she said again. "I think it would be beautiful to go on studying and dreaming forever, just as I have done lately."

"That's right, dear Jo," I said; "and now come, it is really getting late."

She rose and went, kissing me first, and taking her present with her. From thenceforth it hung in her window at the foot of her bed, where she could see it as soon as she waked in the morning. I sat up an hour later after she had gone, and wrote my monthly letter to the girls' Aunt Wild, giving her as usual some little account of our studies and doings, and casually mentioning Mr. Hunter's calls. I finished and folded the sheet, and then remembered that my envelopes were all gone, so that I must defer sealing it till morning. But, going up stairs, on my way to my room, I saw the light shining from under Cecile's door, and knew that she must be still moving about; so I spoke to her from outside, and asked if she could lend me an envelope. She told me to come in and help myself. On entering, I was surprised to find her sitting quietly by the window, doing nothing at all, and evidently no nearer going to bed than she had been an hour before.

"Why, you will take cold, Cecile," I said; "don't sit up any longer."

She rose at that, and in a thoughtful sort of way began removing her jewelry and the few flowers in her hair. I took one or two envelopes from her writing-desk, and was about going, when she said, as if to detain me, "How different people are from each other, Miss Burney!"

"That is true," I replied, wondering a little.

"For example," she went on, "how different we four people were this evening! Miss Burney, what makes Jo think of so many things? I wish I could, but I cannot, no matter how hard I try. She is so quick and bright. Aunt Wild calls her 'little plain-face'; but I would gladly change faces with her, if I could only think of so many nice things to do and say!"

This was more wonderful than anything yet,—Cecile wishing to change places with Jo!

"By the way, Cecile," I said, with my hand on the door, "you used to see Mr. Hunter at the Lakes last summer. Tell me something about him. He seems to me superior to most young men. Is he really so?"

"Pray excuse me," said Cecile, sleepily, "you are right about not sitting up too late, Miss Burney. I believe I am tired, and I have absolutely nothing to tell you about Mr. Hunter's character."

So I retreated to my own room.

V.

That next week I had a weary, dreary headache; it throbbed painfully in my temples, and beat like a merciless hammer through my brain. Hot weather, low state of the system, nervousness,—these were the causes decided upon by the whole family, and they kindly commanded me to stay in my own room and rest. So there was an enforced vacation from lessons, and I suppose the boys had a glorious time of it. Mr. Dormer was at home again to take the responsibility of everything, and I thought to myself that if a headache I must have, perhaps this was as good a time as any for it. Cecile and Jo came in every little while to see me, laying soft hands on my brow, keeping the room cool and dark, and every day Jo put fresh flowers where I could look at them whenever my eyes opened. From little things that were said now and then, I knew that Mr. Hunter called two or three times, and it occurred to me to wonder whether he had brought Jo any more pictures, and whether Cecile had sung to him again with that look in her eyes.

It was Friday morning when I first felt quite myself again, so putting on my dress of governess-gray, and feeling very fresh and ready for work, I went down to breakfast. It was pleasant to see all the familiar faces around the table again; even the little boys' welcoming "Good morning, Miss Burney" made me feel glad at heart.

"We must go to work in our geometry with renewed energy, dear Jo," I said, presently, thinking of the days we had missed. Jo glanced at me hastily; she did not answer a word, but blushed like a rose, and then smiled, too, looking down at the table-cloth. Cecile sipped her coffee in unbroken silence. Mr. Dormer's eyes twinkled with fun, and then he laughed outright at my inquiring face.

"You look puzzled, Miss Burney," he said, with a half-smile and half-sigh; "the truth is, I am afraid you have lost a scholar. Our little Jo here has been learning life's greatest lesson in the last few weeks, unknown to me. No more geometry now, eh, Jo?"

I think I looked more confused and amazed than before, I was so slow and unwilling to get at his meaning.

"Well, then, to speak plainly," he said, "the other day young Hunter asked my consent to his trying to win Jo for his bride, and as he seems absolutely in love with the child, and she with him, it became a serious matter; so I made a few proper inquiries, and finding really no excuse for stopping the whole thing, I had to let them settle it their own way last evening. Wonder what my sister Wild will say when she gets the letter I'm going to write her after breakfast!" he added, with a comical face of dismay.

Jo engaged! little school-girl Jo! I got up, and went round to her place and kissed her. But my mind seemed all in a whirl, and somehow I did not dare to look at Cecile.

After breakfast, Jo came to me in my own room, and told me all about it. How suddenly and quickly Love had budded and bloomed into perfect being in that young girl's heart!

"I think I must have loved him from the very first, Miss Burney," she told me ingenuously; "though I never thought about it, I never knew. Only I cared so much when I heard him coming, or even if you mentioned his name, after that day when we went down to the rock in the woods together. I felt then that he was my friend; we thought the same thoughts. But I did not think of love exactly. I could not help liking everything he liked, and it made me happy. Then when he told me what he had asked papa,—that was last Tuesday,—O, you don't know how I felt! Everything seemed so strange and new, it made me tremble. I wanted to tell you all about it so much, but your head ached, and they said you must be kept still. And I did not exactly like to tell Cecile all I felt, because —”

She hesitated, and I looked at her in amazement. What had she thought or noticed, that made her unable to tell Cecile?

“I won’t keep anything from you,” she said, after a minute, “though it is a sort of secret. You know he met Cecile at the Lakes last summer, and he thought he had never seen any one so beautiful in the world. You know Cecile flirts, — O, how can she, Miss Burney! — and she sang to him, and walked with him, and let him draw pictures of her face, till he could not think of anything but her, and so one day he almost told her he loved her. I can imagine just how lovely she must have been looking, can’t you? Then she grew so cold, and made him understand plainly that she could never think of him in that way, that she had only valued him as a friend; and after that they hardly spoke to each other. He felt hurt and mortified at first, but after that he did not care at all, and he amused himself by watching how she treated three or four other gentlemen in just the same way before the summer was ended. He is so glad it happened now, because he has me. But you see it makes me not exactly want to talk to Cecile about him; she might laugh at me. She has so many triumphs all the time, she would not know how much I cared for just my one that she threw aside. And she does not really care for pictures either, or any of the things that he does; she seems meant to be just lovely and beautiful. But, O Miss Burney, he says he loves me with my little brown face, more than if I was like a queen. I know he will never love anybody but me, — doesn’t it sound strange to hear me talking this way? But I do know it, and I love him so much I am too happy to speak. What makes me speak? I ought to go away and be still and think.”

So this was my new Jo! just the same bright, sweet self as of old, but no longer my little school-girl; she was suddenly a woman, loving, trusting, her whole soul awake and intense.

How quickly we become accustomed to things! It soon seemed very natural for Mr. Hunter to come and go daily, and for Jo to be always the one to welcome him. Cecile had little to do with them; she occupied herself in all her usual ways, and never spoke of the engagement except in general terms. Perhaps she sat rather oftener alone, perhaps I found her oftener with her hands folded idly, her large blue eyes looking dreamily outward, and a certain gravity in the outline of her beautiful face. But it may be I was fanciful; people like me are apt to be; Cecile called on all her friends as frequently as ever; she worked wonderful things in worsted; she walked and drove with admiring gentlemen; she arrayed herself like the lilies of the field. Indeed, a lady friend said to me one day, “What very good spirits Miss Dormer seems to be in this summer!”

Suddenly her Aunt Wild came. She had written to congratulate Jo, and followed almost immediately after her letter. She had a thousand things to say, to suggest, to advise; but I think neither Jo nor Mr. Hunter listened to a word, they were so taken up with their pictures, and their air-castles, and their hours of happiness. At last Mrs. Wild confided in me.

“You see, Miss Burney,” she began, “if Jo had belonged to me, of course I should have had other plans for her; but as it is, I really think she has done quite well. I suppose he makes two thousand a year from his designs for church windows and things, and then there is the sale of his pictures besides. I shall quite dismiss all care for Jo from my mind. I don’t mind telling you,” she went on, after a pause, “that when you wrote to me some weeks ago, mentioning Mr. Hunter’s calls, I felt worried. I thought it was Cecile, of course, and that would never do. They met at the Lakes last summer, and it was quite a desperate flirtation; but I felt proud of Cecile. She came out of it with flying colors, of course: she knew he was no sort of a match for her. With her beauty and high-bred air she might marry a prince. But I was a little afraid when your letter came, for all that: for the fellow is handsome and talented, though he does live by his wits. But what sort of an artist’s wife would Cecile make? She cares no more for art than you do for a fiddlestick! I intend her to marry Colonel Freeling; he has fallen into an immense fortune since she refused him, and he is as wild about her as ever. So I shall take her to C — with me next week, and you may be prepared to hear of another engagement in the family very soon, Miss Burney.”

She stopped there, breathless and triumphant. I heard her in silence, — it gave me a shocked, sad feeling to hear my dear girls disposed of so.

Cecile packed her great trunk, and went with her Aunt Wild to C —. She busied herself gayly the few days before, with all her little preparations and her new dresses. How lovely she looked when the hour of departure came, with the wild-rose flush in her cheeks, as she walked stately down the garden-path and took her place in the carriage. Mr. Hunter and Jo had somehow mistaken the hour, and were not there to say good-by to her.

“It is no matter,” said she, smiling, “you must make my adieu for me. Good-by, dear little Miss Burney!” She kissed me twice, and then turned her beautiful expectant face towards her aunt, who told the driver to whip up his horses and not miss the train.

It happened as Mrs. Wild had said. Three weeks after she wrote to her brother, to tell him of his daughter’s engagement to Colonel Freeling, and she mentioned what a beautiful engagement-ring Cecile had received from her lover, — a solitaire diamond of immense value. As Mr. Dormer read this, and we listened in silence, the thought somehow struck me that Cecile hereafter would be like that diamond, cold, lustrous, dazzlingly beautiful, solitaire, but upheld and surrounded with gold.

“I do hope Cecile will be happy!” said Jo, softly. “I suppose Colonel Freeling is the hero she has been waiting for all these years. I am so glad she has found him at last!”

So you see there are two ways of looking at the matter, — and here my story pauses. The sisters are both to be married late in autumn. Cecile is with her aunt in London, preparing an elaborate trousseau, while here, at home, Jo and I sit together, working with hands of love upon a simple bridal outfit. But in the evening I sew alone; for then Mr. Hunter comes, and he and Jo of late have been very busy, with heads close together, designing a wonderful new rose-window for the organ-loft of our parish church.

THE WASP WAIST.

MEN are not disposed, for a variety of reasons, to interfere rashly with the notions of women in the matter of dress. The greatest latitude is allowed in shape, and color, and material; and it is only when the male æsthetic sense is too openly outraged that we hear some faint protest against the current fashion. This tolerance is extremely wise. In the first place, women would not alter their ways even if we did complain. Then again, it is only reasonable to conclude that, as the women who set fashion spend by far the larger portion of their lives in studying how to dress themselves, they ought to understand more about it than the exoteric critic who hastily scans his wife's costume as she comes down to dinner. We are of opinion, further, that the masculine mind is incapable of dispassionately judging women's dress. There are men who look upon every tolerably good-looking woman as an angel; and such men, perceiving the majority of their angelic acquaintances dressing in a particular fashion, must needs consider the fashion a remarkably graceful and becoming one.

There are other men who, having been rather hardly entreated by the sex, are disposed to regard women with distrust, if not with some vague notion of a universal revenge; and these find each new fashion only another phase of feminine absurdity and vanity. It is highly desirable, therefore, that women should be allowed (the phrase suggests a possible restriction which, we fear, does not exist) to dress pretty much as they please, and to adorn themselves with such combinations of color, and such forms of costume, as they think most suited to their various requirements.

In one direction, however, every man who has got any sort of influence over the womankind of his family or circle is imperatively bound to interfere. The abomination of tight-lacing must not be allowed to spread amongst us. We are not quite sure that fashion contemplates any immediate return to the wasp waist, but there are rumors abroad which render it necessary that every precaution should be used. It may be that the flinging open of the correspondence-columns of the newspapers in the dull season has had something to do with the reappearance of this bugbear, but it is not the less necessary that such incipient tentatives should be checked at once. Somewhere about two years ago a magazine which is chiefly addressed to girls started, for its own purposes doubtless, this subject, and endeavored to combat the notion that tight-lacing was injurious to the frame. It was suspected at the time that this periodical was nothing more nor less than the organ of the stay-makers, who had been deprived of their means of subsistence by the extinction of crinoline. This underhand effort to resuscitate a pernicious custom provoked a good deal of indignation; and we fancy that it was then abandoned. However, our old foe appears in a new place; and in the sacred columns of the Times, the spectre of tight-lacing is again paraded before us, by one or two correspondents, whose method of logic inclines us to believe that they belong to the sex which is principally interested in the matter. The first point on which these correspondents insist is that a small waist is pleasing to the eye, and the second is that a woman may "cultivate her figure"—such is the gentle euphemism which describes the squeezing in of the ribs—with impunity from physical injury.

It is true enough that a small waist is an additional grace to a figure that is otherwise symmetrical and graceful. No one can deny this fact. But there is no greater blunder than for the "cultivator" to imagine that a small waist, which betrays its artificial origin, can be regarded by men with anything else than derision or compassion. Is it wonder, or pity, or contempt that is the predominant feeling when one observes a wasp-like body tapering down to an abnormally small waist, the waist unnaturally round, the dress obviously strained, the whole body apparently balanced so as to prevent the compressed figure from breaking in two halves? A more absurd spectacle it is impossible to conceive; and it is one which suggests some other reflections, not very flattering to the owner of the insect-waist. We presume that girls make fools of themselves in this way in order to convey to others the notion that they are peculiarly sylph-like and graceful. They wish to appear in the eyes of their male admirers as light, ethereal, angelic creatures, who are scarcely subject to the vulgar necessities of hunger. Unfortunately, the impression conveyed is exactly the reverse. The lover cannot look at his mistress's eyes for thinking of her waist, and wondering how she can smile under her tightly-clasping bars of cane. In spite of himself, he becomes an anatomist. He mentally dissects her. He cannot help thinking of those plates in books of physiology, showing the position of the ribs anterior and posterior to the practice of tight-lacing. While he ought to be looking at her face, he is, in imagination, contemplating her lungs. When she sighs, it is not of her affection he thinks; he is considering the action of her diaphragm. It is impossible for the tenderest and most idealistic of lovers to discern the poetry of a mechanical waist.

As for the injurious effects of the practice, no correspondence in the Times or elsewhere will alter definite scientific facts. We are heartily glad to perceive that the Lancet has engaged in the good work of smiting down these fallacies with the sledge-hammer of its authority. We imagine, however, that the physical injuries produced by tight-lacing must be apparent to every one; and that it is only a piece of hypocrisy on the part of its advocates to say that they know of no cases of such injury.

The Lancet only repeats what ought to be known to every school-girl who studies physiological questions and answers in her classes. For the free motion of the lungs, free motion of the ribs is required. Compress the ribs by tight-lacing, and you would prevent the lungs from obtaining air but for the action of the diaphragm, which involves a method of breathing directly destructive of the harmonious working of the internal system. "Breathing, as it is thus carried on, produces downward pressure instead of lateral expansion, increasing the difficulties under which the digestive organs, compressed out of shape by the constriction of the waist, do their work, and causing displacements and derangements which create perhaps more domestic unhappiness than any other circumstance in life. . . . And we do not hesitate to say that to the practice of tight-lacing is due a very large number of distressing female ailments, over and beyond those derangements of digestion and circulation to which we have already referred."

It may be urged that if women will kill themselves in order to attract admiration and gratify their vanity, they ought to be allowed a martyrdom which is clearly a pleasure to them. But that is not the point. The results of tight-lacing are not confined to the subject of the experiment. The prevalence of the custom in this age would materially affect the health of the next generation.

The more immediate results are a mass of needless complaints which make a woman an infliction upon her friends as well as a misery to herself. Constant headaches, the querulousness of temper attendant upon restraint and pain, and the thousand ills of indigestion are part of the harvest of evil which follows tight-lacing, and in which many an unhappy husband has been forced to share. For a woman to have constant headaches who has produced them by her own wilful folly might be regarded as a merited punishment, but for the fact that the punishment falls as much upon the husband as upon herself. Probably, however, he reaps a deserved punishment for having been foolish enough to marry a girl given up to tight-lacing, or for having been weak enough to let his wife fall into the habit. Perhaps if it were well understood that our marrying young men—looking forward to their future domestic comfort—were disposed to keep clear of girls devoted to the ruinous practice of tight-lacing, the insect-waist would disappear, and there would be an end to coffin-corsets.

HERR WAGNER'S LAST.

MR. H. F. CHORLEY, for many years the musical critic of the Athenæum, writes as follows from Munich:—

"I was present the other evening at a full-dress stage rehearsal of Herr Wagner's 'Das Rheingold,' the Prologue to his three Nibelungen operas. This rehearsal was, in most respects, tantamount to a first performance elsewhere; and was followed during some two and a half of the dreariest hours which I ever endured with an amount of readiness to admire, and patience to listen, creditable to the good faith of all concerned, but therefore none the less amazing.

"The Opera Orchestra in Munich, notoriously superb, had been strengthened for the occasion, and included many harps. By a new arrangement it was sunk out of sight, the traditional foot-lights being also removed. Both innovations seemed to me open to question. The stage was too dark; the accompaniments, at the back of the parterre, sounded weak, wiry, and ill-balanced. The harps were no more potent than so many gnats would have been.

"But the world had been promised scenic effects of exquisite fantasy. The opening scene of 'Das Rheingold' is the bed of the Rhine, where three swimming nymphs of the stream are discovered as wheeling upwards and downwards, in guard of the mysterious golden treasure. As a stage effect, this would be, under the best of conditions, obviously extravagant—need it to be said, impossible? Yet the solution of a similar difficulty was infinitely better effected at the Grand Opéra of Paris, some thirty-five years ago, when Taglioni danced so exquisitely to Adolphe Adam's charming music, in 'La Fille du Danube.'

"The subsequent scenes, including a final one with a practicable rainbow, low to earth, and intended for persons to mount by way of tableau, were picturesque enough; but by those who recollect analogous displays at Berlin, Paris, and—last, not least—London, it could not be accepted as either amazing or probable. It is needful to dwell on these facts, because to consider them becomes a just necessity, when a scenic whole, exhibited by one who has more impudently satirized his predecessors than any one pretending to the name of musical artist has done before him,—and who has professed to inaugurate a new era,—is paraded before the public. Herr Wagner's dreams of shows, which were to carry off the ancient legend, monstrous and dull as arranged by him (yet not without a certain amount of grim, old-world poetry in its idea), and music such as he is capable of making, have not—alas the day!—been realized.

"Everybody concerned in the failure of the rehearsal and the postponement of the performance is, of course, to blame, save the arrogant author. But the work in itself, apart from all its trappings and paddings and puffs preliminary, and enthusiasm wrought up to fever-heat by the herd ready to wonder, "with a foolish face of praise," at any long-bearded prophet or sepulchral seer, who is able, by force of brass, to get a hearing and a patron,—what is the work, when it is dispassionately considered? Let it be granted that the 'Nibelungen Lied' offers matter for three separate and consecutive musical dramas, to be performed on as many successive evenings, after a first or prefatory one has been devoted to 'Das Rheingold.' This is a concession, on the one hand, tolerably sweeping; while, on the other, such a grant inevitably limits the presentation of the unwieldy marvel.

"'Das Rheingold' consists of four scenes,—the first framing three swimming and singing nymphs, who caracole up and down the hill-peaks at the bottom of the Rhine, with painfully acrobatic gestures, to a gibberish of vowel-sounds, recalling similar cries in the 'Faust' of Berlioz, and—proh pudor!—the barking dogs in M. Offenbach's 'Roi Barkouf!' After this water-music enters the hero, to the following euphonious line:—

"Garstig glatter glitsch'riger Glimmer."

The entire libretto is wrought out in language varying between such hideous cacophony as the above and a euphuistic alliteration no less remarkable, the source of the verse considered. The march of the story (which marches not) is no less singular and Wagnerian. The legend is conducted by a series of monologues, with the occasional production of bystanders who have nothing to say and do. There is small apparent reason why (Herr Wagner's courage holding out) it should not have been prolonged for some ten hours and as many scenes more! And 'Das Rheingold,' be it recollected, is represented as only the first of a series of four Festival Performances!

"Never has partisanship been so unblushing and unscrupulous as on this occasion. Those who refer to the piano-forte score (MM. Schott & Co.) will hear with amazement that persons of no mean authority promised that 'Das Rheingold' was to reveal an entire change in its master's manner, that the work was of the simplest possible structure, and full of intelligible melody.

"So far from this being the case, all who refuse to surrender themselves to the insanities of the hour must agree that the scanty, and spare, and stale melodic phrases which it contains, foisted on the public by feeble and inflated efforts at orchestral intricacy, are complicated and worked to death with a persistency which, if found in the work of an old master would call forth an outpouring of the vials of vitriolic sarcasm by these new prophets and their fanatical congregations.

"The opening prelude, however, on a meagre, four-bar phrase may be said to produce a monotonous and flowing water-effect by its repetition and climax. There is a stately entrance for the bass voice at the second scene. The appearance of the Rhine Nymphs is announced by a phrase judiciously borrowed from Mendelssohn's 'Melusine' overture. Later, in the music for the Giants, Meyerbeer's resuscitation of the Nuns in 'Robert,' with its peculiar 9-8 rhythm, has been no less coolly appropriated by the unblushing insulter of Judaism in music.

"The diatonic descending scale which marks the character of one of the giants is noticeable in the dearth of better ideas. On the other hand, chromatic progression ascending and descending becomes most tiresome to the ear, because of its unmeaning triteness. The perpetual use of the tremolando to support the recitatives is no less significant of poverty of resource. The vapid and ungraciousness of the declamatory music will make itself most wearily felt by all who remember what Gluck and (perhaps a fairer comparison) Weber could make of their dialogue. I cannot but think that the orchestra is ill handled. As has been formerly observed in Herr Wagner's scores, the stringed quartet is lean, and wants the support of central sound in its tenor portion; even in his use of the harp, our iconoclast is puny and ineffective as compared with Meyerbeer and Berlioz.

"Thus much of personal impressions which are purposely under rather than overstated. Now as to facts. The announcement of the performance, more than once postponed, had drawn together a large and intelligent audience of dilettanti artists and critics, some from places as far a-field as London, Paris, and Florence, proud to get admission to the rehearsal, and the majority, at least, disposed to believe and accept whatever the arch-image of modern German opera might vouchsafe to set before them.

"Curious it was to observe how the most fervent of the congregation began to shrink and to look anxiously hither and thither as 'the allegory' at the bottom of the Rhine was unfolded,—nay, should I not rather say, enveloped in fresh mystery? There was a weak attempt at moribund enthusiasm when all was over; but this was as significantly transient as it was weak. Subsequently the faithful have made some attempt to rally in nooks and corners by the declaration, as old as theatrical defeat, that the work had been too hastily produced and unfairly treated. Who does not know such imputations and defences by heart? I recollect an old amateur player belonging to a quartet not unlike that of Monsieur Pattier, whimsical described by Paul de Kock, who, when his evening's work was over, took off his spectacles, wiped his forehead, and sadly said, 'Had there not been a cobweb in my violoncello I should have been heard better.'

"Cobweb or no cobweb, however, the end of the whole absurdity was that, subsequent to this rehearsal, the production of 'Das Rheingold' did not take place as advertised. For the utter absence of anything like cordiality at the rehearsal on the part of the audience, 'packed' as it was, some reason must needs be given, and Herr Richter is said to have pleaded for more rehearsal, being seconded by telegraphic instructions to that effect from Herr Wagner. The scenery was not good enough for the music, or the music did not fit the scenery, or the actors failed to act properly (where there is nothing to act), or to sing correctly music (in every scene of which a hundred false notes, more or less, would make not the slightest difference). Thus ran the excuses, after ten weeks' intense and arduous preparation! To this a peremptory refusal was returned by the Court manager of the theatre, Baron von Perfall, and—it may be presumed with the consent of Herr Wagner's 'kingly friend'—Herr Richter was, on the spot, suspended, and, to my certain knowledge, half a dozen Kapellmeisters, who had been drawn to Munich by curiosity, were tempted to assume the dangerous responsibility. All save one declined. But matters, as I left them, were at 'a dead lock,' owing to the assumptions of Herr Wagner, who is 'nothing if not' persecuted, or when brewing a storm. That, for the moment, he will make capital out of his last and worst attempt on public credulity may be safely predicated. The end is not yet. Meanwhile, no one need be surprised should the composer recover or regain his Court ascendancy; if the vindication of a cause so utterly worthless as his, and so utterly distasteful to all right-judging people, were to lead to a repetition of those scandals which marked the close of the career of King Louis of Bavaria, who, with all his favoritisms and fopperies in art, proved himself a far wiser and wider patron than his successor has hitherto done by his championship of the trashy productions of the author of 'Das Rheingold.' Never, surely, was there such a storm in a sloop-basin."

FOREIGN NOTES.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co., London, have reprinted "Malbone."

THE Byron controversy has reached Paris, where it threatens to cause as much discussion as in London.

A DIARY kept by a slave girl inside Delhi during the Mutiny is announced by one of the London publishers.

M. EMILE OLLIVIER is said to be contemplating matrimony again. His first wife was a daughter of the pianist Liszt.

MR. CAREW HAZLITT has just edited the complete works of William Browne, the Devonshire poet, in two small quarto volumes.

ONE of the alcoves of the British Museum is filled with different editions of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," printed in nearly all the known languages of the world.

THE German press is alive with clamors for Goethe's literary remains, which his grandchildren are accused of wantonly and frivolously secreting, against the express wish of the poet himself.

A SOLEMN council held at Baden decided that Mdle. Nilsson might play Mignon in her own hair. Acting upon this bold declaration of war against the tyranny of Ary Scheffer, the fair Swede left her brown wig at home.

To the incessant scrubbing bestowed upon M. Carpeaux's group of "La Danse" the ink-stains have given way. It is amusing to see that the more "proper" of the Parisian papers, such as L'Univers and Le Monde, regard the throwing of the ink-bottle as a protest against the indelicacy of the group.

THE cuckoo cry that Dr. Livingstone is "all right," and the comfortable idea that he will "turn up" somewhere, have ceased to pacify some of his friends, who suggest that an expedition should set out in search of the great traveller.

DURING her recent stay in Normandy Mlle. Nilsson created a sensation among the citizens of Dieppe and Etretat by readings from the English poets, and especially by her rendering of Tennyson's "Charge of the Light Brigade."

It turns out that the priceless Saxon MS., the gift of Leofric, the first Bishop of Exeter, which was said to have disappeared from the Chapter Library, never was there. It is safe among other MSS. in the Exeter Exchequer Chamber.

THE Emperor has sent to M. Theophile Gautier, in acknowledgment of the verses which that writer extemporized last season at the residence of the Princess Mathilde, a flattering autograph letter, accompanied by two magnificent Sevres vases.

M. EUGÈNE GODARD, the aeronaut, recently made an ascension at Rheims, but in alighting his balloon, the Cité-de-Florence, was caught in a gust of wind, and torn into strips. Fortunately the persons in the car, three in number, were unhurt.

THE Wheekblad voor Israelieten, a Dutch Jewish paper, reports that a Jewish lady in her hundredth year recently visited the Amsterdam Exhibition, accompanied by her grandson, who was himself a grandfather. She inspected a sewing-machine and threaded a needle without the aid of spectacles.

At a short distance from Rivadelles, an immense natural grotto, entirely filled with stalactite columns of great beauty, has just been discovered by some English miners. Passages extend in different directions for more than a league. Tourists declare this cavern to be one of the most beautiful in the world.

SPEAKING of the prosperity of this country, the Examiner remarks: "Had Secession succeeded, the Border line would now be bristling with bayonets; and men's thoughts, instead of being fixed on works of peaceful development and progress, would have been concentrated upon systems of strategy, works of fortification, and schemes of vengeance and destruction. What a blessed thing both for America and England it is that most of our noble and right honorable prophets prophesied foolishly."

A NEW poet has turned up in England, — a realistic poet, we should say, judging by the specimens of his verse given in the Athenæum. In a ballad on the battle of Trafalgar occurs this vigorous and racy stanza, the first line of which might have been written by the late Artemus Ward: —

"At 1.15 Lord Nelson fell,
And forty men around him;
A ball from the Redoubtable
Most grievously did wound him;
At half past four o'clock he died,
And Glory came and crowned him."

A GOOD deal has been said touching two precious manuscripts which, in 1589, used to lie on the table of Catherine de' Medici. These and others were said to have perished. It is now understood that all that Queen's MSS. and books are in the Imperial Library in Paris. The "Abus du Monde" and the "Prophéties des Sibylles" are described as being of great beauty, the latter particularly in its illustrations. The books on magic and astrology — sciences in which Catherine was particularly interested — abound in this collection.

THE remains of the unfortunate Adah Menken were some time ago removed from Pere La Chaise to Mont Parnasse, where the obelisk was raised to her memory. It is now stated that the wrong coffin was disinterred, a second having been placed surreptitiously above hers. An unknown corpse lies therefore under the obelisk, with its ornamental cross and wreath at Mont Parnasse, while poor Menken sleeps unnoticed in her humble grave. Her dying wishes were that it might be marked only by a rude cross, bearing the words "Thou knowest."

A STROKE of apoplexy has just killed Frederick, Prince of Hohenzollern-Hechingen. Twenty years ago he sold his ancient principality to Prussia for money and the title of "Highness." Childless by a first marriage, he took to wife a daughter of a Franciscan baron (Von Sybourg); but the lady was wife only by right of that fata morgana of wedded life, a morganatic marriage, the issue of which inherit neither name nor title of the father. The wife was created Countess von Rothenburg, and was divorced a few years ago. A son by this union (born in 1815) remains Herr Graf, as he was before his father's death. His sire was the last Prince of Hohenzollern-Hechingen; the son, Count Frederick, when his mother dies, will be the first Count von Rothenburg.

THE Indian papers state that the Maharajah of Travancore is about to perform the ceremony of Thooloparum. The process consists of his Highness being placed in one scale with an equal weight of gold in the other. The gold thus obtained is afterwards distributed among the Brahmins according to each one's privilege, and it is only after the ceremony that his Highness is supposed to be sanctified. There is another ceremony which consists in his Highness passing through the belly of a cow of gold; this is termed Ernigherpum. This it is proposed to celebrate next year. It is feared that these costly ceremonies, combined with the coming Moorajebum, will absorb a good portion of the surplus revenue of the State.

THE Duke of Cambridge, the commander-in-chief of the English army, lately did a brilliant thing. He signified his pleasure that all officers should wear steel scabbards for their swords, and at considerable trouble and expense the whim of his Royal Highness was obeyed. A group of officers, equipped with these new steel scabbards, was formed inside the Chatham redoubt at night, when a supposed enemy threw an electric light upon the work. In an instant each officer stood revealed by a gleam of white light down his side, an easy prey to the enemy's sharpshooters, had the campaign been real instead of mimic. The steel scabbards ordered by his Royal Highness are now to be blackened, also at considerable trouble and expense. So much for meddling with edged tools.

FOR some months past the Saturday Review has been set up in type, the separate letters of which are joined together with a sort of gum or cement, so that short words and parts of words are lifted from the case by the compositor in one operation, instead of picking up each separate and distinct letter. It is understood that this modern adaptation of the elder Mr. Walter's system of logotypography is not a complete success; the multiplication of the type boxes and difficulty of remembering the places of all the varied combinations of letters rendering the process slow and tedious. Messrs. Spottiswoode, the printers, who make this experiment, have tried many plans for abbreviating time and saving trouble in type-setting, but none of them have as yet superseded the method universally in use from the invention of printing.

In Paris "findings are not keepings," and no less than from eighteen to twenty thousand objects found upon the public way are deposited by the finders at a special dépôt for that purpose in the course of the year. About an equal number of articles left in public vehicles are similarly deposited. These waifs and strays are all stowed away within the prefecture of police, in an immense magazine, which forms a perfect bazaar of odds and ends of the most heterogeneous character, every one numbered, ticketed, classed, and arranged in marvellous order, waiting to be reclaimed by its lawful owner. The room where all the more valuable objects are deposited contains twelve immense presses filled with watches, chains, rouleaux of gold coin, bank-notes, diamonds, and jewelry of every kind, and there are commonly in these presses no less than twelve thousand unclaimed articles. The general dépôt comprises nine large rooms, furnished from top to bottom with shelves, upon which are piled objects of every shape, size, nature, and value, — cashmere shawls and sabots, hand-organs and artificial flowers, kitchen utensils and pocket-books, bunches of keys and currycombs. The number of objects in the dépôt at one time is usually about forty thousand. Ordinarily the number of canes, umbrellas, and parasols is at least fifteen thousand. All articles, if not reclaimed within a year, are handed back to the finders, who are required, however, to keep them two years and a day before they are legally entitled to dispose of them. Although Parisians are perfectly aware of the existence of this depot, comparatively few take the trouble to inquire there for any lost article; every one thinking his property is certain to have fallen into dishonest hands.

The author of "Friends in Council" contributes another collection of short essays to the last number of "Good Words," among which are the following characteristic memoranda: —

"Mushrooms, in their resolute growth, will lift up large slabs of stone, — such is the force of parvenus in the vegetable world."

"There is nothing so easily made offensive as good reasoning; and men of clear logical minds, if not gifted at the same time with tact, make more enemies than men with bad hearts and unsound understandings."

"Always win fools first. They talk much; and, what they have once uttered, they will stick to; whereas, there is always time, up to the last moment, to bring before a wise man arguments that may entirely change his opinion."

"No man, or woman, was ever cured of love by discovering the falseness of his or her lover. The living together for three long, rainy days in the country has done more to dispel love than all the perfidies in love that have ever been committed."

"There is certain work that had better be done roughly, — indeed, which loses all its best effect, if not done roughly. The wayside crosses and 'Christs' to be seen in Catholic countries would have little interest for us, if they were finished works of art. In their roughness lies their touchiness."

"After all, what attracts us most in animals are their demerits. The fox has ceaseless interest for us, both in fact and in fable, from his wicked versatility of guile; and the cool, demure selfishness of the cat is not without its charm to the lovers of the feline race. Is there anything similar to this feeling in our regard for human beings? I think there is; but then the demerits must not be such as to annoy us much and so to ruffle our tolerance for them."

"One is seldom more impressed, or at least one ought seldom to be more impressed, with the great achievements of man, and what a wonderful creature he is, than after listening to and seeing an opera."

"Think of the exquisite skill of the composer, who has written a separate score for each instrument, and how all these various sounds blend into delicious harmony."

"Observe the skill of the scene-painter, — how nicely he has adapted his work to the distance from which it is to be viewed."

"Give some credit, too, to the poet who has invented the novel or the drama, from which the opera is taken. Nor is the man who has adapted the graceful fiction to meet the necessities of operatic performers to be without his meed of praise."

"Note the mechanical contrivance which is everywhere employed, and how smoothly it all goes."

"Consider the skill with which the building has been formed both with regard to sight and sound."

"Again, observe — and this is sure to have gained your observation — what skill is shown by the actors and actresses. Those thrilling notes have not been produced without immense study, labor, and reflection."

"Lastly, do not fail to take note of the admirable organization which brings all this thought and labor and skill into a mirror, as it were, of representation."

"And yet there are some people who would persuade us that the creatures who have done all this are to perish like the beasts of the field. Humanity is to make continuous progress but the individuals are naught, and will be naught. I cannot believe it."

THE GOOSE GIRL.

A TALE OF THE YEAR 2099.

THE little goose-girl came singi
Along the fields, "Sweet May, oh! the long sweet day."

That was her song.
Bringing about her, floating about, in and out through the long

Fair tresses of her hair,
Oh! a thousand, thousand idlenesses,
Spreading away on May's breath everywhere.
"Idleness, sweet idleness."

But this was a time,
Two thousand and ninety-nine,
When singing of idleness even in spring,
Or drinking wind-wine,
Or looking up into the blue heaven, was counted a crime.

A time, harsh, not sublime;
One terrible sort of school-hour all the year through,
When every one had to do something, and do it by rule.

Why, even the babies could calculate
Two and two at the least, mentally, without a slate,
Each calling itself an aggregate Of molecules.

It was always school, schools all over
The world as far as the sky could cover
It, dry land and sea.

High priests said,
"Let matter be Z,
Thoroughly calculated and tried,
To work our problems with, before all eyes;
Anything beside that might prove a dangerous guide.

Xs or Ys, unknown quantities,
We hesitate not at once to designate Fit only now and forever to be laid aside."

So you see,
Everything was made as plain as could be,
Not the ghost of a doubt even left to roam about free;
Everybody's concern

Being just to learn, learn, learn —
In one way — but only in one way.
Where then did the little goose-girl come from that day?
I don't know.

Though, is n't there hard by
A place tender and sunny,
We can feel slid between
Our seen and unseen,
And whose shadows we trace on the earth's face

Now and then dimly? Well, she Was as ignorant as she could ignorant be,
And the world was n't school to her

Who came singing,
"Idleness, sweet idleness," up to the very feet
Of the professors' chairs,
And of the thousand and thousand pupils sitting round upon theirs.

Who up all sprang,
At the sound of the words she sang,

With "No, no, no, no; no,
There are no sweets in May,
None in the weary day.

What foolish thing is this, singing of idleness in spring?"

"Oh! sunny spring,"
Still sang the little goose-girl, wondering
As she was passing.

But suddenly stayed for a moment, basking
In the broad light, with wide eyes asking,
What "nay" could mean to the soft, warm day?

And as she stayed,
There strayed our from her
May breaths, wandering all the school over.
But now the hard eyes move her,
And her lips quiver,
As the sweet notes shiver

Between them, and die,
So her singing ceases: she Looking up crying, "Why,
Is my May not sweet?
Is the wide sky fair?
Are the free winds fleet?
Are the feet of the spring not rare,
That tread flowers out of the soil?
Oh! long hours not for toil,
But for wondering and singing."

"No, no, no, no," these reply,
"Silly fancies of flowers and skies;
All these things we know,
There is nothing to wonder at, sing,
Love or fear.
Is not everything simple and clear,
And common and near us, and weary?
So, pass by idle dreaming,
And you if you would like to know
Being from seeming,
Come into the schools and study."

"Still to sing sometimes when I have the will,
And be idle and ponder,"
Said the goose-girl, "and look up to heaven and wonder."

"What! squander truth's time
In dreams of the unknown sublime?
No." "Then ignorant always," said she,
"I must be"; and went on her way,
"Sweet May, sad May."

Hanging her head,
Till "The mills of the gods grind slowly," she said,

"But they grind exceeding small;
Let be, I will sit by the mills of the gods and watch the slow atoms fall."

So patient and still, through long, patient hours,
As she laid her heart low in the hearts of the flowers;

Through clouds and through shine,
With smiles and with tears,
Through long hours, through sweet years,

Oh! years — for a year was only one school-hour in Two thousand and ninety-nine.

And see,
Who are these that come creeping
Out from the school? Long ago,
When idlenesses out of her tresses strayed the school over;

Some slept of the learners, some played.
These crept out to wonder and sing,
And look for her yonder,

Away up the hills amongst the gods' mills —
And now

"Is it this way?" they say,
Bowling low;

"Oh! wise, by the heaven in thine eyes,
Teach, we will learn of thee.
Is it No, is it Yes,
Labor or idleness?"

She, answering meekly, "This —
Neither No, nor Yes,
But, come into God and see."

Oh! the deeps we can feel; Oh! the heights we must climb;

Oh! slow gentle hours of the golden time, —
Here, the end of my rhyme.

LOST PRETERITES.

A LIVING language is like a living man. It has its tender infancy, its passionate youth, its careful maturity, its gradual though it may be imperceptible decay, and, finally, its death. After death comes apotheosis, if it has been worthy of such honor,—or burial in the books, which, like the remains or memorials of ancient heroes, become the sacred treasure of newer ages. All languages pass through these epochs in their career. Sanscrit, Greek, and Latin are familiar examples of the death and sanctity of great and mighty tongues that were once living powers to sway the passions and guide the reason of men. In their ashes even yet live the wonted fires that scholars love to rekindle. The languages of modern Europe that have sprung directly from the Latin may all be said to have passed their infancy and youth, and to have reached maturity, if not old age. The Celtic languages—all sprung from an ancient Oriental root, and which include Gaelic, Erse, Manx, Welsh, and Breton—are, in the last stage of vitality, destined to disappear, at no very remote period into the books, which will alone preserve their memory. Were it not for Victor Hugo, and some recent borrowings from the English, it might be said that French had ceased to expand, and had become stereotyped into a form no longer to be modified. Spanish, Portuguese, and Italian hold their own; and that is all that can be said of them. German, and the languages sprung from the same root and stem, contain within themselves such immense resources, and are so continually evolving out of the depths of their inner consciousness such new compounds, if not such new words, as to free them from that reproach of stagnation which may not unjustly be applied to the other great tongues which we have enumerated. But English—which, taken all in all, may be considered by far the richest, though not the most beautiful or the most sonorous, of all the languages spoken in our day—is yet in its vigorous youth, and cannot be accused of exhibiting any symptoms of decay. It is doubtful whether it have yet reached the full maturity of its prime, or whether the mighty nation now existent in America, or the as mighty nation which is destined yet to arise in Australia, will not, as time rolls on, and new wants are created, new circumstances encountered, and new ideas evolved out of the progress of science and civilization, add many thousands of new words to our already copious vocabulary. Other languages are dainty in the materials of their increment; but the English is, like man himself, omnivorous. Nothing comes much amiss to its hungry palate. It does not live on air and honey-dew, or even on bread, like more delicate organizations. All nature, all the languages of the earth, administer to its wants. It borrows, it steals, it assimilates what words it pleases from all the points of the compass, and asks no questions of them, but that they shall express thoughts and describe circumstances more tersely and more accurately than any of the old words beside which they are invited to take their places. Greek and Latin are its common food; French has long been its restaurateur; Arabia has supplied it with refreshment; Turkey has administered to its needs; Persia has helped it to a hors d'œuvre or two; and the once despised, but in many respects beautiful, dialect of its Scottish brother has given it strong and wholesome food in the shape of many poetical words, which it is not likely to part with. But if English is thus perpetually growing and gaining, it is at the same time perpetually losing. Were it not for the noble translation of the Bible, and for Chaucer, Gower, and the poets of the Elizabethan age, it would have lost still more than it has of its early treasures, and would have been Latinized to an extent that would have impaired its vigor, emasculated its passion, and deprived it of that sturdy vernacular which is the richest element in its blood, and best serves to build up its bone and muscle. If few languages now spoken in the world have gained so much as the English from the progress of civilization, it must be admitted, at the same time, that few have lost so much, and lost it without necessity. It has been said that a good carpenter is known as much by the shape as by the quantity of his chips; and the chips that the English tongue has thrown off since the days of Piers Ploughman to our own betoken, both by quality and quantity, what a plethora of wealth it possesses, and what a very cunning carpenter Time has proved in working with such abundant materials.

It is one of the current assertions which, once started on high authority are never again or very rarely questioned, that the writings of Chaucer are a "well of pure English undefiled." Chaucer's well, limpid and beautiful as it is, and undefiled as grammarians and critics may please to consider it, is not so much a fountain as a single stream. Chaucer, though so ancient in our eyes, was a neologist in his own day, and strove rather to increase the wealth of the written English, of which he was so great a master, by the introduction of words from the Norman French little understood by the bulk of the people, though familiar enough to the aristocracy, for whom he mainly wrote, than to fix in his pages forever the strong simple words of his native Anglo-Saxon. The stream of English in his writings runs pure and cool; the stream of Norman-French runs pure and bright also; but the two currents that he introduced into his song never thoroughly intermingled in the language and at least nine tenths of the elegant Gallicisms which he employed found no favor with successive writers; and few of them have remained except in the earlier poems of Milton. If we really wish to discover the true well of English undefiled, where the stream runs clear and unmixed, we must look to the author of Piers Ploughman rather than to Chaucer. We shall there find a large vocabulary of strong words, such as are plain to all men's comprehension at the present day in the Bible, as well as in the common speech of the peasantry; and above all in that ancient form of the English language which is known as the Scottish dialect.

Since the days of Piers Ploughman, a work invaluable to every English philologist, the spoken language of the peasantry has undergone but few changes as regards words, but very many changes as regards terminations and inflections. On the other hand, the language of literature and polite society has undergone changes so vast that uneducated people are scarcely able to understand the phraseology that occurs in the masterpieces of our great authors, or the Sunday sermons of their pastors, delivered, as the saying is, "above their heads," in words that are rarely or never employed in their every-day hearing. Among this class survive large numbers of verbs as well as of inflections that ought never to have been allowed to drop out of literature, and which it only needs the efforts of a few great writers and orators to restore to their original favor.

Among the losses which the English language has undergone are, first, the loss of the plurals in n and in en, and the substitution of the plural in s; secondly, the present participle in and, for which we have substituted the nasal and disagreeable ing; thirdly, the loss of the French negative ne, as in nill, for "I will not"; nould, for "I would not"; n'am, for "I am not"; and of which the sole trace now remaining is "willy-nilly"; and, fourthly, the substitution of the preterite in d, as in loved and admir'd, for the older and much stronger preterite formed by a change in the vowel sound of the infinitive and the present, as in run, ran; bite, bit; speak, spoke; take, took; and many others that still survive. And not only has the language lost the strong preterite in a great variety of instances where it would have been infinitely better to have retained it, but it has lost many hundred preterites altogether, as well as many whole verbs, which the illiterate sometimes use, but which literature for a hundred and fifty years has either ignored or despised. Of all the nouns that formerly formed their plural in n, as the German or Saxon nouns still for the most part do, very few survive, — some in the Bible, some in poetical composition, some in the common conversation of the peasantry, and some, but very few, in polite literature. Among them may be mentioned "oxen," for oxes; "kine," for cows; "shoon," for shoes; "hosen," for stockings; "een," for eyes; "housen," for houses; and the words, as common to the vernacular as to literature, "men," "women," "brethren," and "children." In America, the word "sistern," as a companion to brethren, survives in the conventicle and the meeting-house. "Lamben" and "thumben," for "lambs" and "thumbs," were comparatively euphemistic words; but thumbs and lambs, and every noun which ends with a consonant in the singular, are syllables which set music, and sometimes pronunciation, at defiance. What renders the matter worse is, that the s in the French plural, from which this perversion of the English language was adopted, is not sounded, and that the plural is really marked by the change of the definite article, as le champ, les champs. Thus in borrowing an unpronounced consonant from the French, in order to pronounce it we have adulterated our language with a multitude of sibilants alien to its spirit and original structure. The substitution of s for eth as the terminal of the present person singular of every verb in the language is an aggravation of the evil. If this change had been repudiated by our forefathers, a grace much needed would have been retained in the language.

Gradually, too, the English language has lost the large number of diminutives which it formerly possessed, and which are still common in the Scottish dialect. The English diminutives in ordinary use in the nursery are many, but are chiefly employed in the pet names of children, as "Willie," for little William; "Annie," for little Ann; and so forth. The diminutives belonging to literature are few; and if we write "darling," for little dear; "lordling," for a small lord; "mannikin," for a very small man; and such words as "gosling," "duckling," "kitten," we have pretty nearly exhausted the list. But formerly almost every monosyllabic noun had its lawful diminutive, as it has to this day in the Scottish dialect, where such words as "housie," "wife," "birdie," "doggie," "bairnie," "mannie," "bookie," "lassie," "lammie," and hundreds of others, are constantly employed. Every Scotsman understands the phrase "a bonnie wee lassiekie," in which there are no less than three diminutives piled one upon the other, to increase the tenderness of an expression which ceased to be English four hundred years ago.

Among other losses, the plural in en of the present tenses of all the verbs is greatly to be lamented. We loven and we smilen would serve many rhythmical needs, and administer to many poetic elegances that the modern forms do not supply.

"The persons plural," observes Ben Jonson in his English Grammar, — a work by no means so well known as his poetry, — "keep the termination of the first person singular. In former times, till about the reign of King Henry VIII, they were wont to be formed by adding en; thus, 'loven,' 'sayen,' 'complainen.' But now (whatsoever is the cause) it hath quite grown out of use. Albeit (to tell you my opinion) I am persuaded that the lack thereof, well considered, will be found a great blemish to our tongue."

But of all the losses which the language has sustained, not alone for poetry, but for oratory, that of many useful verbs, some of which are still existing in Scottish parlance, and of the ancient preterites and past participles of many old verbs of which the infinitives and present tenses still hold their places, is the most to be deplored. This loss began early; and that the process is still in operation in the present day, is manifest from the fact that many preterites written in the best books and spoken in the best society forty years ago are dropping out of use before our eyes. We constantly find bid for bade, — "he bids me now"; "he bid me yesterday"; dare for durst, — "I told him I dare not do it"; need for needed, — "it was clear to me a year ago that he need not perform his promise"; eat for ate or ett, — "he eat his dinner"; bet for betted, — "he bet me a thousand to one." The verbs to let, to cast, and to put seem to have enjoyed no preterite during the last two hundred years in English, though in Scottish literature, both of the past and the present, their preterites are as common as their infinitives and present tenses. Must, in English, is equally devoid of the infinitive, the preterite, and the future; while can has a preterite, but neither infinitive nor future. For what reasons these and similar losses have occurred in English and in other modern languages it might be interesting to inquire, though it might possibly lead us into metaphysical mazes were we to ask why an Englishman who may say "I can" and "I could," must not say "I will can," but must resort to the periphrase of "I will be able," to express power in futurity; or why the sense of present duty and obligation implied in the words "I must" cannot be expressed by the same verb if the duty be bygone or future, as "I musted," or "I will must," but have to be translated, as it were, into "I was obliged," or "I will be obliged," to do such and such a thing hereafter. These, however, are losses, whatever may be their occult causes, which can never again be supplied, and which at our time of day it is useless to lament.

The loss which most immediately concerns us in this paper is that of the many preterites and past participles of ancient verbs that are still in use, and of many good English verbs in all their tenses which without reason have been left for vernacular use to the north of England and Scotland, and have not been admitted to the honors of modern literature, except in the poems of Robert Burns and the novels of Sir Walter Scott. We shall not attempt to give a complete list of the lost preterites of our noble tongue, — preterites that ought not to be lost, — preterites that are not dead but sleeping, — preterites that only need the fostering care of two or three writers and speakers of genius and influence to be revived, — preterites that formed the bone and pith of the language of our forefathers, and that make the beauty and strength of the Bible in many of its noblest passages, and that particularly commend themselves to us in Shakespeare, — but shall select a number of the most beautiful as well as the most useful, as hints to the writers of the present and the future, — showing them, as it were, a bank on which the wild thyme blows luxuriously, and where the industrious bees of literature can gather stores of honey. Taking them alphabetically, for the sake of convenience and reference, we begin with: —

Aze, to inquire. — This was the original and is the legitimate form of the verb now written and pronounced ask, and is not only to be heard in colloquial use all over England, but to be found in our earliest writers, with the inflexions azed and azen: —

"Envy with heavy harte Azed after Thrifte."
Vision of Piers Ploughman.

"If he aze a fish." — Wickliffe's Bible.

"Aze not why." — Chaucer: The Miller's Tale.

For the purposes of lyrical poetry and musical composition, the past participle of this verb, if reintroduced into literature, would be a vast improvement upon the harsh sound asked, which no vocalist can pronounce without a painful gasp.

Bid, and its derivative forbid. — The ancient preterite and past participle of this verb were bade and bidden, forbade and forbidden. Both of these inflections are threatened with extinction; — for what offence it is impossible to surmise. Shakespeare says: —

"The very moment that he bade me do it."

That our modern writers do not follow the example of Shakespeare, and conform to the rules of good English, may appear from the following examples: —

"The competition is so sharp and general that the leader of to-day can never be sure that he will not be outbid to-morrow." — Quarterly Review, April, 1868.

"Mr. Charles Dickens has finally bide farewell to Philadelphia." — Times, March 4, 1868.

"Uncertain even at that epoch (1864) of Austria's fidelity, Prussia bide high for German leadership." — Times, April 9, 1868.

"He called his servants and bide them procure firearms." — Times, letter from Dublin, March 2, 1868.

"James the First, besides writing a book against tobacco, forbid its use by severe penalties." — Tobacco, by D. King, M. D.

Beat, beaten. — "The preterite of this verb," says Walker, in his Pronouncing Dictionary, is uniformly pronounced by the English like the present tense. "I think," says Dr. Johnson to Horne Tooke, in one of the imaginary conversations of Savage Landor, "that I have somewhere seen the preterite bate." "I am afraid," replied Tooke, "of reminding you where you probably met with the word. The Irishman in Fielding's Tom Jones says 'he bate me.'" Johnson replied, "that he would not hesitate to employ the word in grave composition"; and Tooke acquiesced in the decision, justifying it by a statement of the fact, which, however, he did not prove, "that authors much richer both in thought and expression than any now living or recently deceased have done so." Children, who often make preterites of their own, in this respect acting unconsciously upon the analogies of the language, often say bett for did beat. And the children, it would appear, are correct, if the following from Piers Ploughman be considered good English: —

"He laid on me with rage
And hitte me under the ear;
He buffetted me so about the mouth
That out my teeth he bette."

In Ross's Helenore — a perfect storehouse of Anglo-Saxon words current in Aberdeenshire, Kincardineshire, the Mearns, and the northeast of Scotland — we find, —

"Baith their hearts bett wi' the common stound,
And had nae pain, but pleasure in the wound."

This preterite might well be revived; it is sadly wanted, as witness the following passage from Mr. Diaraeli's Vivian Grey: "Never was she so animated; never had she boasted that her pulse beat more melodious music; or her lively blood danced a more healthful measure." If "danced" (a preterite), why not bett, as Piers Ploughman has it? The following recent example of the present for the past participle beaten, is wholly unjustifiable: —

"They were stoned, and the horse in their vehicle beat severely." — Temple Bar Magazine, March, 1869.

Bake, boke, boken, to bake. — Both the preterite and the past participle of this verb are lost to literature, though they survive in the rural dialects of Scotland and the north of England. The language possesses but few trochaic rhymes, and in this respect boken might do good service to many a poet at his wife's end for a rhyme to "broken" and "token."

Betide, betid, from tide, to happen. — The preterite is lost. It occurs both in Piers Ploughman and in Chaucer: —

"Thee should never have tidde so fair a grace." — Canterbury Tales.

Blend, blent, to mingle. — The preterite of this verb is very properly preserved by the poets, but seems to have entirely given way in prose and in ordinary speech to "blended." Any reason for the change it is impossible to discover; for if it be correct to say "blended," it would be equally correct to say "spended," "lended," or "rended." This form of the preterite in the verb "to mend" has properly been superseded by "mended," in order to avoid the confusion that would be caused in the use of the verb "to mean," which has its proper preterite in "meant." Byron uses blent with fine effect in his noble lines on The Battle of Waterloo: —

"Rider and horse, friend, foe, in one red burial blent."

Bren or brend, brent or brand, to burn. — This verb is lost, though it might well have been retained in the language. "A brand plucked from the burning," is almost its sole remnant.

"Bring in better wood.
And blow it till it brend." — Piers Ploughman.

Blin, blan, to cease, to stop: —

"And so he did or that they went atwin, Till he had turned him he could not blin."
Chaucer: The Chanones' Yeman's Tale.

"Her tears did never blin." — Nares: Romeus and Julietta.

"One while then the page he went,
Another while he ranne,
Till he 'd o'ertaken King Estmere,
I wis he never blanne."
Percy's Reliques: King Estmere.

Brest, brast, to burst: —

"Have thou my truth, till that mine herte brest."
Chaucer: The Franklin's Tale.

"The mayor smote Cloudestee with his bill,
His buckler he brast in two."

Percy's Reliques: Adam Bell, Clym of the Clough, and William of Cloudestee.

Busk, busked, to adorn, to dress, to make ready: —

"Busk ye, my merry men all,
And John shall go with me."
Percy's Reliques: Robin Hood and Guy of Gisborne.

"The king's bowmen busked them blythe."
Percy's Reliques: Adam Bell, Clym of the Clough, and William of Cloudestee.

"The noble baron whet his courage hot,
And busked him bokkly to the dreadful fight."
Fairfax: Translation of Tasso.

"Busk ye, busk ye, my bonnie, bonnie bride."
Hamilton: Braes o' Yarrow.

"A bonnie bride is spon buskit."
Allan Ramsay's Scotch Proverbs.

Cast, to throw. — This verb in English has lost its preterite coost, and its past participle casten. Both survive in Scotland and the north of England: —

"They coost keivils them amang Wha should to the greenwood gang."
Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border.

Bur is employed the preterite in The Death and Dying Words of Poor Maillie: —

"As Maillie and her lamb together,
Were as day nibbling on the tether,
Upon her cloot she coost a blench."

And again, in his immortal song of Duncan Gray: —

"Maggie coost her head fu' high,
Looked askint and unco skeigh,
Gart poor Duncan stand abeigh."

In the Scottish dialect "to cast out" means "to fall out," "to disagree"; and the phrase "they have casten out" is of constant occurrence.

Conne or can, to be able. — Neither the infinitive nor the past participle of this verb seems to have been used since the days of Chaucer, who says, "I shall not conne answer"; and in the Romance of the Rose has "Thou shalt never conne knowen."

Cut. — This verb never appears to have had a preterite, though a past participle ykutt or ykutt is cited in Herbert Coleridge's vocabulary of the Older Words in the English Language. Whence or when the word was introduced into English no lexicographer has ever yet been able to determine. It is neither derived from the Anglo-Saxon, the French, the Greek, nor the Latin, and is therefore, by the exhaustive process, supposed by the most recent compilers of dictionaries to have been borrowed from the Celtic. A near approach to it occurs in the French couteau, a knife or instrument to cut with; in the Italian coltello; and in the English and Scottish coulter, the ploughshare, or knife of the plough. It may be that the original word was kut, whence ykutt, cited by Mr. Coleridge, and that it formed its preterite by cat and cut. Some little support for this idea may be found in the word cat as applied in "cat-o'-nine-tails," a weapon that cuts pretty severely; and in kit-cat, as applied to portraits that are not exactly full-length, but cut to three-quarters length, as those painted for the celebrated "Kit-Kat Club."

Clead or clede, clad, to clothe. — The preterite and past participle remain in poetical use as well as in dignified prose, while the infinite and the present and future tenses have been superseded by the much harsher word "clothe."

Clepe, or clept, yclept, to call, to name. — The past participle of this verb remains for the use of bad writers, and sometimes of good writers who compose mock heroics.

"The compaignie of comfort, Men cleped it some tyme." — Piers Ploughman.

"Paraventure in thilk large book
Which that men clepe the heaven ywritten was With stars." — Chaucer: The Man of Lawes' Tale.

"They clepe us drunkards." — Shakespeare: Hamlet.

"As hounds and greyhounds, mongrels, spaniels, curs, Shoughs, water-rugs, and demi-wolves are cleped
All by the name of dogs." — Shakespeare: Macbeth.

Mr. Halliwell, in his Archaic Dictionary, says that the word is still used by boys at play in the eastern counties, who clepe or call the sides at a game. Many newspaper writers in the present day, at a loss for a word for calling or naming an inanimate object, talk of the "christening" of a church, a street, a battle, or any inanimate object. An example occurs in an editorial article of the Times, July 12, 1869, on the removal of the grating from the ladies' gallery in the House of Commons, — "the grate question," as Mr. Lowe christened it. In this and other instances the old word clepe, in default of call or name, would be an improvement, if it were possible to revive it.

Clem, clain, clammed, to perish of hunger, to starve. — "To starve" originally meant "to die," as we still say of a person that he is "starving with cold." The word has lately come to signify "to die for want of food," and has produced a very ugly and incorrect hybrid in the word "starvation," said to have been first used by Mr. Dundas, the first Lord Melville, who, as Horace Walpole informs us, received afterwards the nickname of "Starvation Dundas." The word at the time was supposed to be an Americanism. It has unfortunately fixed itself into our literature; but the original and much better word clem and its derivatives still hold their ground in Lancashire and the north of England. The word clem does not occur in Shakespeare, but both Ben Jonson and Massinger use it:—

"Hard is the choice when the valliant must eat their arms or clem." — Ben Jonson: Every Man out of his Humor.

"I cannot eat stones and turf. What! will he clem me and my followers? Ask him, will he clem me?" — Ben Jonson: The Postaster.

"My entrails were clammed with a perpetual fast." — Massinger: The Roman Actor.

"Let us all clem," said a speaker at a public meeting at Manchester during the American civil war, "rather than help the cause of slavery." "I would rather clem than go to the workhouse," is still a common and honorable expression in Lancashire.

Clip, clap, clippe, to embrace, to fondle. — Before the English language borrowed from the French the word embrace, from embrasser, to clasp in the arms, this verb was in constant use. It occurs in Piers Ploughman and in Chaucer, and had not fallen out of fashion or favor in the days of Shakespeare:—

"Clippe we in covenant, and each of us clippe other." — Piers Ploughman.

"He kiseth her and clippeth her full o't." — Chaucer: The Merchant's Tale.

"Worse than Tantalus is her annoy,
To clip Elysium and yet lack her joy." — Shakespeare: Venus and Adonis.

"Then embraces his son, and then again he worries his daughter with clipping her." — Shakespeare: Winter's Tale.

"Oh let me clip ye in arms as round as when I woo'd!" — Shakespeare: Coriolanus.

"The lusty vine, not jealous of the Ivy, Because she clips the elm." — Beaumont and Fletcher.

The preterite, once common, survives to this day in the form of an infinitive and of a noun, but in both too offensive to modesty to be further mentioned.

Crine, crone, crunken, to shrivel from heat, frost, or sickness. — This verb, with all its declensions, has perished, and only survives in its diminutive, to crinkle. In this last form it is rather of the Middle Ages than of our own. See the ballad of the "Boy and the Mantle" in Percy's Reliques.

Chirm, charm, churm, to sound like the murmur or song of a multiplicity of birds. — Mr. Halliwell, in his Archaic Dictionary, defines the word to mean the melancholy undertone of a bird previous to a storm. Nares, in his Glossary, has charre, to make a confused noise, a word current in some parts of England. The word is common in Scotland, though almost obsolete in the south:—

"Small birds with chirming and with cheeping clanged their song." — Gavin Douglas's translation of the Æneid.

"At last the kindly sky began to clear,
The birds to chirm, and daylight to appear." — Ross's Helenore.

Milton makes Eve speak of the "charm of earliest birds," a phrase which has been misinterpreted to mean the charming (in the modern sense) song of the birds, while it really means chirm (in the old English sense), the confused and intermingled song of all the morning birds.

Clout, clouted, to mend, to put a patch upon. — The verb survives in Scotland, but has perished out of modern English literature, although Shakespeare used it:—

"I thought he slept, and put My clouted brogues from off my feet, whose rudeness Answered my steps too loud." — Cymbeline.

"Many sentences of one meaning clouted up together." — Roger Ascham.

"Clout the auld, the new are dear,
My Joe Janet." — Robert Burns.

Daff, daft, to make a fool of, to play the fool. — Daffe in Chaucer signifies a fool; and in the Scottish and North English dialect a daft man signifies a lunatic, or one who has been befooled. Daffing signifies foolish fun or merriment. In the scene between Leonato and Claudio in Much Ado about Nothing, when Claudio declines to fight the old man, and says, —

"Away! away! I will not have to do with you,"

Leonato replies, —

"Canst thou so daff me? Thou hast killed my child."

Both Mr. Charles Knight and Mr. Howard Stanton, following in the track of other Shakespearean editors, explain daff in this passage to mean doff, or put off. The true meaning is to befoo, as the word is used in Chaucer. When, elsewhere, Shakespeare says of Prince Henry, —

"Thou madcap Prince of Wales, that daffed the world aside," the meaning of the word is the same. The "madcap" did not daff the world aside, for in this sense the expression would be pleonastic, but daffed or fooled or jested it aside, as a madcap would.

Dare, dared or durst, dared. — The tendency of our modern and colloquial English, as well as of our current literature, is to ignore the two preterites and the past participle of this word, and to write and say dare where durst or dared would be more correct. There is also a tendency to omit the s in the third person singular of the present tense. The following are examples of each inaccuracy:—

"Neither her maidens nor the priest dare speak to her for half an hour" (durst speak to her, &c.) — Hereward the Wake, by the Rev. Charles Kingsley.

"The Government dare [durst] not consent to the meeting being held.

No one can feel anything but contempt for a Government which meanly attempts to gain a cheap reputation for firmness by fulminations which it dare [dares] not carry out; and by prohibiting meetings which it dare [dares] not prevent." — Morning Star on the Hyde Park riots, 1866.

There is no reason why this verb should be deprived of its declensions, and no careful writer ought to fall into the errors just cited.

Deem, doom, deemed, to judge. — This word, which now signifies "to think" rather than "to judge," and which has lost its old preterite doom, formerly implied the delivery of a doom, sentence, or judgment. Chaucer calls a judge a doomsman; and in the Isle of Man the judge is still called the dempster or deemster. The day of Doom is the day of Judgment. Chaucer does not use the old preterite doom, which seems to have perished before his time; but in the Franklein's Prologue uses the substantive doom in the sense of an opinion or a private judgment:—

"As to my doom, there is more that is here
Of eloquence that shall be thy peer,
If that thou live."

Out of the lost preterite the English writers of three centuries ago formed a new verb, to doom, with a regular preterite, doomed, — a word which does not merely signify to pass judgment upon, but to pass a severe sentence.

Delve, delve, dolven, to dig, to make a trench or ditch, to bury in the earth. — This verb is still retained in poetical composition, and in the every-day speech of the people in Scotland and some of the northern counties; but the old preterite and past participle are lost. They have found a substitute in the regular declension delved. The old preterite seems to have become obsolete at an early period, as appears from the distich of John Ball the priest, the friend and coadjutor of Wat Tyler in the rebellion of 1381: —

"When Adam delved and Eve span,
Who was then the gentleman?"

Chaucer used the participle, "I would be dolven [buried] deep"; and in the Romance of Merlin, a man who was to be buried alive is described as to "be dolven quick." Piers Ploughman has, "They dolven with spades and shovels to drive away hunger." Keats, in more modern times employs, delved: —

"Oh for a draught of vintage that hath been Cooled a long age in the deep delved earth!"

If he had said deep dolven instead of deep delved, he would have had high authority, and would have greatly improved the stately march and music of his verse.

Dight, dighted, to prepare, to put in order, to deck, to attire, to wipe away. — This useful word of many meanings is all but obsolete in English literature, but survives in Scottish. The preterite has long been lost, and is not employed in Piers Ploughman or in Chaucer. An offshoot of this word in the form of misdight (misprepared) occurs in Jack Miller's song, quoted by Stowe in his account of Wat Tyler's rebellion: —

"If might Go before right,
And will Before skill,
Then is our mill misdight."

Spenser and Milton both attempted to revive dight, but with only partial success: —

"Soon after them, all dancing in a row,
The comely virgins came with garlands dight."
The Faerie Queene.

"The clouds in thousand liveries dight." — L'Allegro.

"Storied windows richly dight." — Il Penseroso.

In Scottish parlance dight does constant service. The lassie dights her mou' before accepting a kiss, and dights her een after she has been weeping. She dights herself in her best attire before going to kirk; and the wife dights the dinner for her husband: —

"Dight your cheeks, and banish care." — Allan Ramsay.

"Let me rax up to dight that tear,
And go with me and be my dear."

Burns: The Jolly Beggars.

Ding, dang, dong or dung, to strike hard, to beat down. — The infinitive and present tense of this verb are still colloquially current, but the preterite and past participle are obsolete, or only survive in the nursery phrase, "Ding, dong, bell." In Scotland the verb and all its inflections survive. Burns, in his immortal and often-quoted line, says, "Facts are chieles that winna ding." Sir Alexander Boswell has a song entitled "Jenny dang the Weaver," into the very prosaic form of "Jenny vanquished the cotton manufacturer." The past participle occurs in the familiar proverbs quoted by Allan Ramsay, "It's a sair dung bairn that manna greet," and "He's sairest paid that's dung wi' his ain wand." The modern English preterite dinged is still occasionally heard in conversation, though lost to literature, as in such phrases: "Horace? Yes; he was dinged into me at school"; and colloquially, "Why do you keep dinging that old story into my ears?" The word constantly occurs in serious poetry up to the time of Shakespeare and Ben Jonson: —

"Do-well shall dyngen him down, And destroyen his mighte."

Piers Ploughman.

"The hellish prince, grim Plato with his mace, ding down my soul to hell!" — The Battle of Alcazar.

Dow, to be able, to thrive: dought, was able. — This verb is utterly lost from English literature, but, like many others of its sturdy class, exists in the speech of the English peasantry, and in the speech as well as the literature of Scotland. By a strange neglect, or a stranger ignorance, the makers of dictionaries — from Blount and Philips up to Richardson, Worcester, and Webster — have either omitted all mention of it, or erroneously considered it to be synonymous with, or an orthographical error for, the similar word "do," with which it has no connection. "I do-as well as I dow" — i. e. "I do as well as I can" — is a common phrase in the north; and the supereminently English but pleonastic inquiry, "How do you do?" which means "How do you dow?" — i. e. thrive, prosper, or get on, — has come to be accepted as accurate English, though wholly a mistake of the learned. Even Nares, in his Glossary, has no suspicion of this word, though Halliwell, more acute, gives one of its meanings, "to thrive," "to mend in health"; and Mr. Thomas Wright, in his Provincial Dictionary, follows in the same track as regards its use in English literature, though he does not seem to be aware of its commonness in the literature of Scotland. William Hamilton, the Scottish poet, writes to his friend Allan Ramsay: —

"Lang may'st thou live and thrive and dow!"

And Burns says to Gavin Hamilton: —

"When I downa yoke a naig,
The Lord be thankit, I can beg!"

In his Epistle to King George III., in his eulogy of facts, Burns speaks of them as "chieles that winna ding," and adds, "they downa be disputed." Ross, in his Helenore, has "When he dow do naem air," — a phrase that shows the essential difference between the two words.

From this obsolete verb springs the adjective doughty, strong, able, — a derivation which up to the present time seems to have escaped all the English lexicographers.

Dread, drad, dradden, to fear greatly. — The modern preterite and past participle dreaded have entirely superseded the ancient forms: —

"But what I drad, did me, poor wretch, betide."

Robert Greene: 1598.

Dwine, dwined, to pine away, to fall off. — This verb has been superseded by its diminutive, to dwindle, which has the same meaning: —

"Thus *dwine*th he till he be dead." — Gower.

"It dwined for eld." — Chaucer.

"Bacchus hates repining;"

Fang, fong, fung, to seize, to lay hold of. — Most people remember the old law phrase, "infang thief and outfang thief," the one signifying a thief taken within the jurisdiction of a feudal lord, and the other a thief taken without his jurisdiction. This is the only remnant of this verb that has come down to our time except the substantive fang, the large tooth of a beast of prey or of a serpent; the diminutive fangle, to take hold of a new fancy or fashion; and the common phrase new-fangled : —

"I nold fang a farthing" (I would not take a farthing).
Vision of Piers Ploughman.

"He fong his foemen by the flank,
And flang him on the floor."
Buchan's Northern Ballads.

Fare, foor, fore, fure, fared, to travel. — This verb is not wholly obsolete, though its preterite is lost. It has come to signify to eat and drink as well as to travel, and also that which is eaten or drunk. It is doubtful whether our beautiful word "farewell" means "may you travel well through life," or "may you be well treated by the world." A way-faring man is still a common expression. "Auld-farrand," travelling on the old ways, old-fashioned, is intelligible to the people on both sides of the Tweed. The preterite occurs several times in the Vision of Piers Ploughman.

"Alexander fell into a fever therewith, so that he fare wondrous ille." — MS. Lincoln, quoted in Halliwell's Archaic Dictionary.

"Her errand led her through the glen to fare."
Rosa's Helenore.

"As o'er the moor they lightly foor,
A burn was clear, a glen was green,
Up the banks they eased their shanks." — Burns.

Fret, fret, fretten, to devour or eat up : —

"Like as it were a moth fretting a garment." — Psalm xxxix.
Common Prayer.

"Adam freet of that fruit,
And forsook the love of our Lord." — Piers Ploughman.

"He (the dragon) has fretten of folk more than five hundred."
— Morte d'Arthur.

Frush, frusht, frushed, to bruise, disturb, rumple, disarrange. — This good Shakespearian word is fairly admissible into modern dictionaries, in most of which, however, it does not find a place : —

"Stand ! stand, thou Greek ! thou art a goodly mark !
No ! wilt thou not ? I like thy armor well,
I'll frush it and unlock the rivets all !"
Shakespeare : Troilus and Cressida.

"Hector assailed Achilles and gave him so many strokes that he all to frusht and break his helm." — Caxton's Destruction of Troy.

"High cedars are frushed with tempests." — Hinde : 1606.

Southey uses the substantive : —

"Horrible uproar and frush of rocks that meet in battle."

The word well deserves favor and restoration.

Gar, gart, gard, to compel, to force, to make, to cause a thing to be done. — This verb in all its declensions has become obsolete in English literature, where its place has been but feebly supplied by "make" and "made." "I'll make him do it" is neither so strong nor so elegant as the ancient English and modern Scotch, "I'll gar him do it : " —

"Gar us have meat and drink, and make us chere."
Chaucer : The Reeve's Tale.

"Gar saddle me my bonnie black,
Gar saddle soon, and make her ready."
Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border.

"And like the mavis on the bush,
He gart the vallas ring." — Percy's Reliques.

Get, got, gotten, to attain, to procure, to come into possession of. — The past participle of this verb has lately become obsolete, except in the talk of the uneducated and in Scottish literature. It was common in the last century : —

"We knew we were gotten far enough out of their reach." — Defoe : Robinson Crusoe.

"Ken ye what Meg o' the mill has gotten ?
She 's gotten a lout wi' a lump o' siller,
And broken the heart of the barley miller."

Robert Burns.

There is also a marked tendency to the disuse of this inflection in the verb "to forget," and people too commonly say and write "I have 'forgot'" instead of "forgotten."

Glide, glode, glidden, to move away easily and smoothly. — The ancient preterite and past participle have become obsolete, and have been superseded by glided, much to the loss of versifiers in search of good rhymes : —

"His good stede he all bestrode,
And forth upon his way he glode." — Chaucer.

"He glode forth as an adder glode." — Idem.

"Through Guy's shield it glode." — Guy of Warwick.

The reason of the substitution of the regular for the irregular preterite may be found in the desire to prevent confusion with the regular preterite of the verb to glow.

Glint, glent, glinted, to shine, to flash, to appear suddenly. — In Sternberg's Northamptonshire Glossary the infinitive of this verb as used amongst the peasantry of that part of England is cited as gline. Glint would be the legitimate preterite if this were correct. In Scottish poetry glint is the infinitive, and glinted the preterite and past participle. In old English poetry glent is the preterite : —

"The sunbeams are glinting far over the sea."
Newcastle Garland.

"Cauld blew the bitter biting north
Upon thy early humble birth,
Yet cheerfully thou glinted forth
Amid the storm."
Burns : To a Mountain Daisy.

"There came a hand withouten rest
Out of the water,
And brandished it.
Anon as a gleam away it glent."
Morte d'Arthur.

Go, gaed, gone, to depart. — The ancient and legitimate preterite of this verb has been superseded by the preterite ("went") of the verb to "wend," to turn away. It maintains its ground, however, in Scotland and the northern English counties. Chaucer has "gadling" for a vagabond, a wanderer who goes much about; and the language still retains the word to "gad," to wander or stray about, making short visits : —

"I gaed a waef's gate yestreen." — Burns.

Gnaw, gnaw, gnawed, to bite at a hard substance. — The old preterite is lost, doubtless on account of its too great similarity in pronunciation to the more familiar word "knew" : —

"At last in twa the dowie ropes he gnaw." — Ross's Helenore.

"No sustenance got,
But only at the cauld hills berries gnaw." — Idem.

Greet, grat, grütten, to weep. — This verb, with all its declensions, has lost its place in English literature, though the word greet remains with a different meaning, "to salute." Like other strong Saxon words which modern English has unnecessarily discarded, it is retained in Scotland. It seems to have been lost even in Chaucer's time, who uses greet entirely in the modern sense of "to salute." Piers Ploughman has it in the sense of "to lament" or "weep":—

"And then 'gan Gloton to greet,
And greet dool to make."

"It's a sad time," says an old Scottish proverb, "when hens crow and bearded men greet." Another proverb says, "Better bairns should greet than bearded men."

"And sighed and grat, and grat and sighed again."

Ross's Helenore.

"Duncan sighed baith out and in,
Grat his een baith bleer't and blin'."

Burns: Duncan Gray.

"The Edinbro' wells are grutten dry."

Burns: Elegy on the Year 1788.

Grab, grub, grabbed, to dig up, to seize. — This verb, in all its inflections, has been wholly relegated to the speech of the vulgar, but, like many other vulgar words, has a highly respectable origin. Grab, in its first sense, means to dig a grave or hole; and grub means that which is dug up, such as roots for human subsistence, whence its modern and slang signification, "food."

Graith, graithed, to prepare, make ready. — A critic in the Literary Gazette of March 30, 1860, called a poet to account for using such an unpermissible word as grait, of which he declared his utter ignorance. He might, however, have found it in Chaucer, in Worcester's Dictionary, and in Robert Burns:—

"Her son Galathin
She graithed in attire fine."

Arthur and Merlin.

"Unto the Jewes such a hate had he,
That he bade graith his chair full hostile."

Chaucer: The Reeve's Tale.

"Go warn me Perthshire and Angus baith,
And graith my horse."

Song of the Outlaw Murray.

Hend, hent, to take, to hold, to seize, to apprehend:—

"Jog on, jog on, the footpath way,
And merrily hent the stile-a:
A merry heart goes all the day,
Your sad tires in a mile-a."

It is probable that in this well-known passage from the song of Autolycus in the Winter's Tale, the preterite hent is a misprint for the infinitive hend, though it must be admitted that Chaucer uses hent both in the present and the past tenses. This is a very unusual defect in an English verb of that early period.

"All be it that it was not our intente,
He should be sauf, but that we sholde him hent."

Chaucer: The Friar's Tale.

Shakespeare uses hent as a substantive, to signify a purpose, an intention to hold by, in Hamlet's exclamation, when he determines not to kill the king at his prayers:—

"No!
Up, sword! and know thou a more horrid hent!
When he is drunk, asleep, or in his rage."

Help, holp, holpen, to aid. — The preterite and past participle are fast becoming obsolete:—

"For thou hast holpen me now." — MS. Cantab: Halliwell.

"And blind men holpen." — Piers Ploughman.

"Building upon the foundation that went before us, and being holpen by their labors." — The Translators of the Bible to the Reader: temp. James I.

Hit, het, hitten, to strike, to touch violently with a blow. Both preterite and past participle are obsolete. Hitten survives in the colloquial language of the peasantry:—

"Your honor's hitten the nail upon the head." — Ross's Helenore.

The Americans, in default of the old preterite het occasionally say hot, — as, "he hot me a heavy blow; he hot out right and left."

Hold, held, holden, to have, grasp, or retain in possession. The past participle is obsolete but might be advantageously revived for the sake of the rhyme which it affords to "golden," "embolden," &c.

Keek, keeked, to peep, to look in slyly:—

"The robin came to the wren's nest,
And keeked in and keeked in."

Nursery Rhymes of England.

"This Nicholas sat even gape upright,
As he had keeked on the newe moon."

Chaucer: The Miller's Tale.

"Stars, diona keek in And see me wi' Mary." — Burns.

Kythe, kouth or couth, to show, appear, know, make known. — This word has become wholly obsolete in England, but survives in Scotland. The sole remnant of it in English is uncouth, originally meaning something unknown, unheard of, strange, and now meaning rough or ungainly. Milton has, —

"Bound on a voyage uncouth," meaning unknown. The Scotch have the word couthie, familiar, or well known.

"And to the people's eyes all and some
Was couth that a new markisess
He with him brought in such pompe and riches
That never was there seen with manne's eye."

Chaucer: The Clerk's Tale.

"Take you sport, and kythe you knights." — Sir Ferumbras.

"Kythe in your ain colours, that folk may ken you." — Allan Ramsay's Scottish Proverbs.

"Their fides blythe, they sweetly kythe." — Burns.

List or lest, lust, to please. — This word has gradually been dropping out of use, but having been preserved in the Bible, is still occasionally heard. The preterite is lost, though the word itself survives as a substantive, and as the infinitive of another verb, to lust, signifying to desire pleasure vehemently:—

"The wind bloweth where it listeth."

The colloquial expression "to list for a soldier" seems to come from this root, and means, to please to become, or voluntarily to become a soldier. Chaucer uses lust in the sense of joy:—

"Farewell, my life, my lust, and my gladness."

The Knight's Tale.

Ligge, ligged, to lie down. — This ancient word is still in common use in Cumberland and Northumberland, and also on the Border counties of Scotland:—

"So that the Holy Ghost
Gloweth but as a glade,
Till that lele love
Ligge on him." — Piers Ploughman.

"What hawkes sitten on the perche above!"

What houndes liggen on the floor adown!"

Chaucer: The Knight's Tale.

"I have ligged for a fortnight in London, weak almost to death, and neglected by every one." — G. P. B. James: Gowrie; or, The King's Plot.

Let, loot, letten, to let, to permit. — This verb has lost all its inflections in literary and colloquial English, but preserves them in the Scottish dialect:—

"But letten him lede forth whom hym liked."

"And aye she lost the tears down fa'
For Jock o' Hazeldean." — Sir Walter Scott.

"Ye've lost the ponie o'er the dyke." — Burns.

"But dool had not yet letten her feel her want."
Ross's Helenore.

Leap, lope, lopen, to leap. — At what time this verb followed the analogy of weep, creep, and sleep, and formed its preterite in leapt or lept, does not very clearly appear: —

"And they laughing lope to her." — Piers Ploughman.

"Have lopen the better." — Idem.

"Up he lope and the window broke,
And he had thirty foot to fall."
Percy's Reliques: The Murder of the King of Scots.

"Tom Rindle lope fra the chimley nook."
Waugh's Lancashire Songs.

Laugh, lough, leuch. — The ancient preterite and past participle of this verb have been superseded by the modern preterite in ed: —

Then lough there a lord,
And 'By this light' saide,
'I hold it right and reson.'" — Piers Ploughman.

"He cleped it Valerie and Theophrast,
And lough always full fast."
Chaucer: The Wife of Bath's Prologue.

"When she had read Wise William's letter,
She smiled and she leuch." — Motherwell's Collection.

"'I think not so,' she halfins said, and leuch."
Rose's Helenore.
"How graceless Ham leuch at his dad,
Which made Canaan a nigger."
Burns: The Ordination.

"An' lika ane leuch him to scorn."
Percy's Reliques: The Auld Guidman.

Lout, louted, to make an obeisance or a courtesy: —

"And then louted adown." — Piers Ploughman.

"'Sir,' quoth the dwarf, and louted low."
Percy's Reliques: Sir Cautline.

"They louted to that ladye."
Percy's Reliques: On Alliterative Metre.

"To which image both young and old Commanded he to lout."
Chaucer: The Monke's Tale.

"And I am louted by a traitor villain."
Shakespeare: Henry VI. Part I.

Melt, molt, molten, to liquefy by means of heat. — The preterite is lost, the past participle still preserved in poetry and the Bible.

Mint, minted, to essay, to try, to aim, to attempt, to prove the genuineness of metals before coinage: —

"Minting's not making" (attempting's not doing). — Allan Ramsay's Scottish Proverbs.

"A minted [attempted] excuse."
The Two Lancashire Lovers: 1660.

The word remains in Mint, — the Assay Office.

Nake, naked, to denude of covering. — The preterite survives as an adjective; the infinitive is lost: —

"Come, be ready! nake your swords.
Think of your wrongs!"
Nares: Revenge's Tragedy.

Pight, a word that occurs in Chaucer, is defined by Tyrwhitt as meaning "pitched," rather than the preterite of "put": —

"He pight him on the pomel of his head,
That in the place he lay as he were dead."
Chaucer: The Knight's Tale.

Stowe, however, at a later period, uses pight for "did put": —

"He was brought to the Standard in Cheape, where they strake off his head and pight it on a pole, and bare it before them." — Stowe's Annals: Henry VI.

Put, pat or pight, pitten or pitten, to place. — The modern verb has lost the preterite and past participle: —

"I there wi' something did forgether,
That pat me in an eerie swither."
Burns: Death and Doctor Hornbook.

"Ye see how Rob and Jenny's gone sin' they Ha'e pitten o'er their heads the merry day."
Ross's Helenore.

"He's pitten it to a good purpose, has Brighthouse." — The Master of Marston: London, 1864.

Prank, pranked or pranked, to adorn, to embellish, to dress fashionably: —

"Some prank their ruffs, and others trimly dight Their gay attire." — Spenser: The Faerie Queene.

"False tales pranked in reason's garb." — Milton: Comus.

"Most goddess-like pranked up."
Shakespeare: Winter's Tale.

Quethe or queath, quoth, to say. — The infinitive of this verb is lost, but the preterite quoth remains in colloquial use, and in writings that do not aspire to eloquence or dignity, as, "quoth he," "quoth I." Bequeath, to say in your will what part of your property your heirs or legatees shall possess, is a remnant of this ancient verb.

Quake, quoke, to tremble with fear: —

"An ugly pit, as deep as any hell,
That to behold therein I quoke for fear."
The King's Quair.

"The whole land of Italy trembled and quoke."
Douglas: Translation of the Æneid.

Raz, raught, to reach, to stretch: —

"He raught to the steere" (he reached to the helm).
Piers Ploughman.

"He start up and would have him raught."
Merlin: Early English Metrical Romances.

"The villain is o'er-raught of all my money."
Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors.

"Their three-mile prayers and half-mile graces, Their razing conscience." — Burns: Epistle to M'Math.

"Is this a time to talk o' wark,
When Colin's at the door?
Raz down my cloak, I'll to the quay,
And see him come ashore."
Mickle: There's nae Luck about the House.

Reave, reft, take off, take away, whence the old English and Scottish word reaver or reiver, a thief. — This word survives in bereave and bereft, but is fast becoming obsolete: —

"If he reaveth me by might,
He robbeth me by malistrie."
Piers Ploughman.

"Therefore, though no part of his work to reave him,
We now for matters more allied must leave him."
Heywood's Troia Britannia: 1609.

"To go robbe that ragman,
And reave the fruit from him."
Piers Ploughman.

"Means to live by reaf of other men's goods." — Hollinshed's Chronicles.

Reap, rept, rope, ropen, to cut or help to cut the harvest: —

"Ropen and laide away the corne."
Chaucer: Legende of Good Women.

"After the oorn is rept." — Nares.

Reek, roke, to emit smoke or vapor. — The present tense of this verb survives in solemn and poetical composition in England, but both the present and preterite are in common and colloquial use in Scotland. "Auld Reekie" is a popular name for Edinburgh. From the preterite roke or roak comes the adjective roaky, which, by a misprint in Macbeth, Act III. Scene ii., appears as rooky, and has led all commentators astray as to the true meaning of the passage: —

"Light thickens, and the crow Makes wing to the rooky wood."

Rooky or rooky, in Jameson's Scottish Dictionary, is defined as "dark" or "misty," as in the passage from Hamilton's Wallace :—

"A rooky mist fell down at break of day."

Here it is evident that the word is not derived from either "rook" or "crow," and that the true meaning of the passage is to be found in Jameson's definition of a Scottish word that was English in the time of Shakespeare.

Roun, rouned, to whisper, to talk privately, to whisper in the ear. — This word is wholly lost, but might have been preserved, if Shakespeare, like modern authors, had been in the habit of correcting his proof-sheets. The word, misprinted round, occurs several times in Shakespeare, and has puzzled all the commentators. Mr. Stanton, in a note on the passage where Polonius says to the king in Hamlet,—

"Let his queen-mother all alone entreat him To show his grief—let her be round with him," says, "Let her be blunt and plain-spoken with him." In another note to the word in King John, Act II. Scene ii. —

"Whom seal and charity brought to the field
As God's own soldier, rouned in the ear
With that same purpose—charge"—

he explains the true meaning of rouned (which should be rouned, just as vulgar people sometimes say "drowned" for drowned) as "insinuated," "whispered in the ear." He quotes from the Spanish tragedy the line where the same orthographical error occurs,—

"Forthwith, revenge, she rouned them in the ear."

The word appears correctly in all authors previous to Shakespeare :—

"They rose up in rape,
And rouned together." — Piers Ploughman.

"The steward on his knees sat down
With the emperor for to roun," Romance of Cœur de Lion.

"But if it like you that I might roune in your ear," Skelton.

Sag, sog, to bend or give way under pressure, to fail :—

"The mind I sway by, and the heart, I fear, Shall never sag with doubt or shake with fear."
Shakespeare: Macbeth.

"That it may not sag from the intention of the founders." — Fuller's Worthies.

From the lost preterite sog comes the adjective soggy, often used by the Americans to signify wet boggy soil that yields to the foot.

Scathe or skaith, to do an injury or damage. — Shakespeare and Milton use the verb :—

"This trick may chance to scathe you." — Romeo and Juliet.

"Scathed the forest oaks." — Milton.

The substantive scathe or skaith, signifying hurt, damage, and injury, survives in Scottish speech and literature, and is not wholly obsolete in English poetry, though rarely used by modern writers :—

"Oh! if on my bosom lying,
I could work him deadly scathe,
In one burst of burning passion,
I would kiss him into death!"
Mackay: Love in Hate.

Seethe, sod, sodden, to boil. — The translators of the Bible have preserved this old English word, which was in common use before its modern synonyme was borrowed with other culinary phrases from the Norman French :—

"And he said unto his servant, Set on the great pot, and seethe the pottage for the sons of the prophet." — 2 Kings iv. 38.

"Go suck the subtle blood o' th' grape Till the high fever seeths your blood to froth."
Shakespeare: Timon of Athens.

"Seethe stanes in butter, the brew will be good." — Allan Ramsay's Scottish Proverbs.

"It is unsavory
Y-sodden or y-baken." — Piers Ploughman.

Shape, shope, shopen, to make, to create, to put into form. — This verb has wholly lost its original meaning in the infinitive and present, in which form it subsists as a regular verb, with its preterite in d. Its preterite and past participle have long been obsolete, and do not seem to have been used in English literature after the time of Chaucer :—

"God shope the world." — Wickliffe's Bible.

"The king and the commune Shopen laws." — Piers Ploughman.

"To which this sempnour shope him for to wende."
Chaucer: The Frere's Tale.

Shend, shent, shent, to rebuke, to blame, to shame, or bring to shame :—

"What say you, sir?
I am shent for speaking to you."
Shakespeare: Twelfth Night.

"He that shames let him be shent." — Allan Ramsay.

"All woe-begone was John o' the Scales, Sce shent he could say never a word."
Percy's Reliques: The Heir of Lynne.

Spenser in the Faerie Queene, and Thomson in the Castle of Indolence, use this word. According to Dr. Johnson, the last author of note who employed it was Dryden. It survives in Scotland.

Shear, sheer, shore or shure, shorn, to cut closely off. — The ancient preterite is obsolete, and has been superseded by the regular form in ed. The sea-shore — i. e. the strip of land sheared, shore, or shorn by the action of the waves — is the sole relic of this word in modern parlance.

"Robin shure in hairst [harvest],
I shure wi' him." — Burns.

"Boston was the Delilah that allured him [Daniel Webster]. Off he broke the withes of gold, till at last she shore off his locks, and his strength went from him." — Theodore Parker: Discourse on the Death of Daniel Webster.

Shread, shred, to cut off the ends, to lop. — The old preterite has long been obsolete, but survives as a noun, shred, a thing lopped off or cut off, a remnant :—

"The superfluous and waste sprigs of vines being shreaded off."
— Withall's Dictionary: 1608.

"A shredder of trees." — Narce.

Shrew, shrow, shrown. — This obsolete word, of which the only current representative is shrewd, a perversion of the original meaning, signifies "to curse," and finds a singular synonyme in America. In England a scolding wife is a shrew; in America the same disagreeable person is a "cuss." Shakespeare applies the word shrew to both sexes, just as the Americans do the word cuss. "Beshrew me!" the old ejaculation, meant "curse me!" At the present day inferior writers and careless speakers will say, "I have a shread suspicion," meaning "a sharp, cunning suspicion." The time at which the word assumed this new meaning in speech or literature is uncertain.

Shrive, shrove, shriven, to confess to the priest. — This verb, in all its inflections, went out when the Reformation came in, and only survives in poetry and romance, and in the word "Shrove-Tuesday."

Slake, slake, slaken, to assuage thirst, to quench a fire. — The preterite and past participle are obsolete.

Sneap, sneb, snub, to check, chide, rebuke angrily, to be sharp to a person, like a cutting wind: —

"An envious sneaping frost
That bites the first-born infants of the spring."
Shakespeare: Love's Labor Lost.

"Do you sneap me too, my lord!" — Browne's Antipodes.

This word only survives in its past participle snub, which has become the infinitive of a verb with the original meaning.

Snow, snaw, snown, to drop partially congealed rain. — The preterite and past participle survive in America, but are considered vulgarisms: —

"Withouten bake meat never was his house,
Of fish and flesh, and that so plenteous,
It snawe in his house of meat and drink."
Chaucer: Prologue to the Canterbury Tales.

"First it blew, and then it snaw, and then it fris horrid." — Major Downing's Letters.

Ben Jonson, in his English Grammar, cites the following verbs that make their preterite in ew, — viz., blow, grow, throw, crow, know, draw, slay, and snow. The last is the only one of the number that now forms its preterite in ed, though uneducated people both in Great Britain and America sometimes form the preterites of grow, blow, and know in ed, — as when Topsy, in Uncle Tom's Cabin, says "she growed." "I knowed it," instead of "I knew it," is also a common vulgarity.

Stent, stint, stunt, to desist, to cease, to limit, to confine within a certain bound. — This verb is a curious instance of the liberties which Time takes with the old words of a language. The three inflections have each been made to do duty for an infinitive, so that one verb has been virtually converted into three. Chaucer has stent, the correct and original form: —

"And of this cry we would they never stent."
The Knight's Tale.

The noun stent, an allotted portion of work, though obsolete in England, is common in America: —

"Little boys in the country, working against time, with stents to do." — Theodore Parker: Discourse on the Death of Daniel Webster.

Stint, the ancient preterite, is the modern infinitive, and forms its preterite and past participle regularly in ed. Stunt, to stint, or stop, or cease in growth, goes through the same inflections. The late Daniel O'Connell called the Duke of Wellington a stunted corporal.

Swell, swale, or swell, swollen. — The preterite in swale is almost obsolete; that in swoll has been newly revived, but scarcely holds its own against swelled: —

"An' thought it swale so sore about his harte."
Chaucer: The Wife of Bath's Tale.

Sweat, swat, to perspire. — This ancient word survives in colloquial, but has been of late years banished from literary, English. The curse pronounced upon Adam, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat [or earn] thy bread," would have lost much of its energy in English ears, if the ancient translators had been as mealy-mouthed as the men of the present day, and rendered "sweat" by perspiration.

"His fair steed
So swat that men might him ring."
Chaucer: The Rhyme of Sir Topaz.

"His hackney which that was al pomelee gris,
So swatte that it wonder was to see."
The Chanones Yemanne's Tale.

"Some, lucky, find a flowery spot,
For which they never toiled nor sweat."
Burns: Epistle to James Smith.

An anecdote is related by Dean Ramsay, in his interesting book of Scottish wit and humor, of a sturdy old lady who loved hearty vehemence in preaching, that she delighted in one particular minister, because when he preached he was in such grim earnest with his discourse that "he grat and spat and swat" over it.

Swink, swank, swonken, to labor over-hard. — This word appears to have been almost obsolete in Shakespeare's time. Some of his contemporaries use it, and Milton tried to revive it: —

"In setting and sowing Swinken full hard." — Piers Ploughman.

"Great boobies and long
That loth were to swink." — Piers Ploughman.

"For which men swink and sweat incessantly."
Spenser: Faerie Queene.

"We'll labor and swinke, We'll kiss and we'll drinke."
Beaumont and Fletcher: The Spanish Curio.

"For he had swonken all the night long."
Chaucer: The Reeve's Tale.

Thole, tholed, to suffer, to endure. — This word is in common use throughout Scotland and on the English border, but has long been lost to English literature: —

"Which died and death tholed
About mid-day." — Piers Ploughman.

"What mischief and malease Christ for man tholed."
Chaucer: Visions.

"What mickle woe as I with you have tholed." — Chaucer.

"She shall the death thole." — Gower: Confessio Amantis.

"He who tholes conquers." — Allan Ramsay's Scottish Proverbs.

"Tenant bodies, scant o' cash,
How they maun thole the factors smash!" — Burns.

Threap, to argue, to complain, to lament: —

"'Tis not for a man with a woman to threap."
Percy's Reliques: Tak' thy auld cloak about thee.

"Some cry upon God, others threap that He hath forgotten them." — Bishop Fisher.

"Some heads well learned upon the book,
Would threap auld folks the thing mistook." — Burns.

In Grose's Provincial Glossary a shopkeeper's phrase is quoted, "This is not threaping ware," — i. e. these goods are so superior that they are not to be argued about or cheapened.

Thring, throng, thrung, to press, to jostle, to crowd, whence the modern word to "throng": —

"A thousand of men,
Thrunge together,
Cried upwards to Christ." — Piers Ploughman.

The Scottish word thrang — i. e. busy with a crowd of customers — is a remnant of this word, in which, as in many others that we have noticed, the original preterite has been made to do duty for the infinitive and the present tense.

Wax, wox, waxed, woxen, wozed, to grow, to increase. — This word, chiefly preserved in the English language by its frequent use in the Old and New Testaments, lost its original preterite and past participle, wox and wozen, before the translation of the Bible in the reign of James I., at which time the word wax, with the regular inflections, was in common use: —

"And when he woren was more
In his mother's absence." — Piers Ploughman.

"This man wor wellnigh wood [mad] for ire."
Chaucer: The Spurnoure's Tale.

"Before my breath, like blazing flax,
Man and his marvels pass away;
And changing empires wane and woar,
Are founded, flourish, and decay." — Walter Scott.

Wreak, wreaked or wroke, wroken, to avenge. —
This word is still current in connection with the nouns wrath, vengeance, displeasure, spite, and others: —

"So wreake us, God, of all our foes." — Sir Bevis of Hampton.

"T is not my fault, the boar provoked my tongue.
Be wreaked on him." — Shakespeare: Venus and Adonis.

"And soon in the Gordon's foul heart's blood He's wroken his faire ladye."
Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border.

"To have wroken himself of such wrongs as were due him by the French king." — Holinshed's Chronicles.

The verbs which we have quoted (and we might have very greatly extended the list, if a volume instead of a mere chapter had been at our command) are merely samples of the literary treasures that lie concealed in the speech of the common people of the northern counties, in the old English authors anterior to Shakespeare, and in the Scottish literature of the present day. What should we say if an English nobleman of ancient and illustrious lineage and great wealth had in the cellars and vaults of his castle hundreds of coffers and oaken chests filled to the lid with coins of the purest gold stamped with the image and superscription of bygone kings, if he would never use nor look at any portion of his wealth? What, also, should we say of him if, in want of gold for his daily needs, he persisted in borrowing it from strangers at usurious interest, rather than touch his antique treasures? We should say he was unwise, or at the least eccentric, and that it was questionable whether he deserved to possess the great wealth which he had inherited. Every master of the English tongue, whether he be poet, orator, or great prose writer, is in the position of this supposed nobleman if he will not study the ancient words of the language, and revive to the extent of his ability such among them as he finds to be better adapted to express strong as well as delicate shades of meaning, than the modern words which have usurped their places. To the poets more especially, and, if there be none such left in our day (which we should be very sorry to assert, when certain great names flash upon our memory), to the versifiers, who are not likely ever to fail us as long as there are hopes and fancies in the hearts of young men and women, this is a matter of especial concern. The permissible rhymes of the modern English tongue are not copious in number; and such as exist, if not as well worn as love and dove, breeze and trees, heart and dart, are far too familiar to come upon the ear with any great charm of novelty. The dactylic rhymes are still fewer, as every one who has tried his hand at versification is painfully aware. It is the poet, more than the prose writer, who strengthens as well as beautifies the language which he employs. It is true that language first makes literature; but literature, when once established among a people, reacts upon language and fixes its form, decides what words shall and what words shall not be used in the higher forms of prose and poetical composition. Old English — such as it is found in Piers Ploughman, Chaucer, Spenser, and the poets and dramatists of the Elizabethan era, and as late as Milton and Dryden — is a passionate rather than an argumentative language; and poets, who ought to be passionate above all else, otherwise they are but mere versifiers, should go back to those ancient sources, if they would be strong without ceasing to be correct and elegant. The words that were good enough for Shakespeare and his contemporaries ought to be good enough for the greatest writers of our day. But Shakespeare himself is becoming obsolete, and needs the aid of a glossary to explain to educated people many excellent words that are quite intelligible to an uneducated ploughman. Is it the fault of Shakespeare or of modern writers that this should be the case? We think the fault is not in Shakespeare, but in ourselves.

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF JOHN ACKLAND.

A TRUE STORY.

IN THIRTEEN CHAPTERS. CHAPTER II.

AMONG Mr. Cartwright's guests was a young lady who had, or was supposed to have, an extraordinary faculty for describing people's characters or sensations, — not by looking at their handwriting, but by holding it in her hand, and thus placing herself (it was averred) in magnetic rapport with the writers. She was a merry, good-natured girl, who did her spiriting gently, without professing much belief in it herself, and always ready to laugh heartily with others at the result whenever (as sometimes happened) it was an unmitigated failure. This evening the experiment had been tried several times with more than usual success; and sundry hypercritical spectators averred that Miss Simpson had made a great many lucky guesses.

"Well, now," said Cartwright, "that is not fair on Miss Simpson. Here is the writing of a person whom nobody present — not even myself — has ever seen. Miss Simpson shall try again with it, and I will bet you all that she guesses right."

He drew a letter from his pocket, and the young lady, after crumpling it for a moment in her hand, said, hesitatingly, — "This is a woman's writing."

"Right!" said Cartwright.

"A married woman," said Miss Simpson, more boldly.

"Right again. Any children?"

"No."

"Quite right. Married long, eh?"

"About three months, I think."

"Wonderful!" exclaimed Cartwright. "It is just three months and nine days."

Mr. Ackland looked up, and looked red, and fidgeted in his chair.

"O Cartwright," cried Judge Griffin, "that won't do. You put her leading questions."

"Well, let her go on by herself," said Cartwright.

He had noticed John Ackland's movements, and was looking hard at his New England guest. Mr. Ackland blushed again, and turned away his face.

"But she is not happy, — no, not at all happy," said Miss Simpson, musingly.

"The devil she's not!" cried Cartwright; "but 't was a love match, was n't it?"

"I think so," replied Miss Simpson, after a pause, and doubtfully.

"My withers are unwrung," said Cartwright, looking round. "I swear I never saw the lady in my life."

"Does she care more for somebody else already, ma'am, than for her husband?" asked the Judge.

"More, yes," replied Miss Simpson, "much, no. She must be a strange character. Not much feeling for any one, I should say, except for herself. She jilted him."

"Whom?" demanded all the listeners together.

"I don't know. But now I fancy she half regrets him. There is a strange feeling about this letter."

"Pleasant for poor Mordent!" muttered Cartwright.

John Ackland sprang to his feet. He was not red this time, but frightfully pale, and trembling violently.

"The letter! the letter!" he cried, and seized the hand of Miss Simpson. The young lady started at his touch.

"O Mr. Ackland!" she cried, "why did nobody stop me? I never dreamed that it was you." But already John Ackland had left the room.

The next day Cartwright sought out his guest (Mr. Ackland had not reappeared in the drawing-room during the rest of that evening), and expressed his regret for the painful incident of the preceding night.

"I had no idea you were even acquainted with Mrs. Mordent," he said.

"But how do you happen to be acquainted with her?" asked John Ackland.

"Strictly speaking," he said, "I am not acquainted with her. Mordent and I were schoolfellows at West Point. He wrote to me some time ago informing me of his engagement to Miss Stevens; and, as I anticipated being absent from Virginia about that time, I wanted him and his bride to pass their honeymoon at Glenoak. I also asked him to send me a portrait of the future Mrs. M. I have portraits of all my friends' wives. A fancy of mine. He declined the invitation, but sent me the portrait, accompanied by a pretty little line from the lady herself. That is what I placed in Miss Simpson's hands last night; and I assure you that is all I know of Mrs. Mordent."

John Ackland's impatience to leave Glenoak was now, however, excessive. "Every time," he said to himself, "that I must face again the people in this house is intolerable pain to me."

Cartwright suggested to him that if resolved on so hasty a departure, he need not return to Richmond. "By going across country," he said, "you will save a long day's journey, and catch the Charleston coach at —, which is nearer here than Richmond. I can send your luggage on by the cart this morning, and lend you a horse to ride there this afternoon. We will dine early, and if you start from here on horseback at four o'clock, you will be at — before nightfall, and a good hour before the coach is due there. I will be your guide across the plantation, and put you on your road to —, which you cannot possibly miss. I would gladly accompany you the whole way thither, if I had not some business with my overseer which must be settled to-night. You can leave the horse at —, with the ostler there. I know him, and can trust him to bring it back safely to Glenoak. What say you?"

"That would certainly be my best and pleasantest plan," said Mr. Ackland, "and really I am much obliged to you for proposing it. But I suppose I ought to go to Richmond about those notes."

"No necessity for that, I think," answered Cartwright. "At least if you are in a hurry. At the next stage after — you will be obliged to stop the greater part of the morning. I know a very respectable banker whose office is close to the hotel where you change horses and dine, — will give you a line to him if you like, and you can change the notes there."

"You are most kind, my dear friend, and I cannot sufficiently thank you. But do you think it would be safe to carry such a large sum in notes so far as —?"

"If you carry them about your person, yes. Luggage sometimes gets mislaid; but you need not be afraid of robbers between here and —. Our roads are not so unsafe as all that, Mr. Ackland, sir. I have travelled all across this country, sir, on horseback, without ever having any misadventure, and once you are out of the plantation you have only a few miles between you and —. By the way, let me lend you my travelling belt."

"Then, indeed," said John Ackland, "if it does not seriously inconvenience you, I shall gladly accept your kind offer. For I confess that even your hospitality —"

"Yes, yes!" said Cartwright, "I understand. And greatly as I regret this departure, I cannot press you to stay. There will be no inconvenience at all, and I will at once give orders about your luggage."

After dinner, when John Ackland and his host were mounting their horses, "We shall have a cool ride, I think," said Cartwright, "and there's plenty of time, so that we can take it easy. I should n't wonder if we put up some game as we go along. We had better take our guns with us."

"I'm not much of a sportsman, I'm afraid," said John Ackland, with his customary blush.

"O," laughed the other, "I dare say you are a better shot than I. You Northerners are such modest gentlemen. Anyhow, there's no harm in having out the guns. You see they are in nobody's way. That's how we sling 'em in our country, rough but handy. Now then."

"Good-by to Glenoak," said John Ackland, rather sadly, looking up at the house and waving his hand. His melancholy had been excessive during the whole day.

"Not good by altogether, I hope," said Cartwright.

And off they started. The result of that ride must be related in another chapter.

CHAPTER III.

It was not yet dark when Cartwright returned alone to Glenoak. He found Judge Griffin, assisted by the betting young gentleman, working his way through a bottle of brandy and a box of cigars in the arbor.

"Well, Cartwright," said the Judge, "I suppose your friend's off, eh?"

"Yes. Poor old Ackland! Good fellow as ever lived. I shall quite miss him."

"Very amiable man," said the Judge.

"Bet you a pony, Cartwright," said the betting young gentleman.

"What on? Here, you black blockhead, bring another bottle of brandy, ice, and soda-water. And look alive, do you hear? 'Gad, sir, I've swallowed a bushel of dust, and am as dry as mud in a brick-kiln."

"Bet you," resumed the betting young gentleman, "that the Yankee don't reach — to-night. Bet you, anyhow, he'll come to grief."

"What do you mean?" said Cartwright, sharply.

"Well, sir," responded that promising youth, "I reckon you should never have set him on that black mare of yours."

"Pooh," said Cartwright, "the mare's as quiet as a mouse."

"If you know how to ride her; but he don't. Very queer seat, that Yankee. Now she has him to herself, if she puts her head down he'll have no more chance with her, I reckon, than a cat in hell without claws," said the betting young gentleman, apparently much pleased with the originality and elegance of that striking figure of speech.

"I tell you the mare's as quiet as a mouse," growled Cartwright. "Pray do you suppose, my young friend, that your remarkable facility for falling head-foremost off the back of any four-legged animal can be acquired without very pe-cu-liar practice? You've been practising it yourself a good long time, you know."

The betting young gentleman, not finding any sufficiently expressive retort in the ready-made idiom of his native tongue, was carefully preparing one, when the Judge interposed with, —

"Find any game, Cartwright?"

"No," said Cartwright, "not to speak of. I had only one shot, and Ackland none."

"Guessed I heard a gun about an hour ago," said the betting young gentleman.

"Lord bless you and me, Judge," said Cartwright, "if this child here ain't going to die, I do believe, of a determination of intelligence to the brain. The peculiar acuteness of his youthful faculties is something quite astonishing."

"Well, I guess I was n't born yesterday," responded the disconcerted subject of this sarcastic compliment, "and when you were as young as I am —"

"I never was as young as you are, sir," said Cartwright.

"Well, never mind that. What did you bag, old boy?"

"Nothing, young reverend."

"Never knew you miss before, Cartwright."

"Well, I don't often miss, when the game is as easy — as easy as I mostly find it whenever I have the pleasure of a crack with you, my young friend."

In this sprightly conversation Mr. Philip Cartwright was still exercising his wit and humor, when that "black blockhead," as his master called him, entered the arbor, looking as white as a black man can look, and whispered something to him.

"Returned? Impossible!" cried Cartwright, springing up.

"What's the matter?" cried the two other gentlemen, "Ackland back again?"

"No, but the mare's back again, riderless, covered with foam, and the saddle turned, — the mare I lent him."

"Told you he'd come to grief with her. Should n't wonder if she's broke his neck," exclaimed the betting young gentleman, with joyful exultation.

"Tell Sam to saddle my horse instantly," cried Cartwright. "Not the one I had out to-day, a fresh one."

"Why, where are you going, Cartwright?" asked the Judge, not very well pleased at the prospect of interrupted potations and a dull evening.

"To —, to look for poor Ackland, and at once."

"But it's a good twelve miles' ride."

"Can't help that, Judge. If anything has happened to my poor friend, if the mare has thrown him, he may be in want of assistance. I saw him safe through the plantation. If anything has happened to him, it cannot have been long after I left him, or the mare would hardly have got home by now, even at a gallop.¹ Stay, I'd better take the wagon, I think. If he's hurt, we shall want it. Who will come with me?"

"Not I," said the Judge. "I'm too old. But I tell you what, Cartwright, if you'll order another bottle I'll sit up for you."

"I'll come," said the betting young gentleman.

"Pooh!" cried Cartwright, with ineffable contempt. "You're no use. I must be off." And off he went.

When he returned to Glenoak about three o'clock in the morning, the Judge had kept his word, and was sitting up for him, having nearly finished his second bottle. Cartwright dropped into a chair haggard and exhausted. He had been to — and back, but had discovered nothing, except, indeed, that neither horse nor rider had arrived that evening from Glenoak at the inn at that town, and that the Charleston coach had taken in no passengers at —.

"The whole thing is a mystery," he said. "It fairly beats me."

"And beat you look," said the Judge; "you'd best take a cocktail and go to bed. Found no trace of him on the road?"

"Nothing."

"Nor heard anything of him?"

"Nothing, absolutely nothing."

The next morning all the slaves on Mr. Cartwright's estate were assembled and interrogated about the missing gentleman. Judge Griffin himself conducted the inquiry, and very severely he did it. Of course, they all contradicted each other and themselves and floundered about in a fathomless slough of unintelligibility, for, whatever natural intelligence they possessed was extinguished by the terror of the great Judge, or lost in the labyrinths of cross-examination. One old negro in particular, "whose name was Uncle Ned," revealed such a profundity of stupidity, that the Judge said, "Cartwright, that nigger of yours is the stupidest nigger in all niggerdom."

"He is," said Cartwright, "and if the black beast don't mind what he's about, I'll sell him, — whip him first, and sell him afterwards."

"He won't fetch much, I reckon," said the Judge.

"I'll skin him alive and make squash pie of him, and eat him with pepper, and salt, and vinegar," said Cartwright, showing all the teeth in his handsome mouth, and looking very much like a hungry ogre. "I have my eye on him," he added, "and he knows it."

Poor Uncle Ned did indeed appear to have a very lively sense of the uncomfortable honor of having Mr. Cartwright's eye on him. For he trembled violently, and looked like an old black umbrella with all its whalebones working in a high wind.

One thing, however, resulted from this investigation. None of Mr. Cartwright's negroes had seen anything, none of them had heard anything, none of them knew anything, that could shed the smallest light on the fate of John Ackland.

All Mr. Cartwright's guests were greatly excited about the events of the previous evening, especially the ladies.

"We have done all that can be done for the present, my dear ladies," said Judge Griffin, "but I regret to say that as yet we have no clew to this mystery. By the way, Cartwright, suppose we try Miss Simpson?"

"O, pray, no!" said that young lady; "you know, I have already been so very unlucky about poor Mr. Ackland."

"But you can't hurt his feelings now, my dear, as, unfortunately, he is not here; and really it is just possible that you may be able to suggest something."

"Psha!" cried Cartwright, impatiently; "you don't mean to say you seriously believe in that nonsense, Judge?"

"Nonsense or not, there is no harm in trying," said the Judge, "and you have, doubtless, some letter of Ackland's that will do."

"But," said Miss Simpson, "it ought to be, please, something written very recently, if possible."

"Stay!" exclaimed Cartwright, "I have the very thing. I believe it was the last thing John Ackland wrote in this house. Anyhow, the writing is not a week old."

"What is it?" said the Judge.

"Why, his receipt, to be sure, for the money I paid him the other day."

Mr. Cartwright appeared to regard this document as one of peculiar interest. He insisted on handing it round, and showing it to every one: remarking at the same time that "Ackland wrote a bolder hand than any one could have supposed from the look of the man." The only person to whose hands he did not seem particularly willing to intrust it, was Miss Simpson. All the party, however, were eager for the experiment to begin, and that young lady was much urged to try her magnetic powers on the document.

"Don't crumple it!" cried Cartwright, nervously, as she took up the paper somewhat reluctantly.

Hardly had she touched it, however, before Miss Simpson's whole frame seemed to be convulsed by a sharp spasm.

"Take it away!" she cried, — "take it away! You have put me in rapport with a —"

The rest of this exclamation was inaudible? But Miss Simpson had fainted. It was a long time before she was restored to consciousness; and then she declared that she had no recollection of anything which had passed.

"I tell you what it is," said Philip Cartwright to Judge Griffin that evening, "this is a very serious business; and we ought not to be losing time about it. You must come with me, Judge, to Richmond to-morrow."

"Do you suspect violence or foul play?" said the Judge.

"I don't know," answered Cartwright, "I don't like the look of it. I believe that John Ackland when he left Glenoak had a large sum of money with him. For I had some talk with him about the possibility of changing it at the first stage to Charleston. We ought to lose no time, I think, in setting the police to work."

Cartwright, accompanied by Judge Griffin, went to Richmond the next day. And they did set the police to work. And the police worked hard for a fortnight, and made a great many inquiries, and suggested a great many ingenious hypotheses, but discovered absolutely nothing.

"All we can do now," said the Judge, "is to send or write to Charleston. But, meanwhile, don't you think we ought to communicate with Mr. Ackland's friends in the North, or relatives, if he has any? Do you know any of them?"

"Yes," said Cartwright, "I had thought of that before. But the painful excitement of our inquiries here during the last few days had put it out of my mind. I am not personally acquainted with any relations of poor Ackland. But I believe he has a cousin at Boston — a Mr. Tom Ackland, a lawyer, I think — and I'll write to him at once. I don't think I can do any more good here, Judge."

"Certainly not," said the Judge; "you've done all that man can do, and more than any man could have done without the wits and energy of Philip Cartwright."

"But I'm quite knocked up," said Cartwright, "and I shall return to Glenoak to-morrow."

Mr. Philip Cartwright, however, did not return to Glenoak quite so soon as he said. For on the evening of that morrow he was still at Richmond, and engaged in the transaction of a very important little piece of business.

CHAPTER IV.

In the City of Richmond, Virginia, United States, and in a back street of a certain quarter of that town which was not very well reputed, there existed a certain gambling-house which was very ill-reputed. As it is fortunately possible for the reader of this veracious history to enter that house without losing either his character or his purse, he is hereby invited to do so, and to grope his way, as best he can, up a dark and greasy staircase till he reaches the third landing, where, in a small room, to which "strangers are not admitted," he will find Mr. Philip S. Cartwright in close conversation with a Mexican gentleman lately arrived in Richmond. This Mexican gentleman is of such modest and retiring habits, that, although he has been resident about three weeks in the capital of Virginia, and is a gentleman of striking appearance and varied accomplishments, he is as yet unknown to any of the inhabitants of that city, with the exception of two or three enterprising spirits who are interested in the fortunes of the establishment which he has honored by selecting as his temporary place of abode. Perhaps, also, the name of this interesting foreigner (which figures on his visiting-cards as Don Ramon Cabrera y Castro) may be not altogether unknown to some professional students of character whose researches are recorded in the secret archives of the Richmond Police. But, if this be so, neither he nor they have as yet taken any steps towards increasing their acquaintance with each other. To the select few who have been privileged to hold unrestricted personal intercourse with Don Ramon during his short residence at Richmond, he is familiarly known as the Don. He is a gentleman of polished manners and polished nails; an epicurean philosopher, who takes the evil with the good of life cheerfully and calmly. By the side of the Don, even the descendant of the Cavaliers looks coarse and underbred.

"I tell you," said Cartwright, "it was all no use. You must get up early if you want to catch a Yankee napping. He would have nothing to do with it. Said it was n't in his line of business. Bref, that cock would n't fight, sir."

"Just so," said the Don, without looking up from the occupation in which he was then absorbed, for he was paring his nails. They were very polished, very pink, and very spiky nails. "You failed, in short, my dear friend."

"Not my fault," replied Cartwright; "I did what I could."

"Of course," said the Don; "and Don Filippo can't do more than a man can do. You did what you could, but you could n't dispose of the notes. Just so. Where are they?"

"Here," said Cartwright, "and you'll find them all right." He pushed a little black box across the table, which seemed to be common property of the two gentlemen, for the Don took a small key from his own pocket, opened the box, and taking from it a bundle of bank-notes, held up one of them against the candle (making a transparency of it), and contemplated it with a tender, musing, and melancholy eye.

"They are beautifully made," he murmured, softly; "just look at the watermark, mi querido Don Filippo. A masterpiece of art!"

"Yes," said Cartwright; "they could n't beat that in New York."

"Not in all the world, — not in heaven itself!" sighed the Don, with that subdued voice expressive of sensuous oppression which is inspired by the contemplation of any perfectly beautiful object.

"But I reckon you'd better not drop 'em about Richmond," said Cartwright.

"You think so?" responded the Don, musingly; "you really think so?"

"Our people are too sharp now. They were caught once, but I take it they won't be caught twice."

"Caught once?"

"Out and out. Two years ago. By a Quaker chap travelling down South for the propagation of Christian knowledge, and various little manufactured articles of your sort."

"Then it's no use my staying here?" said the Don.

"Don't think it is," said Cartwright.

"And I think you'd better pay my bill before I leave, my dear friend."

"I'll do what I promised," said Cartwright.

"You really think, then," said the Don, "that there is no opening for investment at Richmond?"

"That's a fact," said Cartwright.

"But you forget," resumed his companion, "that if I did invest any portion of this little capital for the benefit of your city, sir, and if that benevolent speculation unhappily failed, I at least should be spared the pain of contemplating the failure, since I should no longer be in the States."

"It would fail," said Cartwright, "before you could get clear of the States, and the Union has extradition treaties."

"Not with all the world," replied the Don; "not with all America even. Not with Texas, for instance."

"Well, why not try Texas at once? Capital place. Just over the frontier, and just beyond the law."

"I am thinking of it," said the Don. "But there are drawbacks. Judge Lynch, for instance, bowie-knives, and tar-barrels, if a man has the misfortune to lose popularity. Besides 't is a devil of a distance; and though, of course, you will pay travelling expenses —"

"That's not in the bargain," exclaimed Cartwright, thrusting his hands in his pockets, and walking up and down the room, not very unlike a Bengal tiger in a small cage. "I never agreed to that, Don."

"But you will agree to it, of course. Friends must help each other, specially such intimate friends as you and I. And just now, you know, you are so rich, — at least, so much richer than I."

"I ain't rich," said Cartwright; "and you know it. But I have an idea, Don."

"Felicitá!" cried the Don, bowing. "Ideas are valuable properties. Yours especially, my dear friend. Virginia mines; you don't work 'em half enough. I suppose you want a partner. What are the terms?"

"I want you to go down to Charleston."

"It is out of my way."

"Expenses paid."

"And from there to Texas?"

"And from there to Texas."

"Business at Charleston likely to last long?"

"A month at longest. Possibly less."

"Say a month, then. Charleston's a dear city. Month's board, lodging, carriage hire, small pleasures —"

"Paid."

"For a foreign gentleman of distinction. Living twice as dear for foreigners as for natives. Risk paid, too. Risk's everything in the calculation, you know. May be heavy. Have n't heard what it is yet."

"None in the world. But I must think the matter over. Meet me here to-morrow night at the same hour. If we agree as to terms, can you start at once?"

"The sooner the better, my dear friend."

"Then to-morrow night."

"I shall await you here."

"And now," said Cartwright, "to get out of this cursed den without being seen. Don't forget to-morrow night."

So the two gentlemen parted for that evening.

They met again on the following night according to appointment. On each occasion the conversation between them was carried on in Spanish, the only language which Don Ramon spoke fluently. In the interval between their first and second interview, Cartwright was busily engaged all day and a great part of the night, too, in his own room at the hotel, — probably in some occupation of a literary nature; for before he began it he had purchased a great quantity of writing materials, — various kinds of inks various kinds of pens, various kinds of paper, and when he had finished it he left behind him, as he unlocked the door and went out to keep his appointment with Don Ramon, not even a pen or a scrap of paper. The work on which he had been so assiduously employed must have absorbed all these materials, and perhaps spoiled many of them; for in the room, as he left it, there was a strong smell of burnt pens and burnt paper.

On the morrow of that night Don Ramon left Richmond, not by the ordinary conveyance but by a horse and buggy, which he had purchased for the purpose, since, he said, he was travelling for his pleasure. And to a gentleman who could afford to pay for his pleasure, nothing was less pleasant than to be booked from place to place like a parcel. The same day Philip Cartwright returned to Glenoak.

FIRST LOVE.

It is one of the oddest points of difference between man and woman that woman has no First Love. The long alphabet of her affections is without any distinct end or beginning; she mounts by insensible gradations from dolls and kittens and pet brothers to the zenith of passion, to descend by the same insensible gradations from the zenith of passion through pet brothers to tabby cats. There is no such event as a first kiss forms in a boy's life to mark for woman the transition from girlhood to the sudden maturity of passion; she has been kissing and purring and fondling and petting from her cradle, and she will pet and fondle and purr and kiss to her grave. Love, in the technical sense of the word, is with her little more than an intensifying of her ordinary life. There is no new picture, but the colors are for the while a little heightened and the tone raised. Presently the vividness of color will fade again, and the cool grays lower the tone, and the passion of life will have died away. But there will be no definite moment at which one could fairly say that love came or went. A girl who is not whispering in a lover's ear will always say frankly enough that she never knew what it was not to be in love. There is one obvious deduction which she forgets to draw, that there never can be a time when she can know what it is to be in love. Here and there, of course, a woman may be colder, or later in development, or more self-conscious, and may divide by more rigidly marked lines the phases of her life. But even then, if she be a woman at all, she can have no first love. Feeling, with woman, has no past, as it has no future. Every phase of her life begins with an act of oblivion. Every love is a first love. "I never loved any one before," is said, and said truly, to a dozen loving ears in succession. "The first thing I should like to meet with in Paradise," said Lady Wortley Montagu, "would be the river Lethe, the stream of Forgetfulness." But woman finds a little rivulet of Lethe at every stage of her heart's career. If she remembers the past at all, it is to offer it up as a burnt sacrifice to the deity of the present. When Cleopatra talked about Cæsar to Mark Antony, she passed, no doubt, her fingers through her lover's hair and wondered how she could ever have doted on such a bald-pated fellow as the Dictator. Had she succeeded in charming Octavius, she would have wondered equally at her infatuation for such a ne'er-do-well as Antony. And so it is no wonder that a woman's first love, even if she realizes it at all, goes down in this general wreck of the past. But in man's life it is a revolution. It is in fact the one thing that makes him man. The world of boyhood is strictly a world of boys. Sisters, cousins, aunts, mothers, are mixed up in the general crowd of barbarians that stand without the playground.

There are few warmer or more poetic affections than the chivalrous friendship of schoolfellows; there is no truer or more genuine worship than a boy's worship of the hero of the scrimmage or the cricket-field. It is a fine world in itself, but it is a wonderfully narrow and restricted world. Not a girl may peep over the palings. Girls can't jump or sag out, or swarm up a tree; they have nothing to talk about as boys talk; they never heard of that glorious swipe of old Brown's; they are awful milk-sops; they cry and "tell mamma"; they are afraid of a governess, and of a cow. It is impossible to conceive a creature more utterly contemptible in a boy's eyes than a girl of his own age usually is. Then in some fatal moment comes the revolution. The barrier of contempt goes down with a crash. The boy-world disappears. Brown, that god of the playground, is cast to the owls and to the bats. There is a sudden coolness in the friendship that was to last from school to the grave. Paper-chases and the annual match with the "old fellows" cease to be the highest objects of human interest. There is less excitement than there was last year when a great cheer welcomes the news that Mugby has got the Ireland. The boy's life has become muddled and confused. The old existence is sheering off, and the new comes shyly, fitfully. It is only by a sort of compulsion that he will own that he is making all this "fuss" about a girl. For the moment he rebels against the spell of that one little face, the witchery of that one little hand. He lingers on the border of this new country from whence there is no return to the old playing-fields. He is shy, strange to this world of woman, and woman's talk and woman's ways. The surest, steadiest foot on the cricket-ground tumbles over footstools, and tangles itself in colored wools. The sturdiest arm that ever wielded bat trembles at the touch of a tiny finger. The voice that rang out like a trumpet among the tumult of foot-ball hushes and trembles and falters in saying half a dozen commonplace words. The old sense of mastery is gone. He knows that every chit in the nursery has found out his secret, and is laughing over it. He blushes — and a boy's blush is a hot, painful thing — when the sisterly heads bend together and he hears them whispering what a fool he is. Yes, he is a fool, — that is one thing which he feels quite certain about. There is only one other thing he feels even more certain about, — that he is in love, and that love has made him a man.

We are not of course, going to trench on the field of poets and moral preachers, or to expound, like Sir Barnes Newcome, the philosophy of the affections, or to demonstrate with Miss Faithfull and Mrs. Fawcett the great office which First Love fulfils in the economy of man. The only remark we have to make is the very obvious one which moral preachers may be pardoned for forgetting that it is on the whole a wonderfully pleasant thing. If one enters it through Purgatory, it is none the less a Paradise at which one arrives, an Eden with its tree of knowledge and its tree of life. There is none of the distrust, the irony, the low-pitched expectations of after affection; no practical second thoughts; no calculations about wedding-rings and marriage settlements. In its beginning love still hovers in a sort of debatable land between the real and the unreal, with a good deal of the fun and make-believe of boyhood and girlhood about it yet. There is the old school-trick of "secrets," of "mystery," whisperings in corners, stolen glances, dropped gloves, little letters deposited in crafty hiding-places. There is the carrying out of the new ritual of love as love-novels give it to us, the stealing photographs and the kissing locks of hair, and the writing love-poems with a certain weakness in their rhyme, and the watching the light in our mistress's window. It is wonderful with what a rigorous exactitude, with what a grave seriousness, we carry out our part in the pleasant little comedy. But it is no comedy to us while we figure in it. It is the revelation of a new world, a world of light and joy, a world, too, of wonder and enchantment and mystery. "Tout est mystère dans l'amour," we sing with old Fontaine, "ses flèches, son carquois, son flambeau, son enfance," and of these mysteries we are admitted as worshippers.

It is hard not to feel a little flutter of pride at being not quite what other people are, not quite what we ourselves were a month ago. What would others understand of this new love-language that we talk? What of our spasmodic little chatter, broken with passionate ejaculations that have no relation to any subject that could be discussed in earth or heaven, interrupted by silences more eloquent than words? What of those delicious caprices that follow on the sense of power, those bright little quarrels that only exist in the faith that severance is impossible? What of this new love of letter-writing in fingers that once hated a pen? We exult in the thought that St. Valentine's day taxes the energies of the post-office more than any other day in the year. We laugh to think of a great Government department in a flutter because Love says "write," and we have written. What of this new delight in solitude, in "mooning about," as we used to call it in our unregenerate days? Surely, it is something that love conquers boredom, that one is never alone when one can peep at a locket, or spell over again those sweetest and most crossed of letters, or debate whether the object of one's passion looked best in a blue dress or a brown. But all these are the mere outer accidents of life, and it is life itself that is so changed. What a fresh boisterous breeze of life and liberty comes sweeping down on the tranquil little soul whose deepest joys and sorrows have been over her lessons and her doll! All the youth in her veins quickens at the touch. She is a hoyden, a scapegrace in a moment; the governess shrugs her shoulders; mamma begins to think of her "coming out." Then there is the sudden revulsion, the delicious inequalities and inconsistencies of a period of transition, the shyness and stiffness, the silence, the revery. Then at a bound there is the return on pure girlhood, the defiant revolt, the rebellion against this absorption in another. Odi et amo, it is the close neighborhood of the two that gives each its charm. She is a flirt, a coquette; for what is coquetry but the half-incredulity of a girl unable to believe in her own happiness, eager to convince herself by any experience of the new strength and attraction that she has gained?

After-life brings deeper, intenser passion, but never sensation so vivid, so rapid, so exquisitely contrasted, never so involuntary. A girl lies passive in the very dreaminess of joy as emotion after emotion sweeps over her, faith and jealousy and bitterness and delight, like the wind sweeping over Æolian chords and wakening music as wild and wayward as the music in her heart. What o her moment of life gives her those "grands ennuis entremêlés de joie" that the old French poetess sung about? —

"Quand je pense avoir plus de douleur,
Sans y penser je me trouve hors de peine;
Puis quand je crois ma joie être certaine,
Et être au haut de mon désiré heur,
Il me remet en mon premier malheur."

Men spend a great deal too much time, says a great philosopher, over love. We share Mr. Mill's opinion, though probably Mr. Mill would hardly share our grounds for it. We don't grudge a moment given to a man's First Love, because a man believes in it. "Credo quia impossibile," — "I believe just because it is impossible," — replied Terullian to the objector to his faith; and it is a gain to humanity that at the very outset of life one should meet and believe in a thing so impossible as First Love. We are saved, at any rate, from the dreary gospel of Mr. Buckle, from regarding ourselves as machines, and tabulating our lives in averages. So, too, there are days, early days in a man's course, when, sitting alone and looking on a sunset, he feels like a grain of sand at the mercy of winds that blow whence and whither he knows not. First Love at any rate saves us out of thoughts like these by quickening in us pulses of pain and pleasure that will beat on, drive the winds as they list. How much, too, of the reverence, the reserve, the grace and refinement of character, springs out of those days of distant, hushed worship, of all-surrendering, all-daring faith? A mere girl, like a mere daisy, rouses within us thoughts too deep for tears. That first touch of passion gives a beauty of its own to the temper of a man, as it gives it to the face of a woman.

Who has not noted the strange, sweet change that softens the abrupt gesture, and gives music to the hasty speech, in the hoyden when love's finger first touches her? When Pygmalion's statue-bride quickened into human life, she must have felt, one fancies, an inexpressible joy in the sense of the rapture her beauty had created, and could sustain. It is this new sense — this consciousness that, as she simply lives and moves, her grace and power is going out of her to gladden at least one heart of man's — that quickens a girl's face out of the hardness and immobility of earlier years. From mere physical, immobile form, it becomes life and spirit, sensitive to every wave of thought, feeling, reflection. The very wonder of the new world she looks out upon, its interest, its awe, mirror themselves in the quick alternations of enthusiasm, of terror, of tenderness. It is quite as well to get a little beauty into the world, quite as well to preserve a little poetry in man, and while First Love does this we don't mean to surrender it to Mr. Mill. But we freely give up to him its successors. The mere conventional repetition of the real thing, when its first fervor of faith has fled, the repetition of the old love-litanies by lips that have learnt the irony of them, the mechanical performance of the ritual that has become a sham, this is — we agree with Mr. Mill — a sheer waste of human time. When a man has got safely over thirty, and looks back on the number of these performances, their extreme dreariness, and the time they have cost him, he feels a twinge of compunction, and a certain pleasure in the consciousness that he is now at any rate secure till forty. As for women, till they are quickened by the apostleship of the champions of their "rights," they will probably go on thinking these little farces the pleasantest things in life. After all, they are not more ridiculous than the general tenor of their existence, and woman has at any rate more time to waste than man.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE MARY ANN.

IN TWO PARTS. PART I.

THE Mary Ann was a whaling-vessel, well known in the Tasmanian trade. She had always been accounted a lucky ship. When others had returned without oil, or, as the phrase is, "clean," she had been able to pay her men good wages, or rather to give her men considerable sums of money as their share in the enterprise, for the principle of co-operation, which is now receiving yearly new applications in England, has long been in use among whalers. Men go out on the agreement that they shall receive a particular specified share of the total proceeds. Sometimes they draw nothing at all at the end of their voyage; sometimes each sailor receives as much as a couple of hundred pounds. But the general effect of the system is that the sailors engaged in the trade are rather above the average; that each man looks after his fellows, and does his best to aid the common cause. When they have reached the whaling-ground, there are no idle hands. While one man is specially appointed to keep a lookout, he is assisted by the eyes of every one on deck; and when at last the welcome "There she blows!" is heard, men rush to the boats as readily as schoolboys rush out of school.

The Mary Ann had usually been, as I said, a lucky ship, and men would go out in her for a smaller share of the proceeds of the voyage than they would in other vessels. Her crew was usually, therefore, a picked one, and her captain, old Truesalt, as good a whaler as could be met with. And yet the Mary Ann was an old, lumbering, clumsy vessel, which ploughed her way through a heavy sea in as awkward a style as any Dutchman ever built. She was of Dutch build. In a gale of wind she had as much notion of riding on the waves as Washington Irving's Tinbrock would have had of dancing a polka. She rolled from side to side until her yards nearly touched the sea, and in her onward course went through the opposing waves instead of over them. When she was young, she had been a Dutch East Indiaman. A curious chapter might be written on the vicissitudes of ships. The Victory is to be laid up like an old Greenwich pensioner. The ship in which Captain Cook, now a hundred years ago, made one of his voyages round the world, was employed only a few years ago as a collier between Newcastle and London. One of the dirtiest whalers which I ever saw, and this only some six or seven years ago, was the Prince Regent, a vessel which had been the yacht of George IV.; and it would be easy to make out quite a long list of vessels now doing the rougher kind of sea-work, which in their younger days have seen noble service.

The Mary Ann had been out for a ten months' cruise on the whaling-ground which lies all round the great Southern Ocean. This time she had been unfortunate, and her crew were returning in disgust for a new supply of provisions and a few weeks' run on shore. They had reached Storm Bay, and expected within a few hours to anchor off Hobart-town. The wind had fallen, and the men were standing lazily about, looking out for any sign of its rising again. At last one of the sailors called attention to the fact that a boat was putting off from the land. In a few minutes, three men could be made out, and before very long the pilot was on board. It requires some experience of the sensation to understand how men who have been cut off from all human intercourse for many months welcome a new face. The pilot in this case was a very good fellow, talkative and good-natured, and ready to answer, to the best of his ability, all the questions which were showered upon him. But the one absorbing piece of news on which he always fell back, when he could get a moment's leisure from answering questions, was that Black Dick had escaped again, and had gathered round him a gang of the worst bush-rangers which the island had yet seen. Black Dick had robbed the mail. Black Dick had tied a dozen different men to trees; had stopped the coach going to Launceston, and, with the help of his companions, had relieved the passengers of everything which possessed sufficient value in his eyes to be worth taking; had threatened that he would attack a man against whom he had a grudge in the very centre of Hobart-town; had been seen to go down the principal street in open day. With one man to help him, he had gone to a ball up the country, and had made his appearance in the midst of the festivity with a rifle at his shoulder; had then called for silence, a proceeding quite unnecessary; and had, after graciously promising not to harm anybody if they did not stir, sent the hat round, making a collection of involuntary offerings of money, watches, bracelets, brooches, watch-guards, and even rings.

Lastly, the man had gathered together a number of ruffians, almost as bad as himself, and was known to have committed some terrible murders. Parties of police had been out after him for weeks, but they seemed to give him but little trouble. The convict servants scattered throughout the colony were known to give him assistance, and it was not at all unlikely that settlers in remote districts were ready to purchase their own security at the price of conniving at his presence. The government had offered a reward for him dead or alive. It was believed that he would make the attempt from the northern side of the island to escape over to the mainland; extra men had therefore been stationed at every likely spot on the north coast, and every ship leaving the colony was subjected to a stricter search. All these particulars the old pilot related while waiting on the poop of the Mary Ann for the approach of the sea-breeze, which, usually setting in about three o'clock in the afternoon, would, in the course of three or four hours, carry them easily to their anchorage.

Meantime, from the opposite side of the bay, a long whale-boat had put to sea, and was rapidly moving in the direction of the ship. The pilot was the first to notice her, and to wonder what she could be. She could not belong to any whaler, because none was in sight. She was not a Hobart-town boat, because she was coming from the opposite direction. Neither could she belong to Port Arthur, because from the convict settlement no boat belonging to the government would be allowed to make its way round, and there were no private boats. The pilot could only think of the boat belonging to the isthmus which separates Tasman's Peninsula from the mainland. At this isthmus, which is a low sandy neck from sea to sea, and only some three hundred yards wide, there were stations near to each other, with guards stationed day and night to prevent the escape of convicts from the peninsula. To help them, there were and are dogs kept at the public expense, and chained, so that it was impossible for a fugitive to make his escape without passing within reach of them. Should the runaway endeavor to swim round, he well knew that the bays were alive with sharks. There was a boat kept on the mainland side of the peninsula, but what could the police force stationed there want so far away? If the boat had been kept on the peninsula side of the isthmus, the pilot would have thought that it contained an escaped party of convicts.

This view of the matter once suggested, made every one on the alert. Ships had been seized before, and the crews either murdered outright, or turned adrift to make their way back as they best could in a boat, or, as happened in the case of the Lady Hobart, had been compelled to work the ship under the guidance of the captors. The mate, however, soon made the matter clear. His telescope showed that none of them wore either the bright yellow or the gray clothing in which runaways from Port Arthur would be clothed.

In a few minutes it became evident that the boat was making her way to the ship. As she drew near, she was carefully scanned, in order that some trace of her character might be discovered.

"They are not convicts by their dress," said one.

"Two of them, at least, have blue shirts on like policemen," said a Hobart-town lad.

"Can they be a shipwrecked crew?" asked another.

But before he could be answered, the captain noticed that there were only four men pulling, although eleven were in the boat.

Presently, they saw a white rag hoisted on the top of an oar, and the man who had suggested that they might be a shipwrecked crew gave himself credit for his sagacity.

"If they are shipwrecked men, they pull like landsmen."

"But ships' crews don't all pull like whalers," suggested the pilot.

"And ships' crews that don't belong to whalers don't carry whaling-boats such as that," answered the captain.

Altogether, there were circumstances about the incident which would have created wonder, if not anxiety, at any time; but now, while the ship was lying becalmed, they naturally became an exciting topic.

Soon the boat could be made out clearly, and a fair notion obtained of the men in her. None of them were clothed in the least like convicts. That, at any rate, was clear. Two had blue over-shirts; the rest had nothing particular in their dress to indicate who or what they were. They might be sailors, or they might be ordinary colonial laborers. As the boat drew near, it was seen that they only possessed four oars. Altogether there were eleven men in her. As soon as they got within speaking distance, the captain shouted to ask them who they were, and what they wanted. His suspicions had been aroused, and he was just the man to make a hard fight rather than have his ship taken. But he felt half ashamed of himself as he shouted, because apparently there was only a boat of unarmed men approaching.

"We are the shipwrecked crew of the Philadelphia, American whaler," shouted the man steering in the whale-boat.

"That boat never belonged to an American whaler," said the captain to the pilot.

"She is the police-boat; I know her by the red line," interrupted the pilot eagerly.

"Mr. Smith," the captain called quietly to the first mate, "get your anchor on the bulwarks ready to drop over into that boat if there should be any need for it."

Mr. Smith thought the precaution a rather foolish one, but obeyed, as a matter of course.

"Now, boatswain, bring up your lances and harpoons."

When the latter order had been obeyed, it was evident that it would have been an extremely dangerous thing to make an attack on the Mary Ann. The lance, as sharp as a razor, in the hands of a skilful whaler, would be a terrible weapon. But the captain had seen by the faces of the crew that they thought his precautions altogether unnecessary; and as he looked towards the boat, he felt inclined to agree with them. Almost the only circumstance of suspicion was the fact that they were in the police whale-boat.

By this time the boat was within easy speaking distance of the ship, and the men could be readily seen from the deck.

"How do you come by that boat?" asked the pilot.

"The police have lent it to us to go to Hobart-town in. Our own was too much damaged to float any longer."

"But this is not the way to Hobart-town."

"No. We saw you, and thought you would give us a lift when the sea-breeze came up," answered the man at the steering-oar.

The statement might possibly be true, and indeed the whole aspect of affairs looked so ordinary, that no one seemed to think of making any opposition to the approach of the boat. A rope-ladder was thrown over to them, and without more ado they made fast their boat, and followed each other closely on board.

And then there began a short tragedy, which lasted only three minutes. The boat's crew were runaway convicts, who had surprised the police, taken their boat, stolen their clothes, and had planned this attack upon the whaler, with the object of getting away from the island. Each man, at a signal given by a short active man, who acted as their leader, produced a pistol, and, pointing it at the head of the whaler nearest him, intimated, in the plainest possible way, that death would be the doom of any one who should venture to resist. Nevertheless, the captain and two or three others, including the cabin-boy, did resist. A shot was fired at each. The captain was slightly wounded, and the boy overpowered. Two men who resisted were mortally wounded, and then the Mary Ann was in the possession of eleven of England's picked scoundrels. Her crew, with the exception of three men, were bound; the old pilot and captain were locked in a cabin, at the door of which a man stood sentry; and the ship's head was turned seaward. The convicts then held a short consultation, and the result was that they ordered four of the crew and the pilot to be brought on deck, to be lowered into the whale-boat by which they had themselves come to the ship, and turned adrift. When this was done, the captain and the remainder of his crew, now reduced to six, were brought together, and informed by Black Dick — for the leader of the ruffians was the notorious bushranger, — that they were going to California, that resistance on the part of anybody would be punished by instant death, but that if these sailors would work willingly, they should be well treated. The same night the ship ran out of Storm Bay, and by daylight was out of sight of land. The poor sailors, who were expecting a run on land after their monotonous voyage, had a three months' journey before them, with the certainty of no pay at the end, and the probability of hard treatment in the mean time.

A week had passed by. The captain's wound almost completely disabled him. He was treated with the utmost harshness by Black Dick, and would in all probability have been knocked on the head, or thrown overboard, but for the fact that nobody else knew so thoroughly how to work the ship. The mate, a clever Yorkshireman, with very little to say, but that little always to the purpose, acquiesced apparently in what could not be helped. Black Dick even seemed to have taken a liking to him. The Hobart-town lad, who had a good word from every sailor on board, was, however, mortally hated by the convict leader, who resented every time he met him the lad's brave resistance to him on the day of capture. The lad could steer well, was particularly useful aloft, and was altogether much too valuable in helping the lazy rascals who had been deputed to do the work of the men turned adrift, to be murdered outright. Still, he was terribly ill-used. He was called up at all times of the day and night to do the most difficult and dangerous work. If a sail wanted reefing, poor Charley had to go whether the summons were in his watch or not. While everybody else had a certain number of hours' sleep, he was pretty certain to be disturbed in his, and might think himself fortunate if he got half the allotted time. The convicts themselves followed their captain's example, and this the more readily, because they saw that the latter rather liked to see them ill-use the lad.

A fortnight more passed, and the ship had made good progress into the Pacific. She was reaching the latitude of the Fijis. Nothing of importance had occurred on board. Black Dick had chosen to torture poor Charley. One day he had him hoisted with a rope under his arms up to the cross-trees, and kept there until he fainted. At another time, he was sent aloft on a cold night, and kept there, just as he had turned out of his berth, until morning, when he was so cold that it was only with the aid of the mate, who got well cursed for his pains, that the lad reached the deck. Nobody else would have dared to give him a helping hand; but, as I have said, the mate had made himself rather a favorite with Black Dick. He had done what he could for poor Charley, had given him many an encouraging word, had warded off many a blow, but, as he brought the lad down the companion, it seemed that he too was deserting him; for he whispered into his ear, not words of consolation, but a command and a threat: "You must not say anything about our relationship, or I shall let them do what they like with you."

Charley was a distant connection of the mate's wife. What did the mate mean by thus wishing that all connection between them should be unknown?

And the captain all this time, what of him? He was at first gloomy and sulky: the pain from the wound, the loss of his ship, and the ill-treatment he received seemed to leave him time for nothing else than grumbling. He was compelled to assist the mate in taking the ship's latitude and longitude, and Black Dick was cunning enough to watch very jealously that there was no connivance between them which might run them into dangerous waters.

And then, as the days drew on, the captain recovered to some extent his health and spirits. Night after night he saw the convicts take alternate rounds of carousing, until he sometimes believed and almost hoped that they would set the Mary Ann on fire. And then there would return the great hope of freedom; the desire to shake off these scoundreels, and, if possible, bring them to justice. He wished that they might meet with a man-of-war, English, French, or American, he did not care which. If they should board him, he would denounce the men, even though he should be shot that very moment. He hated them for the way they treated poor Charley. He wished that they would all get drunk together, and give him a chance of making off in a boat. But they were much too careful for that, — would not even allow him to be too long with any of his old crew; and the mate, whom he saw necessarily a good deal every day, seemed to have quite gone over to the enemy. He was a rare hand at whale-fishing, but no match at plotting against Black Dick. He had made one or two suggestions to the mate, to seize the ship, to have a boat lowered under some easily feigned pretence, and to get away in the night. But the cold-hearted mate had only shaken his head, and said that it could not be done.

"Wait," he had said; "things may turn out right. Take it easy till they do."

And meantime the mate himself, who seemed the friend of the bushranger, and was believed to be so by all on board except by the ship's carpenter, who had known him from his babyhood, was simply playing his own part. A day or two had convinced him that it was altogether useless to attempt anything like active opposition. It was doubtful whether all the six men who remained of the ship's crew could be trusted, — even if they could, they were quite powerless against the suspicious and well-armed convicts. He knew quite well, from his Van Dieman's Land experience, that these bush-rangers would not hesitate at the murder of them all, if they had anything to gain thereby. Nay, he believed that they would put such a design into execution immediately, but for the necessity they were under of having men to manage the ship. He saw, therefore, that the best course to pursue was to make himself necessary to them. Thus it was that within a week he had convinced Black Dick that they could do nothing without him, and that it was necessary to retain the captain, in order to do some of the calculation required for the navigation.

At last Black Dick told him his plans. They were to go to California, to sell the ship, and make off with the money. The Yorkshireman coolly turned round to the bushranger, looked him steadily in the face, and asked him how much he was to be paid for his trouble.

The bushranger was surprised, and, after a moment's pause, burst into a short laugh. "That's what I call cool"; but he was pleased at the coolness, nevertheless. When he named a sum, the mate stood out for a higher, until at length a bargain was struck.

The bargain having come to the ears of the captain, the latter resolved to denounce the mate as an accomplice whenever he should have the chance. The poor captain was much too simple and straightforward a sailor to make out what was going on in the brain of his mate.

California being the destination, the mate thought it best, after thinking the matter over, to persuade Black Dick that the likeliest way of evading suspicion was to go in with oil. But the Mary Ann was clean. The bushranger pointed out to the mate, when he suggested that they should try to catch a fish or two, that they had been returning to Hobart-town without oil, and naturally asked why they could not go in the same condition into

San Francisco, the capital of California. The mate pointed out that the ship belonged to Hobart-town, that it was natural they should go there, in order to see their friends, and give an account to the owners of the ship; but that in California, the circumstance of a southern ship going so far out of her course would be suspicious. However, the mate did not press his point; he was not very certain that any good end could be gained by it. His moderation and want of eagerness made the bushranger think the more favorably of the plan, and at length determine that the advice should be taken.

When the captain learned that the ship was to be put a little out of her course in order that they might come upon whaling-ground, his spirits improved wonderfully. The old fisher's instinct awakened in him at once.

Everything was got ready for the purposes of the chase. The men were told that their best chance of getting safely into San Francisco was to take with them a cargo which should give them the appearance of having been about a lawful pursuit. I don't know what was in the mate's head at the time he made the suggestion which had been adopted, or whether he had formed any definite plan. I am inclined to think he had not. Possibly he thought that the great point to be aimed at was the gaining of time. He knew that the colonial government would be quite certain to send a man-of-war after them, and that the pursuer would most likely think California was the proposed destination of the runaways. On the other hand, to meet with whales they would have to go somewhat out of the ordinary course to California, because, though landmen are generally unaware of the fact, ships usually keep within very narrow tracks, and very seldom strike out a new course for themselves.

As a set-off to the disadvantage of leaving the ordinary track, the mate considered it probable that on the whaling-ground they might meet with other vessels, by the help of which he might get a chance of sending a message to an English man-of-war.

The captain was in high glee at the prospect of sport. The mate took everything very easily, as everybody thought, and meantime was puzzling his brains as to what course he should adopt to make other people aware of the true state of affairs on board the Mary Ann.

In a few days, the joyful cry was heard announcing that a fish was in sight. A boat was lowered; the captain was placed in it, with an equal number of ex-convicts and ordinary sailors as his crew. The convicts, however, carried pistols; for they were by no means inclined to trust the rest. I need not describe the chase. Melville has done it so well, that it is almost presumption in any one else to attempt it. They were successful. The convicts soon became enamored of its excitement, its fine sport, and the risk. It was as exciting as bushranging, and quite as dangerous. Then, too, they had from one day's work obtained three hundred pounds' worth of oil. A few such days' work, and they would have something to sell when they reached California. The latter was the argument which told most on some of the men; but Black Dick shook his head. He wanted to be in port before it was at all likely that any news of their capture of the vessel had preceded them.

A day or two more of such sport as they had had,

and they could go into California with a good pretence.

The next day, as an observation showing their position had been entered, while the captain was marking their latitude and longitude on the chart, according to the daily custom on board ship, the mate took advantage of the momentary absence of the bushranger—who, although he put more trust in the mate than in anybody else, yet never allowed the observations to be taken, or the entries in the log or on the chart to be entered, out of his presence—to make him notice how near they would be to a certain island, which was then one of the naval stations of Her Majesty in the South Pacific.

The poor lad Charley continued to be ill-treated. Every kind of petty oppression which the ill-will of bad men could suggest was heaped upon him. His life was a long misery. He had insufficient food and insufficient rest; he was rope's-ended without the smallest compunction; he was exposed to all weathers, and was at every ruffian's beck and call.

Next day, another whale was sighted. The boat was lowered, a similar crew placed in her, and the pursuit began. The fish (as the whale—in defiance of naturalists—is called by the sailors) led them a long chase, so long that they lost sight of the ship altogether, and but for the fact that the Mary Ann followed in the direction which they had taken, they would have had great difficulty in finding their way back.

The late return, however, suggested a plan to the mate which he thought might be put into execution. If the captain, when steering the whaler, could again manage to get out of sight of the ship, he might contrive not to be seen again, and to make his way to that island, where, as we have seen, he was pretty sure to find an English man-of-war.

There were many difficulties in the way. The captain was not the man who could readily take a hint; he must be directly communicated with. Accordingly, as the ship's calculations were being made next day, when the mate was asked by the captain to check his working, the former wrote upon the slate: "Lose yourself, and make off for the island." The captain had the sense, after reading the message, to turn the slate, and take the opportunity of afterwards rubbing out the writing without arousing the suspicion of the convict captain, who had been seated at the opposite side of the cabin table while this had been going on.

When the ship's position was marked on the chart, the mate laid his rule quite naturally on the course which would lead from the spot the ship then occupied to the island. "West-by-north exactly," was the involuntary remark of the captain.

That same day the boat was manned again. The crew was composed of three convicts—who, according to custom and for fear of an attack, were armed—and five of the crew of the Mary Ann. Charley was put in, in order to take the place of the harpoon-thrower at the oar, when the whale had been reached.

From the moment they left the ship, the mate determined that he would do his utmost to get the Mary Ann under the notice of the man-of-war on the station. He went below, leaving the bushranger in charge, in order that he might have the sleep to which, in the ordinary routine of the ship's work, he was entitled. Before getting into his berth he gave one more look seaward, and though he could not by this time see the boat, he saw something else which he thought would favor his purpose. The boat had started to go in a westerly direction, that, of course, being the direction in which the whale had been seen; the mate, however, saw now, what perhaps no one else observed, — certainly none of the convicts, — that the school of whales had turned south, and must have long since caused the men in the boat, which could not be seen from the ship's deck, to alter her course. Ordinarily, the ship, instead of being allowed to follow gently to the west, so as to aid the boat, would have altered her course, and gone where occasional clouds of spray showed that the whales had gone. The mate, however, did not want the ship's course altered, and so went to sleep with a contented mind. Two hours later he came on deck, asked Black Dick — who had constituted himself captain in the mean time — whether anything had been seen of the boat; learned that no one had observed her, but that she was supposed to be but a little way ahead; and then expressed his fear that, from a slight change which had occurred in the wind, the whales might have led the boat in another direction. The bushranger was a little alarmed at the suggestion, because he could not afford to lose the boat's crew, inasmuch as it was almost necessary to have some of the five seamen who were in her to manage the vessel. The day drew to a close, and no signs of the boat were to be seen. A man was sent to the mast-head to keep a lookout, but he could see nothing of her. The mate advised that they should lie to for the night, and keep lights burning at the mast-head. He felt that this could safely be done for his purpose, as he believed the boat to be considerably distant from them. One suggestion was so reasonable that it covered the other. Accordingly, the ship lay to. The crew felt pretty sure that the boat would be with them by morning. Morning came, and there was no sign of her. Black Dick grew anxious; so, too, did the mate. A consultation was held, and it was agreed that the best thing to do was to cruise about during the day, and keep a lookout for the missing boat. The mate took good care that they should make long tacks northward, and very short ones southward. The landsmen were quite unable to see anything suspicious in what was being done; and the sailors were quite content, as they generally are, to trust undoubtingly the management of the ship to their superior officer. Apparently, the ship was making a series of irregular circles round a given point; really, she was making a series of ellipses round a point, which was moving at each ellipse more to the north. Ellipse after ellipse was made, and as the hours passed away, looks more and more anxious were cast round the horizon: still the boat was not to be seen.

LADY PALMERSTON.

AMONG the pictures at Panshanger, the seat of Earl Cowper in Hertfordshire, is one by Sir Joshua Reynolds of more than common excellence, representing two boys seated or half-reclining on the trunk of a felled tree, and a young lady of more tender years with a basket of flowers in her hand. This picture possesses an interest far beyond what it may derive from being one of the last great works of the master; the figures are portraits of William Lamb, second Lord Melbourne, Frederic Lamb, third Lord Melbourne, and Amelia Lamb, Viscountess Palmerston, who died on Saturday last.* The eldest of those boys grew up to be one of the most remarkable men of the age and the girl one of the most remarkable women; the superiority in each instance being rather gradually and unconsciously arrived at than asserted, rather conceded than compelled. The brother rose to be Prime Minister of England, without commanding eloquence or lofty ambition, lazily and loungingly as it were, by the spontaneous display of fine natural abilities, by frankness, manliness, thorough knowledge of his countrymen, and good sense. The sister became the undisputed leader of English society, equally without apparent effort; without aiming at the fame of a wit, like Madame de Staël, or that of a beauty, like Madame de Récamier, or of that of a party idol, like Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire; without once overstepping by a hair's breadth the proper province of her sex; by the unforced development of the most exquisitely feminine qualities, by grace, refinement, sweetness of disposition, womanly sympathies, instinctive insight into character, tact, temper, and — wonderful to relate — heart.

Lady Palmerston, born in 1787, was the daughter of Peniston, first Lord Melbourne. Her mother was the sister of Sir Ralph Milbanke, the father of Lady Noel Byron, and Lady Palmerston was a striking illustration of the maxim that personal, especially mental, gifts and qualities are usually inherited through the mother. Lady Melbourne exercised a marked influence over a large circle of distinguished acquaintance. Lord Byron alludes to her in 1813 as "the best friend I ever had in my life, and the cleverest woman." In 1818 he writes: "The time is past when I could feel for the dead, or I should feel for the death of Lady Melbourne, the best, the kindest, the ablest female I ever knew, old or young."

Lady Palmerston's childhood and girlhood must be supposed to have passed like those of other young ladies of her rank, and her education, except what must have accrued imperceptibly from maternal influences, to be the same. Female education did not then aim at crowding the memory with what is called useful knowledge; its chief objects were grace and accomplishments, and the results were seen in individuality and variety of character, in the freer development of the natural faculties, in greater ease, freshness, and elasticity. Women of quality differed like their handwriting, which is now uniform and generic instead of personal and peculiar. Such, at least, is the broad inference we should draw from the many bright illustrations that have survived to our day, beginning with the one who has given occasion for these remarks. The first event in her life requiring notice was her marriage with Earl Cowper, in 1805. She then immediately took her place in the brilliant galaxy of beautiful and accomplished women of rank who continued to form the chief ornament of the British Court during successive reigns, till they were gradually replaced, not outshone, by a younger, not fairer or more fascinating, race. It was about the period of the Imperial and Royal visits to London, in 1814-15, that these ladies, as if by a common understanding, concentrated their attractions; and it was during these two eventful years, when the metropolis glittered with stars, ribands, and bright eyes, that, conspicuous in her own despite, among the gay and dazzling throng was the charming

* September the 11th.

Lady Cowper, like "grace put in action," whose softness was as seductive as her joyousness:—

"Whose laugh, full of mirth, without any control
But the sweet one of gracefulness, rang from her soul."

Yet that throng comprised Sarah, Countess of Jersey, Corisandra, Countess of Tankerville, Mary Isabella, Duchess of Rutland, Lady Charlotte Campbell, and a long array of formidable competitors. One result or product of this period was the institution of Almack's. On the introduction of quadrilles and waltzes after the peace, grown-up people had to learn their dancing over again, and a high-born party met daily for that purpose at Devonshire House, where it was agreed to establish a series of subscription balls on the cheapest and most restricted plan. Lady Cowper was one of the first six patronesses, and during her long tenure of power (for it was power) in that capacity, her influence was uniformly exerted to modify the exclusiveness of her colleagues.

Her fond admiration for her brother William and the jealous watch which she kept over his reputation to the last leave little doubt that she was no indifferent or unappreciating observer of the ministerial adventures, or misadventures, of her political friends before or after their accession to office in 1830. But what may be called her public life dates from 1839, when she married Lord Palmerston, Lord Cowper having died in 1837. Yet no one would have been more surprised than herself if, at that time, she had been told that she was about to begin a career which, in any sense, could be called public. A celebrated writer (Madame Hahn Hahn) declares her sex incapable of the sustained pursuit of an elevated object for its own sake. "When a woman's heart is touched, when it is moved by love, then the electric spark is communicated and the fire of inspiration flares up; but even then she desires no more than to suffer or die for what she loves. That woman remains to be born who is capable of interesting herself for an abstract idea." Lady Palmerston formed no exception to this theory. The motive power in her case was love of her husband; it was her intense interest in him and in his political fortunes that made her a politician; her source of inspiration was not an abstract idea or principle, but the man. To place him and keep him in what she thought his proper position; to make people see him as she saw him; to bring lukewarm friends, carping rivals, or exasperated adversaries within the genial atmosphere of his conversation; to tone down opposition and conciliate support,—this was thenceforth the fixed purpose and master passion of her life.

If she had deliberately set about the formation of a salon for an interested end, the probability is that she would have failed, as so many equally qualified by birth and fortune have failed both before and since, from not understanding the delicate structure of our society, which will neither be led nor forced, professedly and ostensibly. The grand attraction of Holland House, Lansdowne House, and Devonshire House in the olden time was the conviction that these princely residences were open to merit of every sort, that the noble owners had a genuine relish for intellectual eminence, and cordially sympathized with the artists, men of letters, and others of purely personal distinction who were their guests. The attraction of Lady Palmerston's salon at its commencement was the mixed, yet select and refined, character of the assemblage, the result of that exquisite tact and high breeding which secured her the full benefits of exclusiveness without its drawbacks. The diplomatic corps eagerly congregated at the house of the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. So did the politicians; the leading members of the fine world were her habitual associates; and the grand difficulty of her self-appointed task lay in recruiting from among the rising celebrities of public life, fashion, or literature. From the time Lord Palmerston became Prime Minister she grew less particular and discriminating, and although the current story of her "gilded cards," which never were gilded, was grossly exaggerated, a limited number of invitations were occasionally distributed with direct reference to votes. But so many were simultaneously distributed from higher motives that the tone and complexion of the company remained substantially unchanged. She had a marked predilection for youth and beauty, along with an equally marked dislike to vulgarity and ungainliness. She would have "those two pretty girls"; and she would not have "that fat woman with her ugly daughters," although the fat woman was the wife of a county member, and the two pretty girls had neither father nor brother in either House. The élite of the London world were invariably asked without regard to politics, and the most liberal hospitality was extended to all foreigners of note. Her visiting book was kept as regularly as a merchant's ledger. So long as her health allowed, she made a point of filling up her cards with her own hand, and she knew exactly whom she had invited for each of her alternate nights. She used to say that she rarely gave a large party without its being attended by three or four persons not invited for the night or not invited at all. But not a shade of manner on her part betrayed her recollection of the fact.

"If," she would say, "it amused them to come, they were quite welcome." Indeed, her good nature was inexhaustible, nor was it ever known to give way under any extent of forwardness or tiresomeness. The quintessence of high breeding is never to ruffle, offend, or mortify,—never to cause an unpleasant feeling by a tone, a gesture, or a word; and, instead of interrupting or abruptly quitting wearisome or pushing visitors, she would listen till they ceased of their own accord or were superseded and went away.

There is a prevalent notion that sensibility and impressibility are destroyed or blunted by advancing years. But on a calm analysis of the alleged instances, it will be found that, where fancy and feeling are supposed to have decayed or died out, they never, in point of fact, existed. The flash and exuberance of youthful spirits were mistaken for them. Lady Palmerston never lost her wonderful freshness. Her impressions were as lively, her sympathies as warm, her affections as expansive, when she had passed eighty as when, in opening womanhood, she was pelting flowers or rowing on the lake at Brompton, or playfully proposing to bound over the billiard-table at Petworth. Familiar topics did not weary her, nor strange repel. She felt the same vivid interest in things and people, old and young, as if she was just entering life; and this enviable faculty—be it remembered to her immortal honor—was retained through sixty years of pomps and vanities, of luxury and flattery, of social and political scheming, of alternative elation and despondency, of all that is most factitious, most illusion-destroying, most demoralizing in what serious people shun, renounce, denounce, and deprecate as "the world."

Is it a boon or a penance to be exempt from the operation of that kindly law of nature, which makes those whose pilgrimage through life has been prolonged beyond the common span comparatively insensible to the gradual dropping-off of their early companions on the way? Lady Palmerston was saddened and depressed by the death of the late Countess of Tankerville, followed by that of another cherished friend, Lady Willoughby, to an extent that caused serious apprehension for her health. The morning of a grand dinner to the Italian Princes at Cambridge House, Lady Tankerville was taken ill and unable to be present. The moment the party broke up Lady Palmerston, without waiting for her carriage, got into a hack cab and hurried off to the bedside of the invalid in Hertford Street. Whoever was fortunate enough to be once received on a cordial footing of intimacy might count securely on her enduring regard and her generous advocacy if required. She was thoroughly enthusiastically loyal, and would tolerate no doubt, suspicion, or depreciation of a friend. She was also placable in the extreme towards un-friends, provided they had not been guilty of caballing against Lord Palmerston or transgressed the limits of fair party warfare in assailing him. Then a change came over her; the patte de velours shot out its claws, the dove seemed armed with the beak and talons of the hawk. One of the most cutting letters of reproach ever written was addressed by her to the late C. Greville, whom she valued and esteemed, on hearing that he had taken an active and hostile part in the Pacific affair. Her anger was short-lived. She might have taken for her motto "Benefits in marble, injuries in dust." She never forsook a friend and always forgave a foe.

Englishwomen cannot talk politics, properly so called, whatever may be the case with Frenchwomen, whose alleged superiority is open to doubt. The reason has been already indicated. Their views are purely personal; "men, not measures," is their maxim; their thoughts are running on whether a husband, a brother, or a lover is to achieve distinction and have a place. Lady Palmerston never attempted or pretended to understand the bearings of a complicated question. "You must write that down," she would say if a communication struck her, "and I will show it to Lord Palmerston when he comes in; or stay, perhaps he is not gone out."

The bell was rung, the servant was sent with a scrap of paper or a simple message, and the summons was immediately obeyed. Long experience had taught him that her tact, her intuition, were infallible in such matters. The services of the great lady to the great statesman extended far beyond the creation of a salon. What superficial observers mistook for indiscretion was eminently useful to him. She always understood full well what she was telling, to whom she was telling it, when and where it would be repeated, and whether the repetition would do harm or good. Instead of the secret that was betrayed, it was the feeler that was put forth; and no one ever knew from or through Lady Palmerston what Lord Palmerston did not wish to be known. His death was a terrible shock, from which she slowly recovered. She afterwards expressed her belief that it had actually prolonged her life. She was haunted by the fear without his being conscious of the decline. She sat up for him every night when he attended the House of Commons, and she was wearing herself away with anxiety.

She undertook the entire management of the household at Brocket, Cambridge House, and Broadlands, as well as that of her own property; personally inspecting the accounts, leaving nothing to agents, stewards, or head servants, but what fell strictly within their respective departments. The consequence was that she was admirably served, and that an air of ease and comfort pervaded each of her establishments. She kept a journal, which, some time or other, will furnish valuable aids to history.

She had read a good deal in a desultory way, and, when roused to the exertion, could talk on a wide range of subjects with a vigor and accuracy which would have astonished those who had only seen her trifling gracefully with the Cynthia of the minute, the floating rumor or gossip of the hour. She possessed a keen insight into character, and was singularly happy in conveying a trait by an epithet or a graphic sketch by a phrase, letting fall her felicitous touches with an ease and spontaneity that showed her unconscious of the gift.

She was rigidly just in her fixed estimates of character; chary, with rare exceptions, of her preferences; mild, yet firm, in her disapproval; warm, but not extravagant, in her praise. Above all, she never indulged in that false enthusiasm for books, pictures, or persons which so often tries to pass current for the cream of amiability and taste. Her name will live, her memory will endure, indissolubly blended with one of the most brilliant episodes of the social life of England, with many a sweet scene of domestic happiness, with many a glowing image of conjugal and maternal love, with many a delightful hour of "social pleasure, ill exchanged for power," — with all that is winning, high-minded, warm-hearted, — with nothing that is petty, ungenerous, ungraceful, uncharitable, or false. It has been confidently predicted that the days of the grande dame of France, the great lady of England, have passed away as out of keeping with the age. It is certainly only by a happy accident that the loss we are now lamenting will be replaced. But should an attempt be made to mount the vacant throne by any duly-qualified aspirant, she will hit upon no surer mode of advancing her pretensions than by promising to tread in the footsteps of her admired, beloved, and universally regretted predecessor.

A MONUMENT TO NOAH.

[Special Report to the London Examiner.]

ON Saturday last (September 11) a large meeting of the inhabitants of Dummheitenburg, in the Duchy of Ohnehosen, was assembled for the purpose of celebrating the completion of a monument to Noah, the hero of the Deluge. We are happy to be able to lay before our readers a report of this interesting ceremony. The people of Ohnehosen are an intelligent and energetic race, and to many of them it has long seemed a scandal and a reproach that no monument should have been erected to commemorate the signal service which Noah rendered to the world. To atone for this neglect, there was formed in 1856 a committee for the purpose of urging the patriotic of all lands to contrichitects were invited to send in designs for the proposed memorial. A large sum of money was collected; a suitable design was procured; and the inhabitants of Ohnehosen were congratulating themselves on the success of their efforts, when some unfortunate dispute arose among the subscribers. The work was delayed. The project, besides, was sneered at by surrounding countries, who were apparently envious of the glory which the people of Ohnehosen claimed. The design was cavilled at; and historical purists exclaimed against the notion of representing Noah in a dress he never wore. Indeed, the very existence of Noah became a matter of controversy. Under these circumstances the erection of the memorial languished for a while; and it has only been within the past year or two that the inhabitants of Ohnehosen, feeling that the half-finished monument was a disgrace to the Duchy, set vigorously to work to collect subscriptions and have the erection completed. As already stated, the ceremony of handing over the custody of the monument to the Stadtohrigkeit (town-council) of Dummheitenburg took place on Saturday last, when a large number of the populace was assembled. Unfortunately, the proceedings were somewhat retarded by heavy showers of rain, for which the Duchy is rather celebrated.

Herr Bürgermeister Eselskopf congratulated his audience on the fact that at last justice had been done to a great man. They were all sensible of what they owed to Noah. But for his precautions, Ohnehosen would have been at this present moment a howling wilderness. Not only had he stocked the world with inhabitants, but he had also furnished them with beasts of burden wherewith to lighten their labors. In short, Ohnehosen owed everything to Noah, and yet not a single step had been taken to honor his memory. They had statues to poets, and statesmen, and warriors, and philanthropists, but not a stone in commemoration of the father of all these. He rejoiced to know that it had been reserved for Ohnehosen, — and especially his beloved birthplace Dummheitenburg, — to wipe this shame from the forehead of the universe, and on this to him delightful occasion to erect a certainly wanted statue to the never-to-be-sufficiently-honored ancestor of the human race.

Herr Doctor Weissenstrumpfen, author of Wanderschaften in der Logik, hoped that the inhabitants of the neighboring Duchy, — whom he did not scruple to stigmatize as a race of Sadducees, — would now cease their envious jibing. That captious and pitiful deprecation of a noble purpose naturally emanated from a people whose history was barren of great names, and who would be incapable of hero-worship if heroes they had. It was notorious, also, that the very writers whose weak and contemptible railery had been so profusely showered over this monument, were themselves natives of Ohnehosen, — renegades whom no ties of country seemed able to bind. But in spite of abuse and opposition the monument to Noah was now a great fact. Perhaps his audience would like him to enter into the question which had been so frequently urged by the unbelieving scribes of the neighboring Duchy, — whether the hero whom they had just honored had done for Ohnehosen as much as history chronicled. He would not, however, waste their time in recounting the deeds of Noah. Far less would he think of replying to those scoffers who had ridiculed the notion of erecting a statue to a personage whose existence had been declared by sceptics to be mythical. He was a member of the Society of Antiquaries, which had its corresponding members in England, France, Russia, and all parts of the world; and his audience might accept his solemn assurance that there could be no doubt whatever as to the authenticity of these reports on which they founded their right to be present on this occasion.

Herr Baumeister Sackp Feife was proud of the honor which the people of Ohnehosen had done him in commissioning him to design a monument to their common benefactor. He might explain that the monument partook of the character of a baronial tower 220 feet high, and 36 feet square. Above the gateway was the figure of the ark. A spiral staircase led to the severe spacious chambers in which it was purposed to place collections of antediluvian remains. On the summit stood a short pedestal, on which was placed a bronze figure of Noah; at each corner of the pedestal a large and beautiful cabbage, the emblem of Ohnehosen. He would only add that, having lost upwards of £ 3,000 by the contract he would throw himself on the generosity of the honorable citizens of Dummheitenburg.

The Graf von Keinegroschen, as treasurer of the funds of the Committee, begged to say that no one knew how arduous had been the labors of that Committee in getting sufficient money to complete the monument. Every known means of communication had been used. Sunday-school children had been furnished with printed circulars, and had given valuable aid in canvassing for sums not less than threepence. It had been proposed to accept subscriptions of one penny; but, for the honor of Ohnehosen, the project was quashed. The honorable society of waiters, by inviting their members to canvass in the various places of public refreshment, had likewise given notable assistance. The parochial schools had done wonders. The churches, he was sorry to say, would not move in the matter; while the universities kept superciliously aloof. It was better, however, that such a work should be undertaken and completed by the great body of the people; and it was to them that he desired to return the heartfelt thanks of the Committee for their spirit, their noble co-operation.

Several other speeches were delivered, of less importance. The custody of the monument was then formally handed over to the Bürgermeister of Dummheitenburg, and the public proceedings terminated. Afterwards a dinner, given by the Committee, took place in the town-hall, nothing but local wines and dishes being placed on the table. The completion of the statue may be regarded as a great boon to the people of Ohnehosen. It will cause much wrangling to cease, and will greatly relieve the minds of those who first projected the scheme; while it confers upon the Duchy a handsome public ornament, which will soon doubtless prove an attraction to the sight-seers of Europe.

We have only to add to this report a notification of the singular fact that on the very day when the people of Ohnehosen were doing honor to Noah, a number of persons were engaged in celebrating the erection of a statue to Sir William Wallace, at Stirling. There is much comfort in observing that neglected heroes are now beginning to get their due; and we beg to suggest that Brian Boroihme Ossian, and Adam be added to the list of persons "deserving of a statue."

ARTHUR HUGH CLOUGH.*

It is difficult in the brief space of a review to do justice to a man's memory, when he has left behind him a great deal of rather remarkable verse, yet without winning the assured reputation of a poet, and many thoughtful papers on a fairly wide range of subjects, without being much of a littérateur or philosopher either. If this is difficult to do at all, it is nearly impossible, while his death is still recent, to do it to the satisfaction of those in whose hearts the personal impress of the writer is yet strong and deep. Clough was one of those men in whom the moral and the intellectual are so finely intermixed as to send to a maximum their power of personal impressiveness. In this, though perhaps in little else, he resembled Sterling, like whom also he enjoyed the warm friendship of Mr. Carlyle. But Clough's power of impressing others was so absolute that it could assert itself by reticence as much as by utterance. "I always felt his presence," said one of his friends. His own line is said to be an exact memorial of what he was to those who were much with him. A calm judgment passed on the sum of such a man's remains, by one who never saw him, must almost inevitably disappoint those who saw and knew, and who remember.

"More and exuberant by turns, a fountain at intervals playing,"

In the arrangement of these volumes there is scarcely anything that does not deserve high praise. A brief memoir is followed by the letters and prose remains, and these make up the first volume; the verse fills the second. The memoir strikes us as uniting completeness with brevity. A man's wife, if she has the gifts of an "honest chronicler" at all, ought to be his best biographer. The Letters of Lady Rachel Russell and the Memoirs of Mrs. Hutchinson are among the classics of this kind of literature; and the unpretending account of Clough, whether actually written or only inspired and superintended by his widow, shows much of the taste and judgment which in such memorials are imperative. We cannot dismiss it without expressing genuine admiration for two contributions to it, — the first from a younger sister, the close companion of Clough's boyhood; the second from Professor Conington, who (though several years his junior) belonged to the same debating society at Oxford. One of these, describing their early life at Charleston, is a model of clear and graceful narrative, just what a biographical memoir should be; to the other we shall have occasion to recur.

The events of Clough's life are soon told. Born at Liverpool in 1819, he spent his early boyhood at Charleston, to which his father, for business reasons, removed; and in due course he was sent over to school in England, first at Chester, and afterwards at Rugby. A favorite pupil of Arnold's, and an unwearying worker, he went victoriously and blamelessly through Rugby, and won the Balliol scholarship. At Oxford he found the "movement" at its height. Mr. Ward was his great ally. Dr. Newman was still a Fellow of Oriel when Clough (after dropping into a second class in the schools) was elected there in 1842. His failure in the schools was the indication of the commotions and distractions through which his undergraduate mind had passed. For two years, as he himself most graphically has said, he was "as a straw drawn up the draught of a chimney." He ended in gravitating towards the pole directly opposite to Dr. Newman's. For the rest of his life he remained a conscientious sceptic on religious matters. This state of mind led in 1848 to the resignation, first, of his Tutorship, and then of his Fellowship. During two years he worked, against the grain, in London, as Head of University Hall. Disappointed of the Principalship of the University of Sydney, he went to America, and for many months was happily engaged in writing and pupil-work at Cambridge, Massachusetts. Here he confirmed a close connection with Mr. Emerson, and made many warm friends, among whom perhaps the chief was Mr. C. E. Norton, whose name has since become well known. In 1853 he returned to take an Examiner-ship in the Education Office, married on the income thus obtained, and lived a peaceful life, with a good deal of travelling towards the end in search of health, until his premature death in 1861. Paralysis, of which he died, was hereditary, but the tendency is believed to have been aggravated by the severe strain of his comparatively homeless years at school, and of his Oxford struggles.

Clough's letters are full of interest. They are not models of letter-writing, but he wrote through years of such varied and vivid and recent interest, that they form a collection well worth preserving. He writes from Rome during the siege of 1849; and from America, with Emerson, Lowell, Longfellow, Hawthorne, Ticknor, Prescott, and Theodore Parker, all within easy reach. With Emerson he had been in Paris during the revolution of 1848, and he came back with the repute of a thoroughly écervelé republican, so that Mr. Matthew Arnold characteristically addressed a letter to "Citizen Clough, Oriel Lyceum, Oxford." Professor Child was then hard at work on his valuable and scholar-like investigations into Chaucerian scansion; and Clough, whose passion for English hexameters had thrown him much upon metre, writes freely upon that question. At Canterbury, in the last year of his life, he met Mr. Tennyson; he walked with him down "the valley where the waters flow," and writes a letter which makes an extremely interesting commentary on those well-known lines. Throughout the letters there occur short passages of criticism which provoke a regret that he did not more seriously and continuously take up that kind of writing, and leave behind him something more carefully and completely done than the reviews which stand among his prose remains. He writes, for example, thoughtfully and sensibly of Theodore Parker, for whose Unitarian orthodoxy, as a substitute for any other 'doxy, he had "no particular love"; of Mr. Matthew Arnold's poems, valuing the Scholar Gypsy above all; of Plutarch, the Dryden translation of whom he revised for an American publisher; of Buckle's History, hoping his American friends are not "Buckle-bewitched," like all the world this side the water; and on Crabbe, about whom he truly says that "there is no one more purely English (in the Dutch manner), no one who better represents the general result through the country of the eighteenth century."

It is not, however, as a letter-writer that Clough comes before us in these volumes. His Remains present him as a serious writer and thinker on literature, or on the metaphysico-religious questions of the time, and as a writer of poems. Of his claims in this double capacity we proceed to speak. For his literary work it will be enough to say that he seems never to have warmed to it.

We have before expressed regret that he did not take up literary criticism with seriousness and vigor, for his work as it stands is clearly not his best. The Development of English Literature from Chaucer to Wordsworth contains some good things, in particular the just and high estimate of the mental and moral standard of the eighteenth-century literature. But even these are awkwardly expressed, and the general impression left by this, and the paper on "Wordsworth" (contrasting poorly with Professor Shairp's recent review), is thin and unsatisfactory. What his mind was, rather than the actual results it left on paper, is the true object of interest in Clough; and this question leads us straight to his attitude as a man of serious reflection. On this point we can fortunately be quite clear; his Notes on the Religious Tradition (if nothing else) make it clear; and we cannot think the mental position and experience of such a man just now either insignificant or uninteresting. Clough, then, as the final result of his mental development while at Oxford, renounced Christianity. He renounced, that is to say, its dogmatic and historic claims. Three years after Dr. Newman had resigned his Fellowship on ceasing to be in any possible harmony with the Church of England, Clough resigned his on ceasing to be a Christian. But thenceforward to the end of his life he remained sincerely attached to the moral teaching of Christianity, apart from its external embodiment. Nothing would probably have pained him more than to be deemed on these matters indifferent. This allegiance he designated as a "falling back on the great religious tradition." And the general inheritance of religious tradition, embodied nowhere, but traceable everywhere, — in Menu, Hafiz, Confucius; in Homer and Plato; in Lucretius and Tacitus; in Hume as well as in Butler, — this, and a strict adherence to duty and kindness, supplied him through his later and married life with all he wanted of inner support.

It is, we suppose, a necessary characteristic of certain stages in national, as undoubtedly in individual, life, that this sort of mental attitude towards a great religion should attract a strong sentimental sympathy. That this is so, no one will dispute; and we are far indeed from attempting to gauge the loss or gain implied in its being so. What we are concerned in remarking is this: that Clough presents us with a case where this attitude towards Christianity can be shown to have arisen naturally out of a quality of mind having in it essentially more of weakness than of strength, and not deserving in its essence any special sympathy whatever. Professor Conington, in his interesting reminiscence of Clough, records a debate in the society called the "Decade," the subject being "that the study of philosophy is of more value to the formation of opinion than the study of history." This proposition Clough supported, using an argument that culminated in these words: "What is it to me to know the fact of the battle of Marathon, or the fact of the existence of Cromwell? I have it all within me." "Not," he explained, "that it is of no importance to me that these things were; but it is of no importance that I should know it." Such a proposition might conceivably be maintained from the love of paradox; but Clough was the last man to maintain it for that reason. When laid down attachment to abstractions for their own sake, an exaggerated belief in the isolated independence of the human mind, and a very incomplete notion of the relations between history and the individual man. That these conditions should lead (as they led Clough) to the analogous conclusion that "a man may know all that is important in Christianity without so much as knowing that Jesus of Nazareth ever existed," was almost inevitable. It was natural, then, that he should break away more and more from any sort of alliance with dogma, and should follow the instinct described in the lines in his Dipsychus (lines which he was fond of quoting), —

"It seems His newer Will
We should not think of Him at all, but turn
And of the world that He has given us make What best we can."

That such intellectual conditions as have been described may have a value in certain fields of philosophical analysis is plain. But we deny that they have in themselves any claim to particular sympathy, or that they are likely to prove "helpful" (as the phrase goes) to the present generation.

Of the poems left by Clough it would be necessary to say something more than we are about to say had not most of them been for several, and some of them for many, years before the public. The Dipsychus is new. It is that one of his four long poems which had no place in the earlier volume. At the risk of running counter to a probable majority of its author's admirers, we cannot but regard it as on the whole a failure. Taking up (as its name denotes) the old-world struggle between the lofty, transcendental spirit of unselfish purity, and the opposite impulses of callousness and self-interest, it deals with a trite subject in a style which does not even aim at originality. The Spirit of Evil answers to the name of Mephistopheles, and that in itself (by reason of suggested contrasts) is a pity. A semblance of movement is thrown over the poem by laying the scene at Venice, and by fixing each conflicting dialogue at some new point, — the Piazza, the Lido, the Doge's Palace, St. Mark's. When we have added that the sinister spirit begins his attacks during a period of dejection, while Dipsychus is dreamily repeating the words of a powerful but repulsive ode called "Easter Day," with the refrain "Christ is not risen," enough will have been said on a poem to illustrate which nothing would be gained by a series of quotations. We should feel inclined to apply to it a phrase from the lips of Dipsychus himself, and to call it a collection "of unripe words and rugged verse." It will meet with a favorable reception from those who value the soul's "tumult rather than its depth"; but no one who reflects on what a poet like Mr. Browning would have made of the same subject will feel disposed to call it anything more than a remarkable tour de force.

The Bothie of Tober na Vuolich remains unchanged. Say what you will to the hexameters, a pleasanter Long-Vacation pastoral than the Bothie never was and never will be written, and every University man who has not read it through is so far a loser. This poem, which was thrown on the world by Clough with a sort of chuckle just after he had resigned his Fellowship, was received in New England with something like enthusiasm. Among ourselves it will always, and deservedly, remain its author's best-known and most popular production. The great reason for this is that it is a poem of the different classes in society scarcely belongs to the fibre of the pastoral. That is made up of really life-like portraits of the Oxford Tutor and his pupils, and of descriptions of Highland scenery and Highland ways only possible to a man of remarkable power, and earnestly in love with both. The excellent banter on social questions culminates when Hobbes, the enthusiastic Pugin-worshipper of the party, makes his famous proposal for a "Treatise upon the Laws of Architectural Beauty in Application to Women; Illustrations, of course, and a Parker's Glossary pendent, Where shall in specimen seen be the scullion's stumpy-columnar (Which to a reverent taste is perhaps the most moving of any), Rising to grace of true woman in English the Early and Later," and so forth.

The Amours de Voyage is perhaps the cleverest of all the poems. It is a set of hexameter letters (with pretty, though rugged, elegiac reliefs between) describing with a very acute power of observation the growth, in spite of himself, and the ineffectual end, of a travelling attachment formed by a dilettante philosophical tourist. The interest is heightened by the poem having been written at Rome during the siege. This power of observing and recording actual life grew on Clough, and, had he lived longer, it might have prompted a more complete poem than any he has left behind him. At any rate the series of tales called Mari Magno, clearly suggested by his fondness for Crabbe, and some of them written very closely after Crabbe's manner, indicate that his tendencies were working in that direction. The Clergyman's Second Tale is as finely told as its moral is lofty and powerful. The scene where the penitent husband, meeting in London the woman who had beguiled him from his duty, and whose sinister life has "run full circle," and watching her move away as their sudden interview is broken by some passing stranger, is admirably and most impressively written:—

"He watched them in the gas-lit darkness go,
And a voice said within him, 'Even so';
So midst the gloomy mansions where they dwell
The lost souls walk the flaming streets of hell."

To write on the minor poems would be endless. Those on the inner life all more or less indicate the mental peculiarity of which we have spoken. The poems on "Biblical Subjects," might, we think, just as well have been omitted. But the "Songs in Absence," and several of the reprints from the Ambarvalia, are well worth preserving. Among the former, "Out of sight out of mind" is very charming; and of the earlier pieces, Quæ cursum ventus and "Through a glass darkly," are relics which no reader will soon forget.

It is not difficult to understand how the author of these Remains should have prompted a poem like Thyrsis—worthy companion of Lycidas and Adonais—in a friend like Mr. Matthew Arnold. It must have been written, however, much as Andrea del Sarto may be supposed to have remembered a friend whose workmanship he could often smile at or regret while he revered and loved his spirit. And that is the sum of the impression left by these volumes. Clough was neither great as a poetical artist nor as a man who could furnish sure guidance to the intellect or aid and support to the spirit. But he unswervingly maintained through life that supreme moral standard which is necessary alike for the man of creed and the man of no creed; and in literature he adhered faithfully to the sound and genuine principles of work on which alone true literary progress can be based and for want of loyalty to which many men of greater genius than he have failed.

A DOOMED PEOPLE.

FAR away in the Pacific lies a land under a mysterious curse. Once fair to look upon, and fertile enough to support its thousands in comfort, sterility now marks it for its own, and denies the ever-dwindling population aught but the scantiest sustenance.

The island of Rapanui was discovered by Davis; discovered, and that was all. Thirty-six years afterwards, the Dutch admiral, Roggewein, endeavoring to make Davis's Land, found, as he thought, an unknown island, and unaware that it was the very land he sought, named it Easter Island, because he sighted it upon Easter day. While he was looking for an advantageous harbor, his reconnoitring ship was boarded by one of the natives,—a tall, strong, robust fellow, whose naked body was a very network of painted patterns, and whose prepossessing countenance was spoiled by a pair of ears hanging nearly down to his shoulders. This strange visitor astonished his new acquaintances by throwing the wine they proffered into his eyes instead of putting it to its proper use, but was so much at his ease among them that they found it a difficult matter to get rid of him. When the fleet anchored in the bay, thousands of natives crowded the shore, some lighting fires before their idols, at whose feet they had been seen prostrating themselves at sunrise, while others ran to and fro like so many wild creatures.

Some hundred and fifty Dutchmen landed. Finding the curious crowd pressing rather closely around them, these brave Hollanders, although they could not decry a single armed man in the throng, cleared the way with a discharge of musketry; after which the islanders "became more civilized." Loud wailings and distressful cries told that the volley had carried death with it; but even the murder of their brethren failed to rouse the uncivilized natives to retaliate. They hastened to lay peace-offerings in the shape of nuts, sugar-canes, fowls, and roots before their slaughterers, and carrying palm-branches and red and white flags, in token of amity, acted as pioneers for them. Afterwards, in exchange for some beads, looking-glasses, and painted cloth, they supplied the fleet with five hundred live fowls, plenty of white and red roots, plantains and potatoes, respecting the last of which the chronicler of Roggewein's voyage remarks that they taste "almost like bread, and the Indians use them instead thereof."

The same authority describes the people as being very tall, strong, well made, and remarkably swift of foot; resembling one another more in these qualities than in the color of their skins, which varied from white to red, and from brown to black. The women were decorated with a very bright red paint, some of them wearing red and white garments of a soft silky material, and small straw hats; but, as a rule, the ladies were not burdened with more clothing than modesty.

Men and women alike were notable for long hanging ears, from which depended ear-rings with pendants as large as a man's fist. So far as time gave them the opportunity of judging, the Dutch found the islanders of a very unwarlike disposition, and supposed they relied for protection upon their stone idols, — long-eared giants, — ranged in great numbers along the coast. Several of the natives were observed to be particularly attentive to these grim monsters, and were therefore set down for priests with the greater confidence from the fact of their having shaven crowns, and wearing head-dresses of black and white feathers exactly like the plumage of the stork. The homes of the people were huts from forty to sixty feet long, by six or eight in breadth, formed of poles cemented together with mud, and roofed with palm-leaves. Although a pig seemed to be a familiar animal to the islanders generally, neither pigs nor any other four-footed creatures were seen by the Hollanders during their short stay; but the island was so well wooded and cultivated that they left it unexplored with regret, believing that, if they could have looked for them, they might have found plenty of good things.

The men of the land of dikes are not supposed to be too imaginative, but either Roggwein's followers were exceptions to the rule, or else Easter Island must have gone to the bad at a rapid pace during the succeeding fifty years, for Captain Cook was anything but pleased with it when he visited it in 1774, although he did think he had come to a land of plenty when a couple of natives met the ship half a mile from the shore and flung a bunch of plantains on the deck, — an idea soon dispelled when a landing was effected on the morrow. There was a goodly assemblage awaiting the new-comers, but Roggwein's thousands were represented but by hundreds. After some expressive pantomime on both sides, the natives produced a few potatoes, canes, and plantains, which they were ready to barter for nails, cloths, and the usual articles carried by ships visiting the Pacific islands on trading intent. The Englishmen soon discovered that the Easter Islanders were as expert at thieving and as tricky in their dealings as any people they had yet met. They could scarcely keep their hats upon their heads; and as to effectually guarding their pockets, that was impossible. The things acquired one moment by barter disappeared the next, and sometimes they bought the same things three times over without getting them after all. A very brisk trade was carried on for some time in the potato line, on a plantation close at hand, until the proprietor himself put in an appearance, and stopped further traffic on the part of his light-fingered brethren, by driving them off the land with which they were making so free.

A party despatched to survey the island was aided by a native, whose face was painted white, apparently for the occasion, and who, before starting, fastened a piece of white cloth at the head of a spear, which he carried in advance of the procession. Few signs of fertility gladdened the eyes of the explorers. One portion alone of the island appeared tolerably cultivated, the crops raised consisting of sugar-canes, yams, plantains, and sweet potatoes. Live-stock was scarce, — a few small tame fowls, fewer still wild birds, and some rats, seemingly serving as supplies for the scantily provided tables of the islanders, being all that was seen; while, if there were fish in the sea, they were proof against every effort to lure them out of their element.

Water, even brackish and stinking, was rarely found, and the only well of fresh water was rendered undrinkable to folks at all nice, by reason of the filthy cleanliness of the people, who never went to quench their thirst at the well without also performing their ablutions at the same time by jumping into the middle and giving themselves a thorough washing. Trees were scarcer still than springs; and for lack of wood, vegetable refuse was used to heat the earth-ovens in which the islanders cooked what meat they managed to get, — their only utensils being gourds and cocoa-nut shells, the lucky possessors of the last-named considering themselves rich indeed. No wonder the famous circumnavigator was disgusted with the place, and voted it best avoided, as containing no safe anchorage, no wood, for fuel, nor any fresh water worth taking on board. He estimated the population at this time at seven hundred, two thirds being males, — explaining the sexual discrepancy by supposing that many women might have been restrained from showing themselves: an explanation that somewhat invalidates his rough census. If Roggwein's account was correct, the islanders had not only marvellously decreased in their numbers, but also dwindled very much in stature, for, instead of being a race of giants, there was not a single six-footer among them. In other respects, that is, as regards their peaceable dispositions, agreeable features, and active natures, both Hollander and Englishman are agreed. The latter found the dwelling-places of these amiable savages mere miserable huts, constructed by setting poles upright in the ground, six or eight feet apart, then bending them towards each other, and tying the tops together; the domicile being made comparatively high and broad in the middle, and lowering and narrowing towards each end. Poles laid across, and covered with leaves, formed the roof; while entrance was effected by a low, porch-fashioned doorway, just admitting the householder to pass through on all-fours.

The eastern coast of the island was notable for the number of its giant statues, or rather busts; some standing in groups on platforms of masonry, beautifully joined, but uncemented; others, generally the larger ones, placed singly in the earth. One was found to be twenty-seven feet high, and eight feet across the chest: but this was not the largest, for the shadow of another afforded shade for thirty men. Most noticeable among these mysterious relics of a bygone time, and probably of an extinct race, were three platforms of stone, once supporting half a dozen figures each; two were empty, and the third only boasted two figures. The workmanship of these was very rude, but the features were pretty well formed, except that the ears were long beyond all proportion, — but then so were the ears of the men around, although they were so nicely wrapped up by means of the gristles being removed, that they appeared like small "flatted chitterlings," until they were unfolded, when they measured five inches and a half in length. Cook saw nothing to justify the idea that the statues represented the gods of the land; he took them to be monuments marking the burial-places of certain families or tribes. As regards his unfavorable picture of Easter Island, we must note that a fellow-voyager, who saw with other eyes, describes the country as highly cultivated, and interspersed with evergreen and fruit-bearing shrubs, presenting the most beautiful prospect that fancy could conceive.

The ill-fated Frenchman, La Perouse, who visited Easter Island in 1785, attributes Cook's evil report to his having arrived there after a tedious voyage eaten up with scurvy, and in want of everything. He considered the Easter Islanders numbered at the least two thousand souls, for while he saw some twelve hundred, his coadjutor, M. De Langle found the interior well peopled, plenty of women and children about, and house-building going on to such an extent as showed the people themselves believed they were increasing and multiplying. Scarcely a tenth part of the land was under cultivation while what was cultivated was fertile enough for La Perouse to be persuaded that three days' labor was sufficient to provide a native with food for twelve months, and that the islanders were quite as well off as their neighbors, except, perhaps, that they suffered more inconvenience from drought, — the bequest of their tree-destroying ancestors; but then they could drink sea-water like the albatross of Cape Horn. Trees they had, however, in the shape of a few paper-mulberry trees, but these they had to shelter from the winds by building walls round them. The captain found no trace of any religious worship among the people at all. Their houses seemed to be in common, and no individual appeared to have the authority of a husband over any one woman; at any rate, he observes, "if women are individual property, their masters are very prodigal of their rights." Some of them lived in subterranean dwellings, and some in houses constructed of rushes on a base of solid lava.

At the southernmost extremity of the island the explorers came upon the crater of an extinct volcano, of eight hundred feet in depth. Father Receveur descended into it, and reported that the marsh was surrounded by fine plantations of mulberries and bananas; and that there had been a considerable falling away of the land on the sea side, causing a great breach in the crater; while the grass on the sides of the cone, the marsh at its base, and the fertility of the adjacent land, told that the volcano had been extinct for a long period. At the bottom of the crater were found some water-swallows, the only birds they saw during their perambulation. La Perouse examined the statuary minutely, and discovered that they were cut out of a friable, light, porous lava. On several of the platform stones were rude sketches of skeletons, and human bones were seen in the neighborhood both of the statues and of sundry pyramids of stones arranged like cannon-balls in a park of artillery. Near one of the figures was found a curious effigy, made of reeds, representing a man ten feet high, with a head of the natural size, a thin body, and proportionable legs; by its side was the figure of a child with arms crossed and legs hanging down. La Perouse was very well satisfied with what he saw of Easter Island and its inhabitants, and did something towards improving the condition of the latter, by leaving them some goats, sheep, and pigs, and planting oranges, lemons, cotton, cabbages, carrots, maize, and anything he thought likely to thrive in the place.

Could La Perouse, whose own fate is a mystery, see Easter Island now, he would scarcely recognize it. The stone monsters still indeed are there, silent remembrancers of the good old times of Rapanui, but Rapanui itself is little better than a great rock. Where pleasant meadows once gladdened the sight, salt marshes mock the eyes of hungry men. Not a tree now exists. Birds, always few, have become such rarities, that a sea-bird's egg is looked upon as a godsend. If the fish have not deserted the coasts, the people cannot catch them; not a boat, raft, or canoe, do they own, for they have no timber whereof to build them. The pigs and goats have long since vanished; the fowls bid fair soon to become as extinct. The natives themselves have learned industry and honesty from the missionaries, but have small scope for the exercise of either virtue. Within the last few years, their numbers have decreased one half, still the land that once supported three thousand inhabitants refuses a subsistence to eight hundred, and where one is born, three die. War has not desolated the island, fire-water has not decimated its people. Some have been kidnapped, and after a slavery under the Peruvian guano-owners, returned only to introduce disease among their countrymen, who needed no such infliction to thin their numbers. In fact, the race is being swiftly and surely starved off the face of the earth; there is no hope for them in the future, which is dreary and desolate as the island itself. It is a sad thing to contemplate, this inevitable perishing of a patient, harmless people, a people with no enemies, but lacking likewise friends able and willing to rescue them from their deplorable fate. Only one thing can save them, — emigration from the cruel land they call their own.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE Queen has presented to the Royal Academy the bust of herself executed by the Princess Louise.

M. EDMOND ABOUT has made an opera libretto out of his "Le Roi des Montagnes," the music to which will be written by M. Léo Delibes.

THE rumor that Mr. Swinburne is engaged on an article on the Byron question for the Fortnightly Review is contradicted in the London Morning Star.

A VERSION of Sir Walter Scott's "Old Mortality" has been produced at Sadler's Wells, London. Even Baxter's Saints' Rest will ultimately be seized upon by the dramatist of the period.

THE Countess de Flandres is engaged in designing some pictures illustrative of the Count de Maistre's work, "Voyage autour de ma Chambre." Royal artistes are abundant nowadays, but this is the first instance of a princess displaying her abilities as an engraver.

SPEAKING of Lady Palmerston's death, the Pall Mall Gazette says: "Society is not generally credited with possession of a heart, but the sorrow with which the intelligence of her death will be received will probably be as sincere as the affectionate regard with which she will long be remembered."

THE Indépendance Belge says: For some time different journals have been busying themselves with some pertinacity with the question of the regency, and not only has the Emperor's recovery not put an end to their discussions on this delicate subject, but their polemics assume a sharper and more personal character. The Opinion Nationale first raised the question by giving currency to the idea that the dynasty would have a better chance of permanence, in case of need, under the regency of Prince Napoleon than under the Empress. The Figaro immediately took the part of the Empress; and now the Public takes up the same cause with a bitterness of language and a richness of sarcasm towards Prince Napoleon which manifest considerable irritation in the spheres whence this journal derives its inspiration, — that is to say, the coterie of which the centre is M. Rouher, who has always enjoyed in a high degree the sympathies of the Empress, and who has in no degree lost the confidence of the sovereign since he has been only President of the Senate. M. Rouher makes no scruple to accuse Prince Napoleon almost directly of a design to lay hands on the crown, under the title of Napoleon IV.

A MAN has been arrested in Paris on the charge of having forged the letters alleged to have been written by Newton and Pascal, the "discovery" of which caused so much sensation a short time back. That the letters were spurious was sufficiently proved by the fact that passages in them are copied from works known to have been written many years after the alleged date. M. Chestes, a member of the Academy of Sciences, who gave sufficient proof of his belief in the genuineness of the documents by giving £ 6,000 for them, has at last been convinced of his error, and has applied for a warrant against the man from whom he obtained them, who turns out to have been a constant student of the handwriting of Pascal and Galileo in the Imperial library.

A UKASE has been issued at St. Petersburg reducing the term of military service from seven years to five in the case of young men under twenty who enter the army as volunteers. A further reduction of a year's service is promised as a reward for good conduct. This regulation is to be followed by another restricting marriages in the army. Hitherto soldiers were encouraged to marry in order to induce them to make the army their home, and their wives and children were maintained by the Government. This practice is now regarded as too expensive and not desirable even from a purely military point of view, as the movement to the troops from place to place has been greatly encumbered by their taking so many women and children with them. It is found that the number of soldiers' marriages has considerably diminished since the introduction four years ago of the present system of short military service. In 1860 four soldiers out of ten were married, whereas the proportion now is four out of seventeen.

THE London Publishers' Circular of September the 15th says:—

"Those curiosities of literature which have their Bluebeard cupboard and special Chamber of Horrors have during the past fortnight taken possession of the public mind with regard to the Byron controversy. Not only do we hear of two or three new volumes,—Mr. Alfred Austin, the author of The Season, a satire, announces a Vindication of Lord Byron,—but various well-known authors, Mr. Howitt, Mr. Arnold, and Lord Lyndsay, have severally come forward with vindications which must make the ghost of Lord Byron cry out 'Save me from my friends!' For much that these gentlemen do—and the nobleman exceeds both—is to cover his Lordship with the blackest character that any man ever wore, and to urge that because he had, to use his own phrase, 'cracked the ten commandments' in every possible direction, this particular crack did not belong to him. Farther than this Lord Lyndsay has done; he has by an undesigned coincidence proved two several and important incidents in Mrs. Stowe's narrative, and that Lady Byron, in 1816, writing to the amiable Lady Anne Barnard, author of 'Auld Robin Gray,' was fully persuaded that she held over her husband's head the proof of a crime which could at any time, if made public, vindicate her conduct to the utmost. This is absolutely to prove what has been urged. Moreover, it comes out very strongly in Lord Lyndsay's letter that Messrs. Wharton, and Fords, the solicitors, do hold evidence which does not contradict Mrs. Stowe, and that they, the solicitors, do not and are not empowered to contradict the story; and it is proved in other places that Sir Samuel Romilly and Mr. (now Dr.) Lushington were supplied with proof of a crime which at once turned their advice from that of urging an immediate reconviction to that of saying, in the words of the latter, 'that he could never consistently with his duty to God and man advise a reconciliation.' To sum up in the words of the Saturday Review: 'Dr. Lushington might fairly say that what he was told in 1816 is not the tale which Mrs. Stowe told in 1869.' This is just what Dr. Lushington has not done, therefore Q. E. D.?

"But if anything could prove how unreasoning the public is, and we include America as well as England, it is, the outcry which has arisen from both shores against Mrs. Stowe for doing, as we believe she conceived it to be, an act of duty. The story—a vicious one, if you like—interrupted the English public in discussing a very vicious and, if truth must be said, from what we hear, a very stupid, dull play, Formosa. America was doing nobler duty in digesting the boat race; and all honor to her for her excellent report and most fair criticism on that event. All at once this attack on Byron interrupts them, and Britannia and Columbia fall foul of Mrs. Stowe like a couple of fish-fags. The worst blow comes from America, or rather from an American in Paris, who writes a cowardly letter attacking most cruelly and untruly the whole family of the Beechers and the Stowes. We hear privately that this American is a Southerner, and that his name is not too sweet to Northern ears. The initials given us are F. W.—can they belong to Fernando Wood? But what does this gentleman with his English abettors intend to do? All that they have done is to follow out to the letter the instructions of the well-known counsel, 'No case; blackguard the plaintiff's attorney.' Let us presume that all they say is as true as it is false, and that Mrs. Stowe, instead of being a woman of genius, as good and pure as she is earnest and clever, is not to be generally believed; that does not make a particular story false. Disprove that, and the whole matter falls, but until you disprove it it stands. In short, to sum up, we must agree, we are afraid, with the Spectator, that the air of surprise and fiery indignation with which they—the press and public—have received the fact that Byron—a bold, bad man, who on his own showing revelled in sin, and who took delight in picturing himself as linked with one virtue and a thousand crimes—should be supposed guilty of one crime which he probably sought out as a curiosity, 'betrays the radically superficial judgment which they'—the public and the press,—entertain of Byron and of sin, and even of life itself. We may here mention that the admirable review of Macmillan's article in the Times, in which Lady Byron and the whole matter were so finely treated, was written by one whose fate is as sad as her genius is brilliant,—by the Hon. Mrs. Norton."

OUTSIDERS OF SOCIETY AND THEIR HOMES IN LONDON.

WHENEVER I looked up from my newspaper I met the eye of a middle-aged gentleman who was sitting in the same box, — a box, I should mention, in the coffee-room of an old-fashioned hotel in London, which is partitioned off in primitive style. I say gentleman advisedly, for the stranger had every apparent claim to be so called. For the rest there was little to distinguish him from the crowd of well-dressed and well-mannered persons whom one meets about in public places. He might be a clergyman, or a lawyer, or a doctor, though I should doubt his being an active member of either profession. He gave you the idea of a man retired from any pursuit in which he might have been engaged, and to be occupied rather in killing time than in inviting time to kill him. He had a healthy, happy-looking face, bearing no traces of hard work or deep thought, and his hair was only partially gray. He had a mild eye, and a mild voice, and a mild manner, — I noticed the two latter qualities through his intercourse with the waiter, — and was so suave in his ways as to be polite even to the port that he was drinking after an early dinner. He handled his decanter in a caressing manner such as he might adopt towards a favorite niece, and took up his wine-glass as gently as if it were a child.

Whenever I met his eye I noticed that it gave me a kind of recognizing look, which, however, was not sustained: for, before he had thoroughly attracted my attention he always returned to the illustrated journal before him, as if suddenly determined to master some abstruse subject with a great deal of solution in the way of wood-cuts. His communicative appearance made me think that I had met him before, but it did not occur to me where, so I took no further notice. Presently he spoke, but he only said, —

"I beg your pardon, sir."

There was nothing to beg my pardon about, so I begged his, not to be outdone in gratuitous courtesy. Then he begged mine again, adding, —

"I thought you made a remark, — I did not quite hear."

No, I said; I had not made any remark. Then we both bowed and smiled, and resumed our reading, — the stranger with some little confusion I thought.

After a time he made a remark himself.

"I should not have intruded," said he, "but I thought I had met you before."

I am not one of those persons who think that every stranger who addresses them in a public-room means to pick their pockets, but I have a proper prejudice against being bored, and in any case I had no resource but to answer as I did, to the effect that I could not recall the when and the where.

"Were you ever in Vancouver's Island?" the stranger asked.

In the cause of truth I was obliged to declare a negative.

"Then it could not have been there," said he, musingly; "but," he added, "you might have known Colonel Jacko, — a relation of mine, — who was governor of the Island. You remind me of him, — that is why I ask."

I did not quite see the connection between knowing a man and bearing a personal resemblance to him, but in disavowing any acquaintance with Colonel Jacko, I did so with all courtesy.

"You have been probably in New Zealand?" pursued the stranger, warming apparently into considerable interest in the question involved, "if so, you must have known Major-General Mango, who commanded there in 18—"

I was obliged to confess my ignorance of the unfortunate colony in question, and of the distinguished officer alluded to.

"I merely asked," continued the stranger with a desponding air, "as he was a relation of mine."

I had nothing to do with his relatives any more than himself, but his manner was so gentle that I could not think it intentionally obtrusive, so I acknowledged the receipt of the information as pleasantly as possible.

"If you had been in India," he pursued, taking it for granted apparently that I was no traveller, "you would probably have met one of my sons. One is in the civil, the other in the military service. Both fine fellows. The elder was political agent at Tulwarpatam at the time when the Rajah was so aggressive, and it was through his influence that his highness was induced to remit the Abkaree duties and give up his claim to the contested Jaghires. The other was through the mutinies, and was wounded both at Delhi and Lucknow, — curious coincidence, was it not?"

I admitted that his sons seemed to have done the State some service, and remarked upon the coincidence as one of those mysterious dispensations of Providence for which it is impossible to account. And that was all I could do towards the conversation, which dropped at this point.

Presently the stranger took his hat, with an undecided but ultimately effectual movement. Then he called the waiter, and had a little conversation with that functionary about the port, which he said was not quite the same that he used to have in the year 1835. (I strongly suspect, by the way, that he was right in this supposition, as the wine he had been drinking belonged probably to the celebrated vintage of 1869.) At last he made a movement to depart, and ultimately did depart, but only after a great deal of delay; and even when in actual motion across the room he looked back more than once, as if expecting somebody to ask him to remain.

When the waiter came to clear away the abandoned decanter and glass, I asked him if he knew the gentleman who had just gone out.

"Yes, sir," was the reply; "we have known the gentleman for some years, though he does not come very often. He lives by himself somewhere in town, and has no relations except some who are abroad. He says he has no friends, too, as he has lost a great deal of money, and cannot keep the society he did. He does not seem to know anybody who comes here, though he talks to some now and then, as he has to you."

I was sorry not to have heard this before, that I might have treated the stranger with a little more attention. For this glimpse I had of him, and the few hints given me by the waiter, were sufficient to assure me that he belonged to a class who are more perhaps to be pitied than the merely poor; that he is in the world, but is not of it, and has a residence, but is without a home; that he is, in fact, an Outsider of Society.

People engaged in active pursuits — whether in spending or making money — are not likely to be troubled by deprivations of the kind referred to. They live among their peers, with whom they have interests in common. They are as important to others, as others are important to them. They are in the stream of pleasure or business as the case may be. There is no danger that they will be forgotten. Their doors are besieged by visitors, drawn by diverse attractions; so that it is necessary to make a vigorous classification of the latter, not only of the usual social character, but distinguishing those who come to oblige the master of the house from those who come to oblige themselves. Their tables are covered with cards and letters, prospectuses, tradesmen's circulars, begging petitions, newspapers they have never ordered, and books that it is thought they may possibly want. Their vote and interest is always being requested for deserving individuals, and their subscriptions for equally deserving institutions. Chance of being forgotten indeed! So long as they can be made useful there is as much chance of the Bank of England being forgotten. Such men may be alone, sometimes, in one sense of the term. That is to say, their relations may be scattered or dead. But that is of very little practical moment in their case. They can always find people prepared to be second fathers or brothers to them, and even second mothers and sisters, it may be. They can always marry, too, and then a home establishes itself as a matter of course.

But there are — who shall say how many? — people living in London who live almost alone; who have no society except of a casual, and what may be called an anonymous kind; and whose homes are merely places where they may obtain shelter and rest. I am not here alluding to the class who are social and domestic outlaws because they are positively poor. There is no anomaly in this condition of life; it is a natural consequence of having no money. The people I mean have mostly money enough for themselves, but not sufficient to make them important to others, and obtain for them consideration in the world. Sometimes their positions have changed; sometimes things have changed around them and left their positions as they were, the result being much the same. It may be that they are seeking to make a little more money by such employments as agencies, secretaryships, and so forth, — employments the most difficult of all to get, as any man of moderate education and abilities can do the duties, — but most frequently they are content to vegetate upon what they have, and to concentrate themselves upon the attainment of companionship and home. When one of the active men whom I have mentioned goes away from home, the Post Office establishment is ruthlessly disturbed by mandates for the readdressing and forwarding of letters. The migration of one of our passive friends makes no difference to anybody. Except it be an occasional communication from a relation in a distant colony, sent to the care of an agent, he has no letters to trouble him, and if he did not occasionally make a show of existence by asserting himself in pen and ink, he might perish out of the memory of man. To such people the advertising columns of the newspapers must possess peculiar interest; for a large number of the announcements seem expressly intended to meet their requirements, while, on the other hand, an equal number of the specified "Wants" seem to come from their class.

Homes for special purposes appear to be plentiful enough. You cannot take up a newspaper without having your attention called to a dozen or two. Apart from the "Home for Lost and Starving Dogs," — which is an establishment not applying, except by sympathy, to any class of my readers, — we have such charities as the "Convalescent Home," established by the wife of the Premier. In the next column we are sure to be reminded of the "Home for Little Boys," in addition to which has just been appropriately projected a "Home for Little Girls," — not the least desirable object of the two. An individual speculator has also established what he rather invidiously calls an "Epileptic Home for the Sons of Gentlemen," — there being, it is to be presumed, genteel as well as vulgar forms of the malady in question. "Educational Homes" for youth of both sexes abound in newspaper announcements. They may afford very good opportunities for the intended purpose, but I should prefer placing my trust in establishments which are candidly called schools. Not long since I saw an advertisement in a morning paper which ran, as nearly as I can remember, in these terms: —

"A clergyman in a popular parish by the seaside, offers an Educational Home to a few little boys of good principles, the sons of gentlemen. Apply," &c.

Now, without desiring to be harsh to the advertiser, I must take leave to say that the above contains several important errors in taste. It would have been just as well, and a great deal better, perhaps, had the clergyman refrained from mentioning the popularity of his parish, however much the description might be deserved. His specification of little boys "of good principles" suggests a slur upon little boys in general which does not come well from an educator of youth; and one would think that he would be more usefully engaged in taking in hand little boys of bad principles, if any such exist. But the inference next suggested is even less creditable to the reverend advertiser. It is of no use, it seems, for little boys to have good principles, as far as he is concerned, unless they be the sons of gentlemen. This is sad.

But the mention of homes of a special character — of which there are many more in London than have been enumerated — is only incidental to my present purpose. I especially allude to lonely people who seek society, and to which society, in a certain limited degree, seems continually offering to sell itself. And among lonely people, as far as homes are concerned, must be included "persons engaged in the City," or "engaged during the day," who are frequently appealed to by advertisers. The number of persons — idle or occupied — who want homes seem to be equalled only by the number of persons who are prepared to offer them, with very small pecuniary temptation. I have always thought that a great deal of self-sacrifice must be necessary in the case of the family of a dancing-master who for years past has been advertising his lessons with the addition that "the Misses X—— will officiate as partners." The Misses X—— must surely be tired by this time of dancing with people who drop them directly they are able to dance. But it must be still more sad to take into your family any chance stranger who may seem sufficiently respectable, board him, and lodge him, and promise to be "cheerful" and "musical" for his amusement. But offers of this kind are plentiful enough, and they would not be made were there not a fair supply of people to embrace them.

Looking back at only one daily paper for only a week or ten days may be found a host of advertisements of both classes; and I will first allude to a few of these among the "Wants."

Here is a specimen:—

"Home wanted by a respectable elderly lady — rather invalid, not helpless — in a sociable family; meals with it understood. Children objectionable. Large bedroom (not top) facing east or south indispensable. Aspect important. Forty guineas. Must be west of Holborn: other localities useless. Letters," &c.

It would be difficult to determine the exact state of this respectable elderly lady's health from the above description, there being a rather long range between the affirmative and the suggestions offered by the negative statement; but even though she be in a high state of agility, the conditions are surely rather complex; and there must be families in which forty guineas a year go a great way, if she has any chance of gratifying her wishes.

Another elderly lady is more explicit, if not quite grammatical. She describes herself as "an invalid from rheumatism," and her desire is "to board with a genteel, cheerful family." Here again there must be "no children." She prefers "the neighborhood of St. John's Wood, near the Park, or an equal distance from the West End." Letters must be prepaid.

The following looks like a case in which society is an object:—

"Board and residence wanted, by a widow lady and a young lady, and partial board for a young gentleman, within three miles north of London, near a station. Children objected to. [Poor children!] Three bedrooms indispensable. Preference given to a musical family, where there is a daughter who would be companionable." Terms, it is added, "must be moderate."

The following has not a pleasant sound:—

"Wanted, a comfortable home for a female aged seventy years, where there are no children [children again]. She must be treated with great firmness. Twelve shillings will be paid weekly for board, lodging, and washing. Surrey side preferred," &c.

It is evident that the above offer has not been made by the person for whom the accommodation is sought. But such requirements, including even the "great firmness" doubtless get supplied. One of the numerous advertisers who provide homes for invalid ladies offers, I observe, to give "reference to the relatives of a lady lately deceased," who lived in the house for seven years.

Here is a "home," of remarkable character: it is described as situated in a favorite suburb on the Metropolitan Railway, replete with every beauty and convenience, the details being specially enumerated; and besides the railway, omnibuses pass the door to all parts of town. "The advertiser," it is added, "would prefer one or two City gentlemen of convivial disposition, and to such liberal terms would be offered."

The advertiser has evidently an abstract love for City gentlemen of convivial disposition, since he is prepared to share his home with any one or two of them. And if a City gentleman of convivial disposition could make a vast wilderness dear, — which it is very possible he could do, — one can fancy what a paradise he would make of this Cashmere at Shepherd's Bush. It is not quite clear, indeed, that the advertiser is not prepared to pay instead of being paid by the charming society he seeks, since he says that "to such liberal terms will be offered." It must be a very delightful thing to be a City gentleman of convivial disposition, with the feeling of having unknown friends, which has been said to resemble our ideas of the existence of angels.

Another proffered "home" is described as having, in addition to all domestic comforts, "two pianos, with young and musical society." This may be very pleasant; but I should feel some misgivings at the prospect of making one of a "young and musical society" let loose upon two pianos at the same time. There are different opinions, too, even about the best music, under different conditions. The Irish soldier who was singing the "Last Rose of Summer," perhaps from the bottom of his heart, but certainly at the top of his voice, was told by his English comrade to hold his noise. "And he calls Moore's Melodies a noise," said the musical enthusiast disgusted at the want of taste exhibited by the cold-blooded Saxon.

A cheerful state of existence is suggested by another advertisement of a "home":—

"Partial board is offered to a gentleman by a cheerful, musical, private family. Early breakfast; meat tea. Dinner on Sundays. Gas, piano, croquet. Terms £1 1s. per week. Write," &c.

The board must be partial indeed if that melancholy meal known as a "meat tea" enters into the arrangement. A "meat tea" would in any case mean that you were expected to go without your dinner, since, if you had dined you would not want meat with your bohea. But there is no disguise about the matter here, for you are frankly told that there will be dinner, as distinguished from a meat tea, on Sundays. It is a monstrous, unnatural idea, and the family must be very cheerful, very musical, and very private, I should think, to reconcile most men to such a state of things. Perhaps the piano and the croquet are intended as a set-off, by suggesting female society of an accomplished kind; and of course there are some girls for whom some men will submit to meat teas; but I have my own opinion as to the chances of either one or the other.

Here is an advertisement of a "home" couched in popular terms. It would be a pity to interfere with the writer's style, so I give it in full, with the omission, of course, of the address:—

"A lady having a larger house than she requires is desirous of increasing her circle by receiving a few gentlemen (who are engaged during the day) as boarders. The society is cheerful and musical. To foreigners anxious to acquire elegant English, this is a good opportunity."

As for the lady having a larger house than she requires, one can fancy that to be the case if she has room for several gentlemen, but how is it that so many persons get into larger houses than they require, and are thereby impelled to offer similar accommodation? It must be confessed, too, that the opportunity for foreigners to acquire elegant English is not very apparent. Are the candidates for residence examined in elegant English before they are admitted into the family? As for the cheerfulness and the music, those are of course matters of taste.

Among other "homes" which we find offered in the same paper is one with a curious recommendation attached. It has "just been vacated," we are told, "by a young gentleman who has successfully passed his examination." If the same advantage can be secured to the incoming tenant the accommodation would be decidedly cheap, for the modest sum of thirteen shillings a week, which is all that is asked. But we are not told what is the nature of the examination,—for the army, the Civil Service, a degree, or what? Perhaps it is only in the "elegant English" intended to qualify the tenant for the higher social sphere of the lady with the partially superfluous house.

Invalid or "mentally afflicted" persons are always in great request among advertisers. Several applications are before me now. One of these comes from "A medical man, residing in a large and well-furnished house in one of the healthiest and most convenient out-districts of London," who "wishes to receive any patient mentally or otherwise afflicted, as a resident; boarding or separate arrangement as desired; a married couple, or two sisters, or friends, not objected to." The contingency of companions in misfortune is a good deal; our medical friend is evidently a far-sighted man. Then we find the wife of a medical man, who is willing to take charge of "an afflicted (not insane) lady, gentleman, or child,—to whom she offers a comfortable home with experienced care." A similar offer is made by the occupant of a farmhouse, but these do not draw the line at insanity, but declare that they have had the care of an insane patient for many years, and can be highly recommended in consequence. Some people indeed are so fond of taking care of insane patients that they would not have a sane one if you made them a present of him.

An illustration of this curious taste came under my notice not long since. A very deserving man called to see a patron of his who had procured him a post of the kind, which he had held for several months. "I am very glad to see you, John," was the greeting, "and hope you are getting on in your employment." "Ah, that indeed I am, sir," was the answer: "thanks to you, I am most comfortably provided for,—in fact, I was never so happy in my life. How did I get these two black eyes, sir? O, he gave them to me yesterday morning. O, yes, I shall always be grateful,—I never was so happy in my life."

It must be admitted that the majority of the "homes" which people offer one another through the medium of the papers are not exposed to contingencies of this kind; but the said people must surely run the risk of finding themselves ill-assorted in no ordinary degree.

It is not to be supposed indeed that utter strangers would go and live together without some strong inducements; and these inducements are generally money on the one side and society on the other. The people who want the money—through having "larger houses than they require," or other causes, of which any number may be found with great facility,—are less to be pitied than the people who want the society, for the latter must be dismally reduced in this respect before they can be brought to take it on chance. In a "cheerful family, musically inclined," part of the compact of course is that the incomer shall be cheerful if not musical and companionable, at any rate. The requisition sounds awful, but it is one to which hundreds of harmless persons in this metropolis submit rather than be left alone. Many, of course, are induced by considerations of economy; and of those still more unfortunate than the ordinary class, are those of the more helpless, who do not accept a "home," upon independent terms, but obtain it either gratuitously or for some very small payment upon condition of being useful or helping to make things pleasant.

Of these there are large numbers, to judge by the advertisements; and I suspect that they are rather worse off than those who "go out" regularly as governesses and companions, for the latter have at least a chance of lighting upon rich and generous patrons. And here I may mention that a great deal of nonsense is written about governesses,—more, perhaps, than about most other things. Their trade is a bad one, no doubt, because the market is overstocked. But that is no fault of the employers, who cannot be expected to fill their houses with young ladies of varying tastes and tempers, on account of their presumably "superior" education and intelligence. Nor is it to be taken for granted that every governess is of the "superior" kind, and all the people who engage their services, vulgar wretches who delight in inflicting mortification upon their betters. Who has not heard of families of the best breeding and refinement being tortured beyond all endurance by governesses of conspicuous inability to teach, who have let their pupils run wild, and concentrated their attention upon the men of the house, and whose insolent and overbearing ways have made the work of getting rid of them one of no common difficulty? Our novelists have not given us many illustrations of this side of the picture; but you may depend upon it that Becky Sharpes are at least as plentiful as Jane Eyres in real life.

A favorite resort of the homeless are boarding-houses. Of these establishments there are hundreds in London,—from those devoted to the entertainment of minor City clerks, rigorously "engaged during the day," to those which— one is almost led to suppose—nobody under the rank of a baronet is received, and even then not without a reference as to respectability on the part of a peer. But most of these houses have one or two features in common. There is always a large admixture of people who go there for the sake of society; and of this number a considerable proportion is sure to consist of widows or spinsters of extremely marriageable tendencies. The result is that, unless the residents be very numerous, individual freedom is lost, and, instead of living an independent life, as at an hotel, the members of a "circle" find themselves surrounded by such amenities as may be supposed to belong to a rather large and singularly disunited family.

A great many marriages, however, are made in these establishments, and it is not on record that they turn out otherwise than well. It must be admitted, too, that men go there to find wives as well as women to find husbands, so that the arrangement thus far is fair on both sides. But I have been informed by men who are not among the latter number, that it is found difficult sometimes to get the fact generally understood. The consequent mistakes, of course, lead to confusion, and the result is the occasional retirement of determined bachelors into more private life.

There are "homes" in London where there is not much mention of marriage, except as a reminiscence, and few of their members have the chance even of this melancholy enjoyment. I allude to houses in which, through the exertions principally of benevolent ladies, other ladies, who would probably be equally benevolent were they not less fortunate, have a residence assigned to them upon advantageous terms. That is to say, they live in an establishment where all their wants are supplied upon the payment, by themselves or their friends, of a small contribution towards the necessary outlay, the remainder being covered by subscriptions of a strictly private character. The recipients of this assistance are all gentlewomen, — as is necessary to the state of social equality in which they live, — and their admittance is obtained by favor of the benevolent ladies in question. These ladies are influenced, I suppose, by the introductions brought by the candidates, and considerations of their previous position, — which has in every case been a great deal superior to their present position, as may be supposed. The said "homes" are very few in number, as far as I know, they have no connection with one another, and they are entirely private in their arrangements. The neighbors may happen to know that a certain house in which they find so many ladies living together is not a boarding-house in the ordinary acceptance of the term. But there is nothing to proclaim the fact, and the inmates live in an apparent state of independence equal to that of anybody about them. And they live as contented, I believe, as can be in the case of persons who are not of such social importance as they were, and who have plenty of leisure to talk over the fact. They are all gentlewomen, as I have said, and upon terms of social equality; but it may be supposed that there are differences between them, as there are between people generally in society. You may depend upon it, that the lady who is related to an earl is of opinion that she is a preferable object of consideration to the lady who is related only to a baronet, while the claims of the other ladies to their several degrees of precedence are not unadjusted for want of accurate investigation. A few very likely "give themselves airs" upon this score; while some pride themselves upon their beauty when young, — none of the ladies are quite young now, — and others establish a superiority upon account of their mental gifts. All this imparts a pleasant variety to the conversation, which would otherwise be in danger of falling into monotony. Such at least I suppose to be the case, for I am dealing in generalities, and cannot claim to a knowledge of any one in particular of these ladies' homes. For the rest the occupants are said to pass an easy, agreeable life, more especially those who are not without friends whom they can go to visit, — in which case they are free to have as much amusement as if they lived in houses of their own.

I said something about boarding-houses just now. A great many of the homeless who have not tried these establishments, — or having tried them are unwilling to renew the experiment, — live in furnished lodgings. On the Continent they would probably put up at hotels; but hotels in this country are not adapted for modest requirements, and furnished lodgings take a place which they have not yet learned to occupy.

The mode of life is anomalous. It is neither public nor private. You may be independent in a hotel; you may be independent in your own house; in lodgings you can be independent by no possibility. If you spend rather more money than you would either in a hotel or your own house, you obtain comfort and attention; but the object of most persons who take lodgings is to be rather economical than otherwise, so that the reservation is of very little avail. Lodgings are of two classes, — those that profess to be so, and those that solemnly declare they are not. The former are decidedly preferable, apart from the immorality of encouraging a sham. In the former case, if you occupy — say as a bachelor — only a couple of rooms in town, and the rest of the house is let to other people, you will obtain but precarious attendance from the solitary servant, and the chances are that you will never be able to get a decently cooked meal. The food that they waste in such places by their barbarous mode of dealing with it is sad to think upon. Your only resource is to live out of doors as much as possible, and consider your rooms only as a refuge, — the logical consequence of which is that it is best to abandon them altogether.

But you are better placed even under these conditions than if you go to a house in one of the suburbs — a pretty villa-looking place — knowing nothing about it beyond the information offered by the bill in the window. A not very clean servant opens the door, and does not impress you favorably at first glance. You are hesitating under some discouragement, when the mistress of the house — presenting in her decorated exterior a considerable contrast to the servant — appears upon the scene and reproves the domestic sternly for her neglected appearance, sends her away to restore it, and meantime proceeds to transact business upon her own account. You ask her if she lets apartments. She gives a reproving look, and says "No," ignoring the announcement made by the bill. You mention that you knocked in consequence of seeing that intimation in the window; upon which the lady says, —

"O, is it up? I was not aware. The fact is, I wish to receive a gentleman to occupy part of the house, as it is too large for us," — the old story, — "and my husband being a great deal out, I find it rather lonely. But my husband is very proud and objects to having strange company."

You remark that you need not have applied in that case, and will go elsewhere. This brings the lady to the point.

"O, I did not mean to say that you could not have any apartments here. I intend to have my own way in that matter,"—this is said in a playful, fluttery manner, with a running laugh. "If you will step in, I will show you the accommodation we have. All I meant to say was that we are not accustomed to let lodgings."

Rather amused than annoyed, you submit to be shown the rooms. They are pretty rooms,—light and cheerful, and ornamental to a fault,—and the garden at the back is alone a relief from the pent-up place you have been occupying in town. So, after a few preliminary negotiations,—conducted on the lady's side in the same playful manner,—you agree to take the place, say for three months. The lady is evidently pleased at your decision, and avails herself of the opportunity for renewing her assurance that the house is not a lodging-house, and that you may expect all the comforts of domestic life.

"There are no other lodgers," she added; then, as if suddenly recollecting, she corrects herself: "That is to say, there is a commercial gentleman who is a great deal away, sleeping here for a night or two,—a friend of my husband's,—and yes, let me see, a medical gentleman to whom we have allowed the partial use of a bedroom to oblige a neighbor just for the present, but I do not count either of them as lodgers."

A commercial gentleman sleeping for a night or two, while he is a great deal away, does not seem an ordinary lodger at any rate; and from the distinction drawn in the case of the medical gentleman, who is only allowed the partial use of a bedroom, you are inclined to think that he is permitted to lie down, but not to go to sleep. However, you make no objection to these anomalies, and take possession of your new abode.

There never was such an imposture, as you find out only next day. The bagman and the medical student—as those gentlemen must be described, if the naked truth be respected—turn out to be regular lodgers, and as thorough nuisances as a couple of noisy men addicted to late hours and exaggerated conviviality can well be. And the woman never mentioned a discharged policeman—her father, I believe—to whom she affords a temporary asylum in the kitchen, in return for intermittent attentions in the way of blacking boots and cleaning knives,—when he happens to be sober. For the rest, there is nobody in the house who can cook even such a simple matter as a mutton-chop without spoiling it; and there seems to be everybody in the house who is determined that your private stores shall not be allowed to spoil for want of eating and drinking. Nothing is safe from the enemy, who combine their forces against you, and they take care that you shall have no protection, for not a lock which can give shelter to any portable article will act after you have been two days in the house. As for your personal effects, they are in equal danger. The average amount of loss in wearing apparel is one shirt and two handkerchiefs a week; and miscellaneous articles are sure to go if they are in the least degree pretty or curious. And the coolest part of the proceeding is, that the mildest complaint on your part brings down a storm upon your devoted head such as you could not have expected from the playful and fluttering person who had given you such pleasant assurances when you took the rooms. She claims to be a Caesar's wife in point of immunity from suspicion, and asserts the same privilege for everybody in the house. "No gentleman was ever robbed there," she says; and she plainly hints that no gentleman would say he was, even though he said the fact.

This is no exaggerated picture of many suburban lodgings to which outsiders of society are led to resort for want of better accommodation; and a large number of persons who are not outsiders in the sense in which I have employed the term, but who are simply not settled in the metropolis, are exposed to a similar fate. For those who are prepared for an ordeal of another nature, the "cheerful family, musically inclined" offers, one would think, a far preferable alternative. But it is not everybody who is prepared to have society thrust upon him, either in this quiet domestic way or in a large boarding-house, and there ought to be better provision than there is for the floating mass of casual residents in London. In Paris not only are there hotels suited to the requirements of all classes of persons, but the maisons meublées are places where they may live almost as independently as in their own houses.

In London, the only realization of the luxury short of an entire house is in what we call "chambers"; and a man's chambers are most certainly his castle, whatever his house may be. That the want is being appreciated, is evident from the rapid extension of the "chambers" system, in the way of the independent suites of rooms known as "flats." But the flats, as now provided in Victoria Street, and elsewhere, cost as much as entire houses, while the latest additions, the Belgrave and Grosvenor mansions, are even more costly, and beyond the reach of the classes to whom I have been referring. The latter would be deeply grateful for accommodation of the kind on a more moderate scale, and the investment of capital in such an object could not fail to be profitable. Besides the desolate people into whose sorrows I have entered, there are in London, it must be remembered, many hundreds of outsiders of society of a different kind, who are outsiders only from that conventional society, in which it takes so much money to "move," and who ought to command greater comfort than they do while they are working their way in professional pursuits. For those actually in want of companionship, I suppose they will always incline to the hotel, or the boarding-house, or the "cheerful family, musically inclined."

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF JOHN ACKLAND.

A TRUE STORY.

IN THIRTEEN CHAPTERS. CHAPTER V.

MR. CARTWRIGHT had not forgotten, before returning to Glenoak, to write to Mr. Ackland's cousin at Boston, as he had promised Judge Griffin. That letter informed Tom Ackland of his cousin's sudden impatience to leave Glenoak, in consequence of an unfortunate incident having reference to the name of a lady at Boston, with whom the writer believed that Mr. John Ackland had been acquainted previous to her marriage. It narrated the circumstances already known to the reader, of the departure from Glenoak, the mysterious return of the horse, and the failure of Mr. Cartwright, assisted by his friend, Judge Griffin and by the Richmond police, to discover any tidings of his late guest.

On the evening of his return to Glenoak, Mr. Cartwright was in excellent spirits. He kissed his little daughter with more than usual paternal unction, when she bade him good-night that evening.

He was pleasantly awakened next morning, by a despatch from the inn at the coach's halting town, informing him that Mr. Ackland had just sent to fetch away his luggage which had been lying there, in charge of the landlord, ever since the day on which John Ackland left Glenoak. The landlord had delivered the luggage to Mr. Ackland's messenger, on receipt of an order from Mr. Ackland which the messenger had produced authorizing him to receive it on Mr. Ackland's behalf. This order the landlord now forwarded to Mr. Cartwright, in consequence of the inquiries which that gentleman had been making with reference to Mr. Ackland. The messenger who called for the luggage had informed the landlord that he had come from Petersburg, where Mr. Ackland had been laid up by the effects of a bad accident; from which, however, he was now so far recovered that he intended to leave Petersburg early next morning accompanied by a gentleman with whom he had been staying there, and by whom, at Mr. Ackland's request, this messenger had been sent for the luggage.

Mr. Cartwright lost no time in communicating this good news, both to his friends at Richmond, and to Mr. Ackland's cousin at Boston. In doing so, he observed that he feared Mr. Ackland could not have completely recovered from the effects of his accident — whatever it was — when he signed the order forwarded to Glenoak; for he had noticed that in the signature to this order, the usually bold and firm character of John Ackland's handwriting had become shaky and sprawling, as though he had written from a sick-bed.

Now Tom Ackland was rendered so anxious, that he resolved to leave Boston in search of his cousin; and he certainly would have done so if he had not received on the following day, this letter, written in a strange hand, and dated from Petersburg.

"MY DEAR TOM, — You will be surprised to receive from me, so soon after my last, a letter in a strange hand. And, indeed, I have a long story to tell you in explanation of this fact; but for the sake of my kind amanuensis, as well as for my own sake (for I am still too weak to dictate a long letter), the story must be told briefly." The letter then went on to mention that Mr. John Ackland had left Glenoak sooner than he had intended at the date of his last letter to his cousin, availing himself of Mr. Cartwright's loan of a horse to catch the Charleston coach. How Cartwright had accompanied him through the plantation, and had insisted on taking a couple of guns with them, "though I assured him that I am no sportsman, my dear Tom"; how, in consequence of a shot fired suddenly by Cartwright from his saddle, at a hare, which he missed, the mare on which John Ackland was riding had become rather restive, "making me feel very uncomfortable, my dear Tom"; how, after parting with Cartwright and probably a little more than half-way to his destination, at a place where there were cross-roads, Mr. Ackland had encountered a buggy with two persons in it (an English gentleman and his servant, as it afterwards turned out), and how this buggy, crossing the road at full speed close in front of his horse, had caused the horse to rear and throw him. He had immediately lost consciousness. Fortunately, the persons in the buggy saw the accident, and hastened to his assistance; the mare in the mean while, having taken to her heels. Finding him insensible and severely injured, they had conveyed him with great care to Petersburg, whither they were going when he met them. There they obtained for him medical assistance. He believed he had been delirious for many days. He could not yet use his right arm, and he still felt a great deal of pain about the head. He was, however, sufficiently recovered to feel able to leave Petersburg, travelling easily and by slow stages. His kind friend Mr. Forbes, the English gentleman who had taken such care of him, was going to meet his yacht at Cape Hatteras, intending to sail to the Havannah, and had kindly offered to take him in the yacht as far as Charleston. John Ackland hoped the sea voyage would do him good. They intended to start immediately, — that evening or early next morning. Tom had better address all letters for the present to the post-office Charleston.

A few lines were added by Mr. Forbes, to whom this letter had been dictated. They described Mr. Ackland's injuries as serious, but not at all dangerous. A bad compound fracture of the right arm, broken in two places. The surgeon had at first feared that amputation might be necessary; but Mr. Forbes was happy to say that the arm had been set, and he trusted Mr. Ackland would eventually recover the use of it. There had been a severe concussion of the brain, but fortunately no fracture of the skull. Mr. Ackland had made good progress during the last week. Mr. Forbes was of opinion that Mr. Ackland was suffering in general health and spirits from the shock of the fall he had had, rather than from any organic injury.

On receipt of this letter, Tom Ackland wrote to his cousin, addressing his letter to the post-office at Charleston, and enclosing a line expressive of his thanks, &c. for Mr. Forbes, to whom he hoped John Ackland would be able to forward it. He also wrote to Mr. Cartwright, thanking that gentleman for his kind interest and exertions, and communicating to him what he had heard of his cousin from Mr. Forbes. When Cartwright mentioned the contents of this letter to Judge Griffin, "I always thought," said the Judge, "that the man would turn up somehow or other. We need not have taken such a deal of trouble about him." All further proceedings with a view to obtaining information about John Ackland were immediately stayed: and Mr. Cartwright made a handsome present to the police of Richmond for their "valuable assistance."

CHAPTER VI.

It was sometime before Tom Ackland heard again from his cousin. When he did hear, John Ackland's letter was written by himself, but was almost illegible. He apologized for this, dwelling on the pain and difficulty with which he wrote at all, even with his left hand. He thought his broken arm must have been very ill set. As for business he had not yet been able to attend to any. He would send Tom's letter to Mr. Forbes. But he really did not know whether it would ever find him. He believed that gentleman must have left the Havannah. As for himself, he had found the journey by sea to Charleston very fatiguing, and it had done him no good. The whole letter breathed a spirit of profound dejection. It complained much of frequent pain and constant oppression in the head. Life had become an intolerable burden. He, John Ackland, had never wished for a long life, and now desired it less than ever. He was so constantly changing his quarters (not having yet found any situation which did not horribly disagree with him), that Tom had better continue to direct his letters to the post-office.

Some expressions in the letter made Tom Ackland almost fear that John's mind had become affected. He wrote at once imploring his cousin to return to Boston if well enough to travel, and offering, if he were not, to start for Charleston at once in order to be with him.

John Ackland, in his reply, assured his cousin that he felt quite unable to undertake the fatigue of even a much shorter journey than the journey from Charleston to Boston. He begged that Tom would not think of joining him at Charleston. He could not at present bear to see any one. Even half an hour's conversation, especially with any one he knew, excited him almost beyond endurance. He avoided the sight of human faces as much as he could. His only safety was in complete seclusion. Every one was in a conspiracy to distress and injure him. He might tell Tom, in strict confidence, that all the people in Charleston were so afraid of his setting up business in that town, that they were determined to ruin, and even to murder him if they could. There were persons (he had seen them) who followed him about wherever he went, in order to poison the air when he was asleep; but he had been too sharp for them. The letter concluded with some quotations from Rousseau on the subject of suicide. It bore such evident traces of mental derangement, that Tom Ackland resolved to lose no time in going to Charleston. A statement which attracted his attention in the next morning's newspapers, confirmed his worst fears, and greatly increased his anxiety to arrive there.

CHAPTER VII.

At this time, some political friends of Mr. Dobbins, whose opinions had been advocated with great ability in the Richmond Courier on a subject of a question so hotly debated between North and South that it had threatened to break up the Union, invited that gentleman to a public banquet at one of the principal hotels in Richmond. Mr. Cartwright was present at this dinner; so was Judge Griffin; so was Dr. Simpson, the brother of the magnetic young lady; so were others of John Ackland's fellow-guests at Glenoak.

The dinner was a Union dinner, the speeches were Union speeches, the event celebrated was the triumph of Union sentiment in harmony with Southern supremacy. After the great political guns had fired themselves off, the ladies were "admitted from behind the screen," toasts of gallantry and personal compliment were proposed, and the minor orators obtained a hearing. None of these was more valuable than Mr. Cartwright. He rose to propose a toast. The toast was a Union toast, for it united the absent with the present. He would invite the company to drink to the health of "Our absent friends."

At this moment Mr. Cartwright was disagreeably interrupted by a bustle and buzz of voices among the sable attendants at the door. "Order! order!" cried Judge Griffin, indignantly looking round.

"Please, Massa Judge," cried one burly nigger, bolder than his fellows, "Massa Ackland he be in de next room, and want to speak bery 'tic'lar with Massa Cartwright."

"By Jove, Cartwright! do you hear that?" exclaimed the Judge. "What, Ackland? John Ackland?"

"Yessir. Massa John Ackland he be in a bustin' big hurry, and waitin' to see Massa Cartwright bery 'tic'lar."

"Why not call him in?" suggested the Judge. "Every one will be happy to see him, after all the trouble he has cost some of us."

"No, no," cried Cartwright, much overcome by the surprise. "Gentlemen, I will not detain you longer. To our absent friends! And now," he added, emptying his bumper with an unsteady hand, "I am sure you will all excuse me, since it seems that one of my absent friends is waiting to see me."

CHAPTER VIII.

Mr. Cartwright hurried to the door, and next moment found himself face to face—not with Mr. John, but with Mr. John's cousin Tom, Ackland.

Mr. Tom Ackland introduced himself: "My excuse," said he, "is, that I am only at Richmond for a few hours, on my way to Charleston, and that, accidentally hearing from one of the helps here that you happened to be in the hotel, I was anxious to ask you whether you had lately heard from my cousin, or received any news of him from Charleston?"

"None," said Cartwright. "I trust there is nothing the matter?"

"You have not even seen his name mentioned in the newspapers?"

"No."

"Yet I presume a paragraph I have here from a Boston paper, must also have appeared in the Richmond journals. Pray be so good as to look at it."

The paragraph ran thus:—

"The following has appeared in the Charleston Messenger of October 18th. On the 16th instant, about two hours after sundown, a Spanish gentleman, who happened to be walking towards Charleston along the right bank of Cooper River, was startled by what he believed to be the sound of a human voice speaking in loud tones. The voice apparently proceeded from the same side of the river as that along which he was walking, and not many yards in advance of him. As the night was already dark, he was unable to distinguish any object not immediately before him, and, as he was but imperfectly acquainted with the English tongue, he was also unable to understand what the voice was saying. He was, however, so strongly under the impression that the voice was that of a person addressing a large audience in animated tones, that he fully believed himself to be in the immediate vicinity of a camp-meeting, or other similar assemblage, and was somewhat surprised to perceive no lights along that part of the bank from which the voice apparently proceeded. Whilst he was yet listening to it, the voice suddenly ceased, and was succeeded by the sound of a loud splash, as of some heavy body falling into the water. On hastening to the spot from which he supposed these sounds to have arisen, he was still more surprised to find it deserted. On examining the ground, however, as well as he could by the light of a few matches which he happened to have with him, he discovered two pieces of property, a hat and a book, but nothing which indicated the owner of them, and no trace of any struggle which could lead him to suppose that their unknown owner had been deprived of them by violence. After shouting in every direction, without obtaining any answer, this gentleman then took possession of the hat and book, and, on returning to Charleston, deposited them, with the foregoing explanation of the manner in which he had discovered them, at the F. Street police-station. From the examination of these objects by the police, it appears that both the book and the hat are inscribed with the name 'John K. Ackland.' The book, as we are informed, is the second volume of a small pocket edition of the Nouvelle Héloïse, and the page is turned down and marked at the following passage: 'Chercher son bien, et fuir son mal, en se qui n'offense point autrui, c'est le droit de la nature. Quand notre vie est un mal pour nous, et n'est un bien pour personne, il est donc permis de s'en délivrer. S'il y a dans le monde une maxime évidente et certaine, je pense que c'est celle-là; et si l'on venait à bout de la renverser, il n'y a point d'action humaine dont on ne pût faire un crime.' On the margin opposite this passage something is written, but in characters which are quite illegible. The volume apparently belongs to a Boston edition. Inspector Jenks, of the Fifth Ward Police Division, has lost no time in investigating this mysterious occurrence. We understand that the river has been dragged, but without the discovery of any human body. It is to be observed that if a body, falling into the river at the spot indicated by the gentleman by whom the above-mentioned property was deposited at the F. Street station, had floated within an hour after its immersion, it is quite within possibility that it might have been carried out to sea before the following morning, that is to say, supposing it to have fallen into the river at that point, where the current is extremely strong, not later than 10.30 P. M. It is, however, extremely improbable that a human body could have been floated out to sea in this manner without being observed. It is equally improbable that any person could have perished within the neighborhood of Charleston, whether by accident or violence, on the night of the 16th without the disappearance of that person having excited attention in some quarter up to the present moment. Our own impression is that the whole affair has been an ingenious hoax. This impression is, at least, borne out by the fact that the name of Ackland (which certainly is not a Charleston name) is not known at, and does not appear on the books of, any hotel in this city; that the advertisements of the police have, up to the present moment, elicited no claimant for the hat and book now on view in F. Street, and that, from the inquiries hitherto made, it appears that no person in or about Charleston has been missing since the night of the 16th instant. With a view, however, to the possibility of this mysterious Mr. J. K. Ackland ever having existed, except in the imagination of some mischievous wag, Union journals are requested to copy, in order that the friends and relations of the missing gentleman (if there be any) may be made acquainted with the foregoing information."

"Well?" said Tom Ackland, when Cartwright had finished his perusal of this statement.

"Well," answered Cartwright, "I also incline to think it a hoax."

"I wish I could think so too," said Mr. Tom; "but I have many sad reasons to think more seriously of it."

"When do you go on to Charleston?" asked Mr. Cartwright.

"Before daybreak to-morrow."

"Ever been there before?"

"Never."

"Then you must let me come with you. I know something of that city, have friends there, and may be of use."

"Really, my dear sir, I could not possibly think of allowing you to sacrifice —"

"No sacrifice, sir. Nothing I would not do for the sake of your cousin, Mr. Ackland. He was once very useful to me, sir, — very useful and very kind. And no man shall say that Phil Cartwright ever forgot a kindness done him. I can pack up in an hour, and the sooner we start the better."

So Mr. Cartwright accompanied Mr. Tom Ackland to Charleston. And Mr. Tom Ackland was inexpressibly touched by that proof of friendship for his cousin.

CHARLES LAMB IN THE TEMPLE.

THE following charming and characteristic letter of Mary Lamb to a child cannot fail to interest all who cherish the memory of Charles Lamb and his sister. The "little Barbara" (afterwards Mrs. Edwards) to whom it was addressed was the youngest sister of Matilda Betham, a poetess whom Southey valued, and of Sir William Betham, the well-known genealogist and antiquary:—

November 2 1814.

TO MISS BARBARA BETHAM:—

It is very long since I have met with such an agreeable surprise as the sight of your letter, my kind young friend, afforded me. Such a nice letter as it is too. And what a pretty hand you write. I congratulate you on this attainment with great pleasure, because I have so often felt the disadvantage of my own wretched handwriting.

You wish for London news. I rely upon your sister Ann for gratifying you in this respect, yet I have been endeavoring to recollect whom you might have seen here, and what may have happened to them since, and this effort has only brought the image of little Barbara Betham, unconnected with any other person, so strongly before my eyes that I seem as if I had no other subject to write upon. Now I think I see you with your feet propped upon the fender, your two hands spread out upon your knees, — an attitude you always chose when we were in familiar confidential conversation together, — telling me long stories of your own home, where now, you say, you are "moping on with the same thing every day," and which then presented nothing but pleasant recollections to your mind. How well I remember your quiet, steady face bent over your book! One day, conscience-struck at having wasted so much of your precious time in readings, and feeling yourself, as you prettily said, "quite useless to me," you went to my drawers and hunted out some unhemmed pocket-handkerchiefs, and by no means could I prevail upon you to resume your story-books till you had hemmed them all. I remember, too, your teaching my little maid to read, — your sitting with her a whole evening to console her for the death of her sister; and that she in her turn endeavored to become a comfort to you the next evening when you wept at the sight of Mrs. Holcroft, from whose school you had recently eloped because you were not partial to sitting in the stocks. Those tears, and a few you once dropped when my brother teased you about your supposed fondness for apple-dumplings, were the only interruptions to the calm contentedness of your unclouded brow. We still remain the same as you left us, neither better nor wiser, nor perceptibly older, but three years must have made a great alteration in you. How very much, dear Barbara, I should like to see you!

We still live in Temple Lane, but I am now sitting in a room you never saw; soon after you left us we were distressed by the cries of a cat, which seemed to proceed from the garrets adjoining to ours and only separated from ours by the locked door on the farther side of my brother's bedroom, which you know was the little room at the top of the kitchen stairs. We had the lock forced and let poor puss out from behind a panel of the wainscot, and she lived with us from that time, for we were in gratitude bound to keep her, as she had introduced us to four untenanted, unowned rooms, and by degrees we have taken possession of these unclaimed apartments, — first putting up lines to dry our clothes, then moving my brother's bed into one of these, more commodious than his own room. And last winter my brother being unable to pursue a work he had begun, owing to the kind interruptions of friends who were more at leisure than himself, I persuaded him that he might write at his ease in one of these rooms, as he could not then hear the door knock, or hear himself denied to be at home, which was sure to make him call out and convict the poor maid in a fib. Here, I said, he might be almost really not at home. So I put in an old grate, and made him a fire in the largest of these garrets, and carried in one table and one chair, and bid him write away, and consider himself as much alone as if he were in some lodging on the midst of Salisbury Plain, or any other wide, unfrequented place where he could expect few visitors to break in upon his solitude. I left him quite delighted with his new acquisition, but in a few hours he came down again with a sadly dismal face. He could do nothing, he said, with those bare whitewashed walls before his eyes. He could not write in that dull, unfurnished prison.

The next day, before he came home from his office, I had gathered up various bits of old carpeting to cover the floor; and, to a little break the blank look of the bare walls, I hung up a few old prints that used to ornament the kitchen, and after dinner, with great boast of what an improvement I had made, I took Charles once more into his new study. A week of busy labors followed, in which I think you would not have disliked to have been our assistant. My brother and I almost covered the walls with prints, for which purpose he cut out every print from every book in his old library, coming in every now and then to ask my leave to strip a fresh poor author, — which he might not do, you know, without my permission, as I am elder sister. There was such pasting, such consultation where their portraits, and where a series of pictures from Ovid, Milton, and Shakespeare would show to most advantage, and in what obscure corner authors of humbler note might be allowed to tell their stories. All the books gave up their stories but one, — a translation from Ariosto, — a delicious set of four-and-twenty prints, and for which I had marked out a conspicuous place; when lo! we found at the moment the scissors were going to work that a part of the poem was printed at the back of every picture. What a cruel disappointment! To conclude this long story about nothing, the poor despised garret is now called the print room, and is become our most favorite sitting-room. Your sister Anne will tell you that your friend Louisa is going to France. Miss Skipper is out of town; Mrs. Reynolds desires to be remembered to you, and so does my neighbor, Mrs. Norris, who was your doctress when you were unwell. Her three little children have grown three big children. The lions still live in Exeter Change. Returning home through the Strand I often hear them roar about twelve o'clock at night. I never hear them without thinking of you, because you seemed so pleased with the sight of them, and said your young companions would stare when you told them you had seen a lion. And now, my dear Barbara, farewell; I have not written such a long letter a long time, but I am very sorry I had nothing amusing to write about. Wishing you may pass happily through the rest of your school days, and every day of your life, I remain your affectionate friend,

M. LAMB.

My brother sends his love to you, with the kind remembrance your letter showed you have of us as I was. He joins with me in respects to your good father and mother. Now you have begun I shall hope to have the pleasure of hearing from you again. I shall always receive a letter from you with very great delight.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE MARY ANN.

IN TWO PARTS. PART II.

THE boat, on leaving the ship, had made off rapidly towards the whales; but she had had a long chase, and the captain had not attempted to shorten it. In the end, they were successful. A whale was harpooned, lanced, and killed, and then for the first time the men became clearly conscious that the ship was not in sight. They concluded, of course, that they had come a long way; but the whalers had been placed in a similar difficulty before, and were certain that the morning would show them the Mary Ann in sight. They had a stock of provisions which would last them three or four days and therefore made themselves as comfortable as they could, keeping watch in turns.

The night passed pleasantly enough. In such latitudes, sleep in the open air is the pleasantest kind of sleep, and but for the slightly cramped positions in which they had to lie, they had little cause to regret that they were not on board ship.

Morning came; but, to their astonishment and disappointment, the ship was not in sight. Still, it was probable that she would cruise about during the day, and before night would sight them. The day passed wearily, all the men keeping an anxious lookout, and none more anxious than the captain. They hoped, he feared, that the Mary Ann would be sighted. As the day wore on, and no signs appeared, the men, and especially the ex-bushrangers, began to be seriously uneasy. The captain was shrewd enough to do nothing to make them less uneasy. At night, he told them that he must take charge of the small cask of water and the little stock of provisions. "Because," said he, "if the Mary Ann is not in sight to-morrow, we must make for land."

The three convicts were suspicious at once. Suspicion is about the only quality which men of this class have in common. Forty soldiers will overawe four thousand convicts. The reason is, that there is not a convict who does not believe that if he were to propound any scheme of resistance to his fellow, the plot would be instantly revealed. The convict suspects everybody; his fellows, perhaps, worse than all others. The instant, therefore, the captain mentioned his proposal, they suspected treachery. In truth, the matter was much more serious to them than to the sailors. If by chance they fell in with an English man-of-war, although at present no one but the captain had the most remote notion that there was any possibility of such an occurrence, and it became known that they were ex-convicts, they would be put in irons, and at once sent back to Van Diemen's Land, where death would be the penalty of their offences. The rest of the boat's crew, however, agreed with the captain. High words ensued. The three convicts were armed, and the five sailors unarmed; but the captain had near him the ship's lances, and the convicts must have felt that a conflict would be a hazardous thing.

Night came, and no sign of the ship. Suspicion was now in every one's breast. There was no sleep that night for any one except poor Charley, who, worn out by the hard work he had had on the first day, and less influenced by suspicion than the rest, slept as soundly as if in his berth.

Morning came, — the second morning, — and no signs were yet visible. The sailors advised that they should make at once for land, but the convicts opposed. Wearily the hours passed away. Half-provisions were served out: the convicts proposed that half even of that amount only should be given to Charley, but the others stood by him.

Night approached, and with the same tale: no ship in sight. Even the convicts began to see that the best thing to do was to make for land. If there were the choice of two deaths, any would be better than starvation. Besides, they might meet with some other ship, or with their own; or even on land they might, and probably would, be perfectly safe. They agreed to take turns in watching during this night, two being always on watch, a convict and a sailor. The rest slept.

When morning came, they were all of one mind: they must now aim at land. The captain thought he could hit it. The best thing they could do at any rate was to try; all agreed in that.

So the boat's head was put landwards, and the men pulled with a will. By night, however, they were nearly worn out. They had gone, according to the captain's calculation, about one third of the distance.

The quantity of provisions distributed was reduced again. The reduction told on their labors next day: they dragged wearily at their oars; their strength was failing them for want of food.

The next day and the fifth passed, and on each succeeding one the distance got over was smaller than on the preceding. Some of the men could take very short spells at the oar, — Charley shorter than any of the rest. The captain took his turn, and managed so well that, but for the fact that each one lived in view of the rest, they would have suspected him of having a secret supply of food.

On the night of the fifth day, the convicts made a rush at the food, and a fight took place. No one, however, was wounded severely. The sailors were unwilling to shed blood; the convicts were afraid to make open war. They knew that, without the help of the captain at any rate, they could never hope to reach land. On the morning of the sixth day, one man, a sailor, and Charley were so far useless that they could only lie in the bottom of the boat. Charley was quite senseless, almost lifeless. The convicts would probably have made open war but for the absolute necessity of not losing the captain.

Noon came. Land was sighted, — land, land! Land where water could be had, — land where food might be procured! Frantically they expended their failing strength in endeavors to reach it suddenly. Gradually they could distinguish the low line of green, and beneath it a strip of yellow sand, becoming more and more distinct. No houses could be made out. The men were in raptures; the captain, however, was disappointed, although he did his best not to show his disappointment. What he had looked out most anxiously for was a ship: that he could not see. There was just one hope for him: there might be one on the opposite side of the island.

Then one of the convicts drew his pistol, and swore with a great oath that they should not go a boat's length farther until he knew what was going to be done. "Were they going to split? He was n't going to be sent back to Australia; he might as well fight it out there. If they won, well, they could tell their own tale: they could be a whaler's crew that had lost their ship; and if they lost, they could only be killed."

The other convicts joined with him, and there was every probability of a terrible fight.

The danger was put an end to by a sailor. "He did not want to split. They had all shared alike in the boat, and they might as well keep their tongues still." They were now sufficiently strong to dictate their own terms. The other two sailors at once promised not to mention to any Europeans that they were runaways. Charley was too exhausted to be capable of understanding what was going on. Once or twice the captain had looked anxiously to see whether he still breathed. Extreme exhaustion had followed his hard work and rough usage, and he lay like one dead.

The captain only remained. At first, he would not consent to make any promise. Angry words passed; pistols were cocked; but all were against him. They thought of throwing him overboard, since his knowledge was no longer indispensable. At last, under heavy threats, he consented to be silent so long as he should be on the island they were approaching. No threats could extort any promise beyond that. Perhaps the captain consented the more readily because he saw no sign of European civilization. He was afraid he had missed the island he was aiming at.

By sunset the men were near the shore. Native canoes pulled off in wonder at the visitors arriving in so small a ship. Soon food and water were procured, and the men stood once again on land. The visitors were made to understand that there were white men on the island, though a few miles away. The gentle Polynesians treated the hungry fellows well. Two small huts were set aside for their use. Two days passed, and then all were sufficiently recovered, with the exception of the boy, to prepare for their journey across the island. They had found a native who could speak a little English; he told them that there were only two or three small vessels at the island, and that the big ships were all at sea. This, of course, was excellent news for the convicts, but dismal enough for the captain.

We may hasten over the journey across the island. The boy Charley was not strong enough to accompany the rest. The old captain determined that he would send help to him as soon as ever he should meet with Europeans.

They reached the small English settlement. There were a few English sailors who had been left on shore in the hospital, a small body of marines, and one or two merchant settlers with their families. They welcomed the shipwrecked crew, as they believed them to be, as Englishmen in such circumstances always do.

A small sandal-wood vessel was going to leave the island in a day or two for Honolulu. The convicts were glad of the chance of going with her, since it would be easy enough probably to find a ship from that port to California, and the Australians believed they would have a good chance of getting a passage to Van Diemen's Land. They accordingly were all ready to take the passage which was offered them.

Charley was left to the care of the Europeans. Before the little vessel weighed anchor, he was sufficiently recovered to have started on his journey across the island: but she had sailed before he reached the settlement. The captain had at first determined to remain behind, on the chance of the arrival of a man-of-war which might go in chase of the Mary Ann.

He concluded it would be better to go with the rest. If he could get a quick sailer at Honolulu, he might still reach California before the Mary Ann, — would be able to give notice to the authorities, and to be prepared to apprehend the run-aways when his own slow-sailing ship arrived. Then, too, if he had remained behind, the convicts would at once have suspected him, and might have persuaded the captain of the little schooner to change his plans.

The little vessel sailed, well stocked with provisions, and the shipwrecked crew especially well fitted out by the kindly hands of their countrymen.

On the same day, the sick boy Charley was brought into the settlement by the men who had been sent over for him. He had not been in the settlement one hour before every one in it knew the character of the men by whom the Mary Ann had been seized, the particulars of her seizure, the real story of the whaling crew, and every particular about the voyage, with the exception of his own ill-treatment.

The reader may judge how much the inhabitants of the little settlement were excited by what the boy had to tell. They had given their hospitality to scoundrels of the worst type. The more fully they learned the details of the capture, of the ill-treatment to which the captain had been subjected, and little by little of his own ill-treatment, the more eagerly they desired to bring the offenders to justice, and to punish the men who had, as they considered, violated their hospitality.

A consultation was held at once. The inhabitants did what Englishmen always do in cases of difficulty, — they called a public meeting. Thirty Europeans were got together, the lieutenant in charge, who was acting-governor, was put in the chair; and then, after the manner of their fathers, at any time during the last fifteen hundred years, probably longer, if we are to believe Tacitus, they sought wisdom in the multitude of counsellors.

The problem to be solved was, how to catch, first, the boat; secondly, the Mary Ann. Some suggested a search for the man-of-war, which had but recently left the station, to be made by despatching canoes to the islands where she was likeliest to have called. This design, however, had to be abandoned. It was doubtful whether the man-of-war would have called at any of the islands lying near; and, even if she had, much valuable time would be lost, during which both vessels would be making their way to their destinations. The suggestion finally hit upon was to send a small schooner which was in the harbor in pursuit. She was to carry as many men as could be spared from the settlement, so that they might be prepared for a fight with the convicts if they should come up with them. It was soon found that, from the sailors who had been left in hospital, added to more belonging to the schooner, a crew could be obtained of a dozen men. Half a dozen marines volunteered to go likewise. The night was spent in preparations. Provisions were taken on board in quantities sufficiently large to accommodate her large crew. A gun which had been left on shore by a man-of-war was placed on board. The little settlement was alive with preparations during the whole of the following day. In the evening, her crew went on board, taking with them, at his own desire, Charley.

As the land-breeze began to blow, she weighed anchor, and with the good wishes of all commenced the chase.

On board the Sandal-Wood, as the little trader sent in pursuit was called, there was all the excitement of a long chase. Every eye searched the horizon carefully during each successive day, with the view of catching sight of the Mary Ann; and when at the end of the long week she was seen, every one felt as much delight as the hunter feels when he has sighted his prey. The gun had been prepared, so as to be of use if needed in attacking. The decks of the whaler were three or four feet at least higher out of the water than those of the Sandal-wood, so that boarding would be extremely dangerous. It was considered that the best way would be to manœuvre the little vessel, bring the gun to bear, and fire away until the enemy surrendered, and sent their men on board in their own boat. The lieutenant who commanded the little vessel determined that if this failed, he would then risk boarding.

And now, we must transfer ourselves to the Mary Ann. From the day on which the leader of the escaped convicts had concluded that the boat was lost, he began to be suspicious of the mate. The missing boat might have gone to the bottom; but then, on the other hand, she might have met with some other ship, or possibly even have reached land. If she had fallen in with another whaler or merchant-ship, or, as was possible, with a man-of-war, or if she had reached land, one of two things was pretty certain to happen, — either that man-of-war would be quickly in pursuit, or that they would be on their way to intercept them on the American coast. Black Dick examined the mate very closely, and it required all that officer's ability not to show that he knew more of the incident than he chose to tell. Six days had been lost in waiting about in vain endeavors to find the missing boat. At length, fearful of being intercepted off the Californian coast, the ship's head was turned towards that coast, and the Mary Ann resumed her voyage. But the winds were light, and the heavy, slow-sailing whaler—a capital ship for rough Antarctic seas—made very slow progress over the calm waters, scarcely ruffled by the light breezes of the Pacific.

The bushrangers grew more and more impatient. For three days the ship lay becalmed. In the Atlantic there is always a long swell in the sea, even when in the air the calm is perfect; but in the Pacific the water is absolutely and completely motionless. The calm fretted the men; they chafed under the inaction; they could bear anything but rest. They wanted to travel at the most rapid pace possible to man, and here they were kept idle, motionless. They cursed the calm in language which in the perfect stillness—the stillness which may be felt of a tropical calm—even occasionally appalled themselves. And when the wind did at last come to put an end to this wearisome and anxious suspense, it blew so lightly, and the ship travelled so slowly, that the men's anxiety was scarcely relieved. Their captain, meantime, had been thinking what was best to be done, and had secretly made up his mind that almost their only chance of outstripping the pursuers who were probably after them was to abandon the Mary Ann altogether and gain possession of a vessel which could sail quicker. Hitherto, they had carefully kept out of the way of the few vessels which they had sighted. They determined now to make an attack on the first suitable to their purposes which they should see. Black Dick would add piracy to the list of his qualifications for the hempen cord.

The first vessel sighted after the calm by the Mary Ann was the little Sandal-Wood. She was seen at the stern of the Mary Ann in early morning, and as the day advanced, became more and more distinct. This alone was proof that she was a quicker sailer than the whaler. She was gaining on them greatly. She was a small schooner, very fleet, lightly built, carrying a large spread of sail, and evidently constructed for speed in tropical seas.

The mate, who had learned the plans of the convicts, was in fear. His plan of capture by a man-of-war was at an end; his delays of the Mary Ann were fruitless. The captors of the whaler were going to escape by means of another unpunished piece of villany. As he saw the schooner approaching, he recognized only too well that she was exactly suited to their purpose.

Black Dick called the five convicts around him, and the men arranged for the capture of the vessel. They would make signals to her, man a whale-boat, and, adopting the ruse which they had already found to be successful in the capture of the whaler, take possession of her.

The mate was compelled to admit that it was unlikely there would be more than four or five men on board. But he was puzzled to make out what the schooner was doing. Little details connected with the way in which the ship was managed put him on the alert. Clearly she was well handled. Could there be any hope of—No; she had answered the signals in the usual way.

A slight movement in her sails showed him that she was, for some strange purpose or other going to tack. In truth, she was preparing to tack, in order that she might come round so as to bring her gun to bear.

Just then the whaler's boat was lowered. The mate, who was, of course, to be left on board the Mary Ann, looking towards the schooner, observed that there had been a change of purpose.

The lieutenant on board the Sandal-Wood had been surprised at the lowering of the whale-boat. Possibly they were out of provisions. But in such cases signals are usually made. Charley suggested to him that they were going to attempt a capture. The lieutenant prepared to receive them. Every man was armed; the marines were sent below. All but four were ordered to hide themselves behind the bulwarks. The four or five left on deck showed no arms, but lounged about lazily after the manner of the men whom they wished to imitate.

As the whale-boat approached, the hopes of the bushrangers ran high. This was exactly the vessel they wanted. A quiet pull to her side, a haul on her deck; at the most, a short, easy fight with unprepared men, throwing one or two overboard, and she would be theirs, and then let English men-of-war do their best.

They were within hailing distance.

"What ship is that?" cried the convict leader.

"The Sandal-Wood."

"Throw us a rope; we are coming on board."

A rope was lowered; the boat made fast alongside. One after another the men swung themselves on board. They stood together for an instant, and Black Dick cried, "Now for it!" and knocked one of the seamen down, while he and the rest produced pistols, and made a rush at the rest.

But at that moment there was another rush. Men armed with the queen's weapons came from under the shelter of the little boat which was placed on deck, from the shelter of the bulwarks, and from the cabin. For an instant there was a panic. The convicts had never thought of the possibility of catching a Tartar. Cutlasses gleamed before them. A short, fierce struggle, one man after another belonging to the boat's crew disabled, a desperate tussle with the convict captain, whose pistol was literally cut out of his hand, and the convicts were overpowered. They were placed in irons, and carefully guarded. We may pass over the scene which took place when the men saw Charley. The leaders of the gang were secured. All that remained to be done was to catch up with the little vessel in which the captain of the whaler and the whale-boat's crew had taken their passage to Honolulu, and then to deliver the whole of the prisoners to the first man-of-war they could find, to be sent back to Van Diemen's Land. In this the Sandal-Wood was fortunate; in two days, she fell in with a man-of-war. Her Majesty's ship had chosen to board the vessel bound for Honolulu, and the captain had, in spite of threats from the men, boldly denounced his three fellow-passengers. He and the rest of the whale-boat's crew were accordingly transferred to the man-of-war, the captain as a free man who had been ill-used; the three convicts as prisoners. She then made a search for the whaler, and came up with her, as we have seen, in charge of a British officer.

The whole of the prisoners were taken off to Australia, where they paid full penalty for their misdeeds. The captain and his crew were again in sole possession of the Mary Ann; and the mate and Charley found themselves on their return to Hobart Town, the heroes of the hour.

THE SERVANT OF FACT AND EXPERIENCE.

AFTER a long course of misunderstandings between mistress and maids, a family woke one cold morning to the uncomfortable consciousness of desertion. At the first dawn of day the servants in pique had taken themselves off in a body, carrying with them nothing of their master's but their services, and without even lighting a fire. There was no possibility of getting immediate help; there was nothing for it but that fingers unused to be soiled should set awkwardly to work with chips and bellows, and raise a tardy flame, and boil unwilling water, and take in bread from the baker, and milk from the milkman, and sit down shivering and disconsolate to an ill-laid breakfast-table. The comment upon all this was natural enough, — "What plagues servants are!" But how unjust! The obvious teaching of the incident should rather have been a wondering thankfulness that such a mode of beginning the day is exceptional. "Not more than others I deserve, and yet since I was born to this hour I have found others to do this work for me." The sight of a blazing fire, throwing a warm shimmer of brightness and polish over everything, of a trimly laid breakfast-table, of hissing urn, delicate rashers, smoking chops, should surely excite perpetual gratitude towards the class who, for a poor consideration of food and wages, renew this daily paradise for us. But nobody says "Thank you," or sees anything but a matter of course in this pleasant magic. We are disposed to think servants an ill-used class. Not only the parlor, not only querulous masters and mistresses, but the press, is against them, and finds its account in ringing the changes on flunkies, menials, servant-girls, and John Thomases, confident in a sure topic, and safe from reprisal. Servitude has no organ; when the pen is wielded by the hand that wields the broom, we shall perhaps hear a different story. At present servants share the fate of lawyers and millers, — as people we cannot do without, and are obliged to trust.

All literature speaks of servants as a deteriorating class. The servants that men praise are among their past experiences; but this rather illustrates a weakness inherent in human nature than an actual fact. People always judge of living classes by bad examples, and of those who preceded them by their most favorable specimens. If we look into contemporary notices of servants a hundred years ago, we find them spoken of as pampered menials, as venal and corrupt wretches. The Day and Edgeworth school laid it down as an indispensable condition of education that the child shall never exchange a word with a servant. All the gossip about servants assumes that they daily get more showy, worthless, idle, grasping, and independent, and yet we believe that in truth there never were better servants than in the England of to-day; that the proportion of honest and efficient servants was never larger. In every calling incompetence is the rule rather than exact efficiency, but servants will match any other class in the amount of effective, creditable, and pattern members. Still, unquestionably, the charge of independence is true. A change has come over the theory of service, — a change, however, inevitable from the refinement or finery of modern manners. The old notion of fidelity implied a condition of things to which nobody would willingly return. It implied companionship and interchange of thought between master and man, moments and occasions of equality sweetening the habitual attitude of subjection. It implied, too, the promise of a maintenance to the end of life, for it would be monstrous to require the prime of a man's powers and to cast him off in old age; there was also implied the continuance of service when he ceased to be efficient.

Old servants are a class apt to be pleasanter in description than in fact, and very prone to tyrannize, through the weight of custom. Witness Miss Brontë's Tabby, an old body who at eighty was so jealous of relinquishing any part of her work that her fastidious mistress, breaking off in the full flow of inspiration, used surreptitiously to carry off the bowl of potatoes to cut out the specks which the poor creature's weak old eyes had failed to detect; and so exacting of confidence in family matters that, being stone deaf, her mistress used to walk off with her to the heart of the moor, in order that the secrets shouted into her ear might not become common property. A servant once established as indispensable to the well-being of a household becomes a formidable power in it, and aways the head in a way that is often intolerable to everybody else. But in our time of easy change and high wages this peculiar trial is daily growing more a thing of the past, though there are still secluded homes where the threat of departure keeps some nervous temper in a perpetual and most unreasonable fidget of dread. The advertising columns of the Times, with the boasted two years' character, stand now in strange, amusing contrast with Swift's old story of the chamber-maid who said to one of her fellow-servants, "I hear it is all over London already that I am going to leave my Lady." The utmost self-appreciation knows that change makes little commotion with us nowadays. We are not defending the love of change for the sake of change, which is the current complaint; but where there is so little intercourse between the kitchen and the parlor, we scarcely see how attachments can be formed, or how self-interest and even a fancy for amusement may not be motives of action as potent among servants as among ourselves; though in many cases attachments are formed, and certain qualities in the master, absolutely taciturn as he is, do inspire affection. This may be noted most perhaps where a certain amiable helplessness and dependence in domestic life is combined with distinction in the world's eyes.

Wordsworth's servants were attached to him, and proud of his service, though he is little likely to have been familiar. His wife, to be sure, was a pattern, and the house was a scene of the domestic virtues; but we see appreciation of her master in the reply of his cook-maid to the stranger who wished to see Wordsworth's study, — "This is master's library, but he studies in the fields"; and also in the faithful James of Rydal Mount, whose history Crabb Robinson gives us, and who, born in the workhouse, and turned out upon the world at nine years old with two shillings in his pocket, called himself the child of good fortune because he rose to the dignity of being Wordsworth's servant for life and comforter in trouble, — though, it is added, he hardly seemed to know that his master was a poet. He knew him at least as an object of vast respect and prestige. Sidney Smith also kept his servants, but it was his way to talk and joke with everybody about him, and to employ them in a multitude of little services about his person, keeping them merry all the time; a sort of service of which few would grudge to have at least a taste.

But in ordinary households fidelity cannot flourish for want of its natural nourishment, and necessarily changes into mere honesty and good service while it lasts. The servant has a world of which master and mistress know nothing; the interests of master and man are no longer common topics. There may be the best mutual understanding, and the well-being of soul and body may be matter of conscience with the employer, but the separation of kitchen and parlor is more complete now than it ever was before. Servants cannot be absorbed now into the family; they must have an outer life, a sphere among their equals, where connections may be formed and freedom of speech allowed. It is, if we think of it, absurd to forbid a man the power of retort, to compel him to silence under reproof, and yet to expect him to make our interests his main concern; it is idle not to see that he merely reconciles himself to silence and respect as part of his contract, a condition to be submitted to till something better, or at least pleasanter, turns up.

It is astonishing what an amount of self-sacrifice people take for granted as their due from persons of whose private circumstances they know nothing. How coolly some women expect the inmates of their gloomy cellar kitchens to find in their service the highest claim, while at the same time they may never have exchanged a syllable with them that did not relate to their own convenience, and may often have reproved querulously and unjustly without that especial feminine consolation, a word in reply — their say out — being once resorted to by their victim. The support in this case is the liberty of change, — a grievance and a nuisance to the mistress whose experience has all been from bad to worse, but nevertheless not in all respects an evil. It is to be remembered that she is enjoying the youth and vigor of a succession of damsels, none of them likely to be more efficient twenty years hence than they are now.

The accounts we hear of American "helps" naturally make us view with unpleasant forebodings the independence which is the distinctive feature of modern service among ourselves; but the fact of slavery in America has evidently cast a stigma on the relation of which we have not a trace in England. All girls, at least among our lower classes, take to service cheerfully as a start in life, unless they have incapacitated themselves by mill-work or some similar training; and they are certainly more eligible as wives, and sought after by a better class, than those women whose girlhood has been passed in manufacturing or field labor.

And no wonder, for surely nothing can be neater, or a completer thing in its way, than a tidy, efficient maid-servant. We own that, in exalting the merits of this class, we naturally choose a female model. There are, of course, excellent butlers and footmen in livery, but indoor service is so far contrary to manly instincts that in the best of the class, unless they are too busy or too slow to have any spare moments on their hands, there is a propensity to have some private pursuit not quite compatible with perfect utility. If a man escapes the common pitfall of the public-house or the beer-shop, he gossips, or he reads at inconvenient times, or secludes himself with some musical instrument, or he may endeavor to combine with his duties some business on his own account. He undertakes a commission of some sort for his spare moments, or he speculates with his savings, and you come upon his name in the Gazette. He cannot put all his heart or head into his work. There is a good deal to be said for the Antiquary's view. Without at all disputing woman's powers of command, it cannot be denied that the especial feminine characteristics display themselves in a very amiable light in domestic service. We know the cook only by her dishes; how they linger in the memory everybody who has been a schoolboy knows. And it is not very different with elderly gentlemen either, if we may infer so much from the curious fact that, when a man marries any denizen of his kitchen, it is always his cook. The cook has by prescriptive right a temper; probably her tongue is never under the austere control indispensable in the parlor. It is the waiting-maid who represents the class to ordinary eyes.

We know nothing that conveys an idea of absolute fitness for her work so exactly as a typical neat-handed Phillis; so fit that no one can dream of removing her out of it. Sober, steadfast, demure in air, noiseless, speechless except when spoken to, and then answering in the fewest words and with the distinctest utterance; the manner, perfect in its way, suggesting probably to Mr. Hawthorne his tribute to the demeanor of some of the younger women of our lower classes, in contrast with the ordinary clownishness, — "a manner with its own proper grace, neither affected nor imitative of something higher," a manner natural to a young woman who knows her place and her value, and is intent on putting a certain finish and completeness into all she does; her comeliness set off by a costume whose neat and trim unobtrusiveness makes it one of the prettiest and most appropriate in the world. Such a damsel is indeed a household treasure; no part of her needs another field; nothing is unexpressed; her wits, her memory, her observation, as well as her eyes and fingers, are kept in full exercise by the family exigencies. Where in the world are my spectacles? what have I done with that letter? asks papa. Where have I put my keys, or my gloves? asks mamma. I have lost my brooch, or my bracelet, or my parasol, cry the young ladies. Mary is the universal referee. Mary knows people's ways better than they do themselves, and with unwearied good-nature, and a perception amounting to instinct, brings people and their goods together again. It is bad news when this faultless creature announces her engagement to some young man; we are naturally amazed that so much perfection should throw herself away on such a lout, who, whether on workdays or Sundays, seems so immeasurably below her in refinement. But Mary knows her own interests, as well as her heart, best. She has never forgotten the traditions of her own class; her head has never for an instant been turned by the sight of pleasures and luxuries beyond her reach; while her habits of order, and the consciousness of years of trust not abused, make her the best wife a mechanic can choose.

Mr. Trollope makes his Cabinet Minister of small means testify of his parlor-maid that there is not a more respectable young woman in London, and we are sure every reader's experience can recall similar examples. Some people are so unlucky as to know only the pariahs of the profession, and sometimes it is ill luck; but more commonly a course of bad servants implies something wrong in feeling and management: whether this means a want of sympathy, or an obstinate quarrel with the age and a determined adherence to obsolete usage, or a tyrannical imposition of will in the mode of doing things as well as in results. For it is part of modern independence — as it has always been human nature — to prefer choosing for one's self the means by which to attain a given end.

We have discussed servants in their useful rather than their ornamental capacity, for a dozen tall fellows hanging about a house for no other purpose than their master's state can scarcely fail to get into mischief; there is little else for them to do; though here the term "menial" has acquired a meaning which its derivation does not justify. "Swift does not seem to have known the meaning of this word," says Johnson. But a retinue of servants are sure to excite so much envy, and to lay themselves open to so much obloquy, that a word expressing (according to one of its alleged derivations) mere numbers, assisted as it is by the sound, has very naturally slid into a term of contempt. Thackeray, in his plea for servants, endeavors to excuse them in small thefts, arguing, which may be true, that pilfering on a small scale does not necessarily develop into wholesale thieving. We remember that his "Jeames," before his rise in the world, presents Mary Anne with his mistress's gold thimble. In the matter of eatables and drinkables and perquisites there may be, to say the least, strong differences of view as to the rights of property, where, as in London, servants are an enormous body banded together to uphold their privileges; but respectable servants, as a class, are scrupulously honest. The virtue inculcated by the Eighth Commandment is enforced by their public opinion with much more formidable penalties than breaches of that which precedes it; and every other form of vice is more common with them than stealing the spoons.

Of the three classes, — the ready, unscrupulous, loquacious servant of comedy; the faithful, blindly devoted follower, to extreme old age, of fiction; and the more calculating Mary or Thomas of fact and veracious history, — commend us to the last for all practical purposes of use and comfort.

REV. STOPFORD A. BROOKE.

SOME years ago Mr. Stopford Brooke, at that time chaplain to the English embassy at Berlin, charmed and instructed the public by the life of his extraordinary and gifted friend Robertson of Brighton. For literary finish and perfection it was a matchless biography, or only to be matched with Dean Stanley's "Life of Dr. Arnold." Mr. Brooke became the minister of York Street Chapel, and from slender beginnings and a moderate attendance, he has obtained a most legitimate and remarkable success. In the season his chapel presents one of the most vivid spectacles which London can afford, being crowded with the most fashionable and intellectual of audiences. No preacher can succeed better in riveting the attention of an audience. It is easy to be seen that he exercises a peculiar charm over them. The downright earnestness of his manner, the vigor and intensity of his phrases, the poetry, choiceness, and eloquence of his language, the force and originality of his thoughts, mark him out as being the most justly conspicuous of London preachers. Sometimes there is an amount of daring in his speculations, of rhetoric and poetry in his compositions, which would not authorize us in holding him up as a model worthy of general imitation. He is not a preacher who would be at all comprehensible to that mass of poor people for whom preaching is primarily intended. But as a man with a special vocation, and filling a special nook in this great London, we readily discern that he has a work to do which he does well. We were rather uneasy when we saw the announcement of the volume of his sermons for publication.* In the sermon very much depends on the oratory, and Mr. Brooke has a unique kind of oratory which it would be surpassingly difficult to reproduce on paper. But our fears were utterly groundless. We are glad that these sermons are printed, as affording the perusal and reperusal, which his hearers would greatly desire. The literary charm of the work is very great; there are many sentences, many phrases, which will linger long on the reader's mind; but the chief value of the book will lie in its substantive teaching, and its remarkable powers of stimulating inquiry and thought.

Here is a passage which, whether you regard the diction or the thought, is true and touching, and hits off exactly so much the notion of modernisms. "But we have fallen upon faithless times; and more than the mediæval who saw the glint of the angel's wing in the dazzling of the noonday cloud, more even than the Greek who peopled his woods with deities, we see only in the cloud the storehouse of rain to ripen our corn, and in the woods a cover for our pheasants. Those who see more have small cheerfulness in the sight; neither the nymphs nor the angels haunt the hills to us. We do not hear in the cool of the day the voice of God in the trees of the garden. We gaze with sorrow on a world inanimate, and see in it only the reflection of our own unquiet heart. There is scarcely a universally joyous description of nature in our modern poets. There is scarcely a picture of our great landscape artist which is not tinged with the passion of sorrow or the passion of death. We bring to bear upon the world of Nature, not the spiritual eye, but a disintegrating and petty criticism. We do not let feeling have its way, but talk of harmonies of color and proportion, and hunt after mere surface-beauty. We train the eye and not the heart, and we become victims of the sensualism of the eye, which renders the imagination gross, and of an instability of the eye, which, unable to rest and contemplate, comprehends the soul of nothing which we see. It is our sick craving for excitement, — the superficiality of our worldly life, — which we transfer to our relation to Nature. What wonder if Nature refuses to speak to us, and we ourselves are insensible to the wisdom, life, and spirit of the universe?"

Yet we are bound to say that there is much in this most striking and suggestive volume which will subject the author to much criticism, both clerical and lay.

We give one more example of the vivid illustration which Mr. Brooke can import into sermons such as was scarcely ever imported before. "It was my fortune last year, in going from Porcello to Venice, to be overtaken by one of the whirlwinds which sometimes visit the south. It was a dead calm, but the whole sky, high overhead, was covered with a pall of purple, sombre and smooth, but full of scarlet threads. Across this, from side to side, as if dashed by their invisible armies, flew at every instant flashes of forked lightning; but so lofty was the storm, — and this gave a hushed terror to the scene, — that no thunder was heard. Beneath this sky the lagoon water was dead purple, and the weedy shoals left naked by the tide dead scarlet. The only motion in the sky was far away to the south, where a palm-tree of pale mist seemed to rise from the water, and to join itself above to a self-enfolding mass of seething cloud. We reached a small island and landed. An instant after, as I stood in the parapet of the fortification, amid the breathless silence, this pillar of cloud, ghostly white, and relieved against the violet darkness of the sky, its edge as clear as if cut by a knife, came rushing forward over the lagoon, driven by the spirit of wind, which, hidden within it, whirled and coiled its column into an endless spiral. The wind was only there, at its very edge there was not a ripple; but as it drew near our island it seemed to be pressed down upon the sea, and, unable to resist the pressure, opened out like a fan in a foam of vapor. Then, with a whirl which made every nerve thrill with excitement, the imprisoned wind leaped forth, the water of the lagoon, beaten flat, was torn away to the depth of half an inch, and as the cloud of spray and wind smote the island, it trembled all over like a ship struck by a great wave. We seemed to be in the very heart of the universe at a moment when the thought of the universe was most sublime.

"The long preparation, and then the close, so unexpected and so magnificent, swept every one completely out of self-consciousness; the Italian soldiers at my side danced upon the parapet and shouted with excitement. For an instant we were living in Nature's being, not in our own isolation.

"It taught me a lesson; it made me feel the meaning of this text: 'Whosoever loseth his life shall find it'; for it is in such scanty minutes that a man becomes possessor of that rare intensity of life which is, when it is pure, so wonderful a thing that it is like a new birth into a new world, in which, though self is lost, the highest individuality is found. I am conscious now, on looking back, though the very self-consciousness involved in analyzing the impression seems to spoil it, that it is in such a moment, when, as it were, you find your individuality outside of you in the being of the universe, that you are most individual, and most able to feel your being, though not to think of it."

We give these brief citations from Mr. Brooke, because the nature of such a work is best ascertained by quotations, and this is hardly the place where we could formally review the book. But we vehemently exhort our readers to procure the work and study it for themselves. These extracts will as little convey a notion of the author's remarkable system as a brick will tell of a house or a finger of a statue.

MALBONE.*

Is not this Mr. Thomas Wentworth Higginson the same who commanded a negro regiment during the Civil War, and whose narratives of his work and adventures in the Atlantic Monthly attracted general attention by their graphic humor and their picturesque and poetical descriptions? In any case, this bright novelette Malbone is worthy of him, if it is not his. It has much freshness and grace of the kind that it is now perhaps somewhat of a mannerism to call idyllic, a true knowledge of character, great liveliness of delineation, and a very happy humor. As with many of the New England writers, — as with Hawthorne especially, — the reflectiveness and sentiment are a little in excess of the action and the practical interest, giving the tale a somewhat æsthetic and reverish flavor, as if life looked a somewhat far-off thing to the writer, and had been recorded on a retrospect of centuries, or observed from a shadowy and tranquil recess. How strong this peculiarity was in the case of Hawthorne every one has admitted. But it seems to us to belong, more or less, to all the New England literary men, — to Lowell, to Holmes, to Longfellow, to Emerson, and to our present author. It is somewhat strange that the literary type of an eminently practical nation like the Yankees — a nation as yet excelling rather in practical detail than even in broad practical enterprise of the larger kind — should be "so clear, so calm, so still," so like the reflections of life as we see them in an unruffled lake. Yet so it seems to us to be. Except Mrs. Stowe, who has nothing of this peculiarity, we do not remember a single New England author of power and merit who does not produce on the mind the impression of surveying life from a calm, speculative retirement, and of embodying more culture than passion, more reflection than fire or force in his style.

This novelette is certainly a remarkable instance of the same type. The study of character in it is thoughtful and intellectual; the descriptive passages are of the same clear and truthful beauty that we find in Longfellow and Hawthorne; the principal character, from which the story is named, is marked by precisely that type of moral taint to which over-culture and over-refinement is most liable, — such, for instance, as that of which Hawthorne has given us a more elaborate study in the hero of his Scarlet Letter; and the humor which is chiefly expressed in the picture of one clever and eccentric character, the old maiden aunt of the piece, is not the sparkling and overflowing fun of a mind full of the odd paradoxes and contrasts of human life, but the subtler and more sifted humor of fantastic conception elaborated by a playful fancy.

Like so many of the finer studies of the New England authors, this little story conveys the notion of a more perfectly refined, and cultivated, and thinner intellectual atmosphere than even the most refined of our English authors breathe. What the explanation of this phenomenon may be we hardly know; but that Malbone is a new illustration of this finely and somewhat over delicately wrought texture of the New England literature, there is no question. Take the character, for instance, of Philip Malbone, on the weakness and insincerity of which the little tale turns. His heart, says the author, was "multivalve," — that is, could beat separately and sincerely for a dozen not very absorbing objects, and indulge a real tenderness with relation to each. "When he had once loved a woman, or even fancied that he loved her, he built for her a shrine that was never dismantled, and in which a very little faint incense would sometimes be found burning for years after; he never quite ceased to feel a languid thrill at the mention of her name; he would make even for a past love the most generous sacrifices of time, convenience, truth perhaps, — everything, in short, but the present love. To those who had given him all that an undivided heart can give, he would deny nothing but an undivided heart in return. The misfortune was that this was the only thing they cared to possess." And again: "If it was sometimes forced upon him that all this ended in anguish to some of these various charmers, first or last, then there was always in reserve the pleasure of repentance. He was very winning and generous in these repentances, and he enjoyed them so much that they were often repeated."

The study of Philip Malbone is very subtle and skilful. Only, perhaps, the author yields too much to his dislike of this favorite aversion of his, and paints him just at the last (where he denies Malbone even the generosity to have taken upon himself the task of sheltering his victim from the disgrace he had brought upon her) worse than he is or at least much worse than anything for which he has prepared the reader would warrant. That he is selfish enough when he can hide from himself the evil of what he is doing, when he has the plea of a tide of fate to excuse him, is evident; but the impression conveyed is that of a character with sufficient generosity to make a real atonement so far at least as any single act, as distinguished from the habitual self-denial of a life, could make it, for evil clearly and unquestionably of his doing. There is just a touch of over-painting in our author's last outburst against Philip Malbone, when he ridicules the notion that Malbone would have married Emilia had she survived the éclaircissement with her husband, and been able to procure a divorce from him. If the author has painted this character truly before, he paints it too darkly there.

Emilia is a mere sketch, but a graphic one, but we can hardly say the same for the ideal heroine, Emilia's half-sister, and Philip Malbone's betrothed, Hope. This is one of those ideals which the Americans seem so fond of drawing, and in which, to our apprehension, they always fail, — that character of rich, springy, out-door health, "born to tread upon the forest-floor," with an "inexhaustible freshness of physical organization" that "seemed to open the windows of her soul and make for her a new heaven and earth every day," — a character with mental processes of "peculiar and almost embarrassing directness, as if truth had for the first time found a perfectly translucent medium." "Her girlhood had in it a certain dignity as of a virgin priestess or sibyl," — and so forth. All that seems to us the vaguest abstraction, which brings no individual before the mind, but only one of those haunting ideals which possess strongly the American imagination, though destitute of all living detail. Such a form of words as that about Hope's girlhood having a certain dignity "as of a virgin priestess or sibyl," conveys no notion at all to us of any individual, — our acquaintance not having lain much among virgin priestesses and sibyls. And this is the main defect of the story, that the figure of Hope, which is an essential one to the lifelikeness of the whole, is left entirely in the vague abstraction of this favorite American ideal. Kate, the elegant and limited, the skilful in costumes, the darling of her old aunt, the easy, cheery, sensible, self-reliant, little-expecting Kate, is lifelikeness itself, compared with her ideal cousin; but then her picture is not essential to the story, and that of the ideal cousin is.

Yet, after all, what is to our minds the best figure in this lively and graphic little tale is that of the said Aunt Jane, who is an embodiment of all the author's peculiarly playful and fantastic humor. Few sketches of character have pleased us more for a long time than this of the whimsical, sensible, life-enjoying invalid, who "kept house from an easy-chair, ruled her dependants with severity tempered by wit, and by the very sweetest voice in which reproof was ever uttered."

Her habit of never praising her servants, "but if they did anything particularly well, rebuking them retrospectively, and asking them why they had never done it well before," does not belong exclusively to her crisp, kindly, and humorous temperament. But her hatred of everything vague and irresolute, her dismay at small difficulties and pleasure in large ones, her decisive rejection of the temptation which had once presented itself to her to become "monotonously" amiable, — her impatience of stupid people, and her fund of grotesque illustration, are traits which blend into a picture of almost unique freshness and pungency. What can be better than this outbreak against her little servant: —

"I am never tired of anything," said Aunt Jane, "except my maid Ruth. And I should not be tired of her, if it had pleased Heaven to endow her with strength of mind to sew on a button. Life is very rich to me. There is always something new in every season; though, to be sure, I cannot think what novelty there is, just now, except a choice variety of spiders. There is a theory that spiders kill flies. But I never miss a fly, and there does not seem any natural scourge divinely appointed to kill spiders, except Ruth. Even she does it so feebly that I see them come back and make faces at her. I suppose they are faces; I do not understand their anatomy, but it must be a very unpleasant one."

For humor of the playful, fantastic sort, it would be difficult to match this speech, especially the final objection to the ordinary theory of the spider's mission, that the speaker herself never misses a fly; and the picture of the spider making faces at the inefficient maid, a picture so quickly and conscientiously qualified by the honest confession of ignorance as to whether spiders have faces to make or not. It is impossible to conceive a sketch of more graceful and subtle humor of the grotesquely-meditative kind than that of Aunt Jane.

On the whole, this novelette, though imperfect through the vague ideality of the heroine, and not intense in the interest of its plot, certainly belongs to the higher regions of literature. The descriptions of nature are full of accurate observation and poetical feeling; the characters are most of them real, though slight studies; the purity of the tone is so keenly marked that it suggests throughout the sensation of mountain air; and the humor which lights up the little story is genuine and original.

HYPOCRISY.

THERE is much truth in the old story of the drunken or otherwise immoral clergyman who maintained that his exhortations to the virtues which he did not practise were just as profitable as those of his more righteous brethren. He was like a finger-post; he showed the right way perfectly well, although he did not go along it himself. His case was doubtless an extreme case, and he must have been an impudent, hardened fellow; but he had got hold of a truth. It is no answer, as many people think it is, to a man's exhortations, or arguments, or whatever he puts forth, to bid him look at home, or to charge him with hypocrisy because his own conduct is not always in exact conformity with his own doctrine. Hypocrisy in the strict sense, conscious and deliberate pretence in matters of devotion or morality, is, we suspect, a much rarer vice than people think. At all events, it is a charge which, as one easy to bring and hard to disprove, ought not to be brought against any man without very strong grounds. Inconsistency, self-delusion, mere irresolution and weakness, the mere imperfection, in short, of human nature, go a long way to account for a great deal which is often roughly set down as hypocrisy.

The clergyman with whose story we started, whatever else he was, was at all events not a hypocrite. His vices were known to himself and to everybody else; they were openly avowed; though he acknowledged the excellence of virtue and recommended it to the practice of others, he made no pretence of practising it himself. Self-delusion in such a case is quite possible, but for hypocrisy there is clearly no room. But suppose that, instead of impudently avowing his vices, he had simply practised them in secret. Suppose that it was suddenly found out that a man who had always preached good morality, and was supposed always to have practised it, was really a drunkard, an adulterer, a gambler, or whatever the vice may be. We suppose that most people would cry out, What a hypocrite that man has been! Yet the chances are very strongly against his being what they mean by a hypocrite. What they mean is that, without any real feeling of virtue and piety, he pretended to virtue and piety simply for the sake of the gain or reputation which they might bring him. One may doubt whether this is necessarily the New Testament sense of the word "hypocrite"; it is certainly not the necessary explanation of such a case as we have supposed.

A hypocrite, in the original sense of the word, is an actor, and it is quite possible that, in its New Testament use, it may often refer to conduct which may be fairly spoken of as acting, but which is certainly not hypocrisy in the vulgar sense. John Wesley bade one of his preachers to preach a certain doctrine. The preacher had his doubts and scruples; he could not say that he fully believed the doctrine. "Preach it till you do believe it," was Wesley's answer. We may be sure that Wesley did not mean to bid any one to act in a dishonest or what is commonly called a hypocritical way. But he certainly required his disciple to act in a highly artificial way; he called upon him to act a part, to be in the strict sense a ὑποκριτής. Wesley no doubt looked on believing as wholly a moral and not at all as an intellectual process, and he bade a man to learn to believe rightly by believing rightly, as he would have bidden him to learn to act rightly by acting rightly. Still, he was bidding a man to act as if he believed what as yet he did not believe, — a process which differs only in the motive from the act of him who pretends belief for the sake of gain or reputation. So in many other cases, men throw themselves into artificial states of mind, which are put on, as it were, to order, which often prove only temporary, but which still are put on in good faith. What we call making the best of a bad bargain often takes this form. A man finds himself in a set of circumstances which are not of his own choosing; he is forced to a line of conduct which is distinctly against the grain. He is called on to do something which up to that time has been against his feelings, perhaps against his conscience. In such a case he often tries to persuade himself that the unavoidable course is not only a righteous, but a pleasant course. He makes an effort and throws himself into the thing; his voice is louder, his arm is more forward, than the arms and the voices of those to whom the course which to him is new is a matter of long habit or of old-standing conviction. The zeal of new converts has a good deal of this element in it; they have consciously to act a part, while those who are before them are acting naturally and unconsciously; they therefore commonly overdo matters. Or a man has to maintain a position about which he has moral doubts. In such a case it commonly happens that he will be more confident and more inclined to talk big than the man who never had any doubts at all. He is trying not only to persuade others, but to persuade himself at the same time. When a man changes his side in politics or religion, we often hear of his loud professions of unalterable faithfulness to the old cause almost up to the moment of his forsaking it for the new. A cry is generally raised against him as if his professions were simply hypocritical, as if he was simply trying to lay suspicion at rest after his own mind is made up and while he is only waiting for a convenient moment to carry out his plan of desertion. And no doubt it often has been so. But it certainly is not so as a matter of course. It is just as likely that he is on the very edge of making up his mind, but that he has not yet made it up. As long as he has not made it up, as long as he has any doubt, as long as the old system has any chance at all with him, he tries to satisfy himself even more than to satisfy others by talking louder than ever on its behalf.

In all these cases a man is certainly acting as a hypocrite in the etymological sense. He is consciously acting a part, a part which is not natural to him, a part which involves some degree of moral or intellectual inconsistency. But it does not at all follow that he is a hypocrite in the worst sense. He is tampering with his conscience, he is trying to guide his conscience in a certain direction, rather than wilfully disobeying his conscience. A hypocrite in the worst sense either wilfully disobeys his conscience or else has stifled the voice of conscience altogether. And it is strange how easy it is for a man to turn his conscience and his belief in a certain way. Take the case of forced conversions, such as we read of in the history of the Mahometan conquests, or in that of the evangelization of Germany and Scandinavia by Christian emperors and kings. It often happened that the man who embraced Mahometanism or Christianity simply to save his life lived ever after as a very good Mahometan or a very good Christian, sometimes even as a zealous champion and missionary of his new faith. Were such men hypocrites? We feel sure that in their later stages they were quite sincere, that they had in a manner worked themselves into a steady belief of what they had at first embraced only under compulsion. But what was their state of mind when they made their first profession? We suspect that in many cases men found it possible to work themselves into a state in which they could profess their new creed without any conscious lying. It was a very strong case of making the best of a bad bargain. Many no doubt relapsed; they either were shamming at the time of their profession, or else the artificial excitement wore off, and they fell back on their former and more natural state of mind. But there are quite cases enough of compulsory converts cleaving steadily to their new faith to show that the state of mind which we have supposed is not an impossible one.

We may now change the venue from matters of belief to matters of morals, and take the case which we put before of a detected sinner. We have known such cases, and we have known the outcry made, What a hypocrite he is! Now there is really no need to call him anything of the kind. It is very likely that he simply is, what most men are more or less, inconsistent and imperfect. He has a conscience, but he does not always obey it. He knows what is right; he says, if need be he teaches, what is right; but he does not always follow his own precepts. We are not defending him; we are only saying that his fault is a different fault from that of hypocrisy. To have a conscience, but not always to obey it, is, in different degrees, the moral state of the vast mass of mankind. It is the state of all save (we suppose) a few unusually saintly people at one end, and (we suppose) a few desperately wicked ones at the other end.

To be very inconsistent and very imperfect, and to be aware of one's inconsistency and imperfection, whatever it is, is certainly not hypocrisy. Steele was no hypocrite when he wrote the Christian Hero. Leading a vicious life, and wishing to cure himself of his vices, he took the somewhat strange means of shaming himself by writing and publishing a book in which he described a model of ideal piety and virtue. Such a course directly drew attention to his vices. But neither would he necessarily have been a hypocrite if he had striven to hide his vices from the world. It is rather hard to say that a man is pretending to be better than he is simply because he does not wish his imperfections to be found out. To take a very strong case, we could never quite join in the outcry against the Papal Legate in Henry the First's time who harangued against the marriage of the clergy in the morning and was caught in a very discreditable position in the evening. We are far from defending him; all we say is that his sin of the evening does not prove his zeal of the morning to have been insincere. Nay, he might possibly have argued, "I acknowledge my transgression and I regret it; I am ever and anon carried away by the strength of my passions; but meanwhile I am zealously serving the Church. But you married priests are always thinking of your wives and children, and do not serve the Church at all." The weaknesses and inconsistencies of men are endless; let them all have their fair share of blame; but let them not be indiscriminately called by a name which does not belong to all of them. A man is guilty of a particular vice who is perhaps an enthusiast against some other vice very likely not worse than his own. Let him have the fair measure of blame for his own errors, but do not let his zeal for virtue in another quarter be set down as insincere. Let him not even be suspected of trying to atone for the vices to which he is inclined by abstaining from those to which he is not inclined. Nay, more, men's minds and consciences are often so strangely twisted, there is such a power of what Mr. Lecky calls "localizing" principles and feelings, that a man will be indignant against this or that form of a particular vice while he practises other forms of it without scruple.

Such a man is flagrantly inconsistent; we should press the point of his inconsistency as a special argument to convince him, but we should not think of charging him with insincerity simply because he is inconsistent and imperfect. We have often heard, and we have always been pained to hear, really good actions attributed to bad motives simply because the life of the actor was open to objection on other grounds. We will not enter into the theological nature of sin, and the doctrine that he who offends in one point is guilty of all. Such is at least not the doctrine of natural morality, which certainly welcomes whatever is good in any man, even though it may be mixed up with much that is bad.

All the cases which we have mentioned seem to us quite distinct from hypocrisy in the usual sense. In the former class of cases, where a man is certainly acting an artificial, though not necessarily a dishonest, part, the word may be applied in a certain sense. To cases of mere inconsistency and imperfection, however glaring, it should not be applied at all. Strict hypocrisy, the conscious and deliberate pretence to virtues which a man has not and does not care to have, is, we suspect, much rarer than people commonly think.

NED WHISTON'S SWEETHEART.

I. HEARTS AND TARTS.

HAVE you never observed that certain shops seem to have been taken at a long lease by Failure, and underlet to unfortunate speculators, who struggle for a little while to establish a business, and then suddenly vanish? No. 10 Dreary Street, Bedford Square, held this unsatisfactory position in the world of trade. It had been a grocery for three months, when creditors came and removed the stores, leaving nothing behind but a mixed smell of tallow and molasses. A watchmaker had tried to establish himself there, but his strongest magnifying glass, though ever glued to his eye, failed to detect a customer, and no sound was ever heard in his shop but the tic — the tic douloureux — of his merchandise. Of course his affairs were soon wound up. Then a crinoline merchant made an indelicate exhibition of feminine undergarments, without, however, adding to the bustle of the establishment. It was now devoted to refreshment, but stomachic puffs tempted the passers-by as little as the dorsal had done; ginger-beer ruled flat, lemonade was a drag, buns were heavy, and poor Annie Johnstone found the problem of keeping the wolf from the door — the wolf which no king or parliament can extirpate — more difficult to solve daily. She sat behind her little dingy counter writing a letter, with but small chance of a customer coming in to interfere with the work of composition.

"MY DEAR UNCLE WILLIAM, — Papa told me I was never to apply to you, because you had helped him once, and had refused to do so again, and you were displeased because we tried to keep a shop, which indeed has been a very lame attempt, for there is no chance of the shop's keeping us. I disobey him now, because I do not know what else to do. I have not seen or heard of papa for five days, and almost fear that something may have happened to him, though he often has to hide for a little time, because of creditors; for he has not been much more successful in getting to sell coal or wine on commission, or as an agent for insurance companies, than I have been as a confectioner, and he has not brought me any money now for a long time. He hinted to me that he might go abroad, but I hardly think he would have done that without letting me know; and yet he was always so afraid of his letters being stopped, and helping people to trace him, that he may have done it. If the rent is not paid by Monday, I shall be turned out of the house, and then what am I to do? You see, dear Uncle William, I am obliged to write to you, because I have no one else to ask; and if you will not put me in the way of earning my living somehow, I must positively beg, and that would be even more discreditable than selling, or trying to sell, pastry, would n't it? It really is not my fault; I have tried my best, and dined on stale buns for days and days.

"Your affectionate niece,

"ANNIE JOHNSTONE."

She directed this letter to "William Johnstone, Esq., Joss House Villa, Southend," and laid it on the counter before her just as a customer came in, — a very young man, with very shiny boots and hat, brilliant gloves, and a natty umbrella, who saluted on entering in a manner not customary amongst Englishmen, who generally remain covered in a shop, however attractive the mistress of it may be.

"Good morning, Miss Johnstone," said he, in an embarrassed way: "I have come for my luncheon."

If the youth looked embarrassed, the girl looked vexed. She colored over her forehead, and knit her brows strangely, considering how few customers she had, and how great was her need of them. Her reply, too, was as impolitic as the expression of her countenance, being an intimation that she was afraid she had nothing to offer him.

"O," he replied, "I never eat heavy luncheons; just a basin of soup and a glass of sherry."

"I have no soup, and the sherry is out."

"Well, now I think of it, I am tired of soup; I had sooner have a sandwich and a pint bottle of Bass."

"I cannot give you those either," said she.

"O, well," he persisted, "it's of no consequence. Here is some pastry, and I am very fond of pastry; and that, with a bottle of ginger-beer —"

The girl, who had been constraining herself with difficulty, now broke out, "You can get a good luncheon at a dozen places close by!" she exclaimed with uncalled-for vehemence; "why do you not go to one of them?"

"I — I like this best," he stammered. "Your pastry, though not, perhaps, quite what you might call new, seems to agree with me better; or I mean, you know —"

"You come here out of charity!" cried the girl, bursting into tears. "You think I am poor and want custom, and so you come here and try to eat — stuff; and I am sure you go where you can get proper food afterwards somewhere else. It is not my fault if I can't have things nice!"

"O, for goodness' sake! — O, don't cry! O my pretty, — I mean to say, I don't know what I am saying," cried the youth, in great distress. "Well, if you must have the truth, I do not come here for your stale tarts, but because I fell in love with you through the window one day; and every time I have come here I have fallen more and more in love with you; and if you will not love me back, and promise to marry me, I'll — I don't know what I won't do; there!"

Seeing that his charmer did not give any signs of being further offended, but only left off crying, and looked down in confusion, the youth took courage, dropped his gloves into his hat, and his hat on a little round table, and leaned his elbows on the counter over against Annie, who did not draw back; and thus the young people's heads were not separated by any very cruel distance.

"What nonsense," she murmured.

"It may be nonsense to expect you will ever like me," replied the youth; "but it is serious earnest that I have not been able to get you out of my head all this month, try what I would; and all my friends are wondering what is the matter with me. If I have not the chance of getting you for my wife, I do not care whether I pass my examination or not. That is sense, I hope."

"But you are so young."

"I'll bet I am older than you!"

"O, but that is nothing. And then — you are a gentleman."

"And so are you a lady," said the youth. "O, I learned all about you from your father. I saw him leaving this house one day, and a little while afterwards I met him in a smoking-room, and we happened to get into conversation. He told me how he had lost his property in unfortunate speculations, — on the turf and otherwise, — and how, instead of sitting down helplessly, as so many young ladies who have been brought up in luxury would do, you tried to earn a living so pluckily. And that made me love you still more."

"Did you tell my father you knew the shop, and had seen me?"

"Why, no; I did not like to do that."

"Why? — Ah! I know the reason; he borrowed money of you!" cried Annie, coloring with vexation.

"Only a trifle, — the veriest trifle."

"And I cannot even repay that! You see how hopeless and foolish an engagement between us would be."

"No, I don't."

"I have nothing in the world, and no expectations."

"No more have I!" cried the lad, with exultation. "I have nothing in the world, and I have no expectations. Why, we were ordained for each other."

In the course of further parley, it transpired that the young man's name was Edward Whiston; that he was articled to a solicitor, and had just served his time; also, that he had gained applause in private theatricals, and had an idea that his real vocation was the stage, — an evident resource in case Mr. Johnstone, the father, did not turn up, and Mr. Johnstone, the uncle, refused to receive his niece, a state of affairs which would render an immediate marriage prudent. Annie did not quite see the logic of this, but owned that her distress at seeing Mr. Edward Whiston (well, Ned) come in for a bad lunch every other day, was caused by a peculiar objection to receive charity from him, which would not have occurred to her in the case of any other human being. Smith, Brown, Jones, or Robinson might have killed themselves with bad pie-crust, and while wondering at their taste, she would have pocketed their shillings with rejoicing.

Finally, it occurred to Ned Whiston to look at his watch, and the position of the hands drew a whistle of dismay from his lips. "Nearly three!" he cried; "and Jenkins is waiting for my return to go and get his dinner." And with a hurried hand-squeeze he took his departure.

Next day at 1.10 he reappeared, followed by a man bearing a tray, which contained oysters, stout, and slices of cold beef.

"Since it hurts your feelings to feed me with your wares, I have brought my own luncheon," said

Ned, when he and Annie were alone again. "There is double what I can eat, I see; will you not help me out with it?"

I had always a better opinion of Ned Whiston for divining that Annie's larder might be understocked, and providing her with a meal in this diplomatic manner; and Annie, who was faint as well as anxious, appreciated it too. It sounds shockingly unromantic to suppose that eating and drinking can have any connection with the affections, yet there seems an incompleteness about either the friendship or the love upon which the digestive organs have not set their seal.

I do not deny that the more ethereal kiss may be the correct sigillum amoris, but every corner of the shop was visible from the street, and as for asking her lover into the back-parlor while her father was absent, Annie was far too correct a young lady to think of such a thing, and, indeed, Master Ned had not the impudence to hint at an invitation of the kind being welcome. So they ratified their engagement with oysters and porter seated opposite to each other at a little round marble-topped table; and when the meal was concluded, they felt as if they had been acquainted for months.

On returning so late to the office the day before, Ned Whiston had been subjected to troublesome questioning as to what he had been doing with himself all the time; so he took care to leave early to-day, announcing his intention of returning at the same hour on the morrow.

But on the following morning he was sent off to Chester with certain important deeds. That was on the Thursday, and he did not get back till Saturday night; and as he lived at home, some fifteen miles out of town with observant relatives, he could not get away on the Sunday without exciting awkward curiosity; so that it was not till luncheon-time on Monday that he entered Dreary Street with a throbbing heart. The shutters were up at No. 10. Poor Ned felt for a moment as if his heart and lungs had struck work. Was she dead? No, no, impossible. Her father, perhaps; he had disappeared suddenly, and might have committed suicide. The idea of disturbing a recent sorrow made him drop the bell-handle without ringing, and look round for a likely place for information. There was a brush-shop immediately opposite, and the portly dame who kept it was standing in the doorway, eyeing him with a certain curiosity. She had a good-natured look about her, so he crossed the road, and asked her if she knew what was the matter.

"Lor!" exclaimed the woman; "and I who thought you would perhaps tell me: sure you were a friend or relative, or something, I thought, going there most days the last month and more!" And she seemed quite injured.

"I only went as a — a customer," said Ned; "but I have got to take a sort of interest, and so, seeing the shop shut up —"

"I see, I see; you look quite pale; come in and sit down. Lor! I've been a young girl myself, and I remember hearing how Jim was took when he first heard I had the measles. No, it's nothing of that sort; she went away quite well, as far as I could see, only crying."

"She has gone away, then?"

"Bless you, yes; did n't I say so? A gentleman, not her father, came in a cab at twenty-five minutes past ten yesterday morning, or perhaps it might be a little nearer the half-hour; I saw him, because my room looks out on the street, and I was before the glass putting on my bonnet for church. My husband used to go to chapel, and, I believe, prefers it now, only I won't put up with nothing so vulgar. What gentle-folks do you see at chapel? I say to him. Why, look at the carriage company as goes to church, compared to —"

"What aged gentleman?" interrupted Ned.

"Well, middle-aged; or, as he was got up youthful, perhaps we might say elderly. A fine man, though, tall and stoutish, with a light-brown wig, and whiskers dyed to match. Wig and dye I know not natural, because of the crow's-feet; no man ever had such crow's-feet as them without a bit of gray. Well, he got out, and went into the house, leaving the cab waiting; and as I felt a sort of interest in that Miss Johnstone, poor thing, her father being such a regular bad un, I waited too, and gave up my church for once; not but what I hold that it brings luck to —"

"Exactly; I agree with you. And how long did the gentleman stop?"

"Till twelve o'clock, keeping the cab waiting; which would have been much cheaper to have paid the first off, and taken another. And then he came out, followed by Miss Johnstone, who had a box, which the cabman took and put on the roof; and a bandbox and umbrella, which she took inside with her. But first she locked the house-door and took the key out, and as she turned to get into the cab, I saw that she was crying."

That was all the information Ned Whiston could get at the time; but when he revisited the spot later in the day, he found a weazened man with a very sour expression on his face coming out of No. 10, and asked him if he knew what had happened.

"Yes," replied the man; "the father's drowned, and the daughter's hooked it, and I am done out of my rent, — that's what has happened."

II. JOSS HOUSE VILLA.

You are probably under the impression that no one has ever yet adopted the Pavilion at Brighton as an architectural model, and if that is the case, I must request you to dispel the false idea, for Joss House Villa, near Southend, was a reproduction in miniature of that remarkable edifice. When Mr. William Johnstone was a young man and a nominal barrister, it was considered that he bore some resemblance in face and figure to the Prince Regent; and, since nature had moulded him after the fashion of the first gentleman in Europe, he considered it his duty to act conformably; so he dressed himself hideously, attended prize-fights and cock-pits, intrigued, played high, got frequently intoxicated, stuffed his head with a prodigious quantity of scented snuff, and imitated his royal prototype in every other way that his constitution and purse would allow. By the time he was thirty, however, both began to give out, so he wisely determined to retire into the country with a rich wife. Dissolute men are very fond of falling back upon the latter plan for retrieving their broken fortunes, but women are not quite so foolish as satirists make out, and do not always fall in with these prudent little arrangements. Mr. Johnstone, however, was more fortunate; the royal resemblance which had been his bane now proved his remedy, and, coupled with an insinuation that perhaps there might be a natural reason for it, proved too much for the loyal heart of a drysalter's widow, who was not, as scandal reported, quite double her second husband's age, and whose temper was therefore naturally soured by the persistency with which people whom they met on their wedding tour would mistake them for mother and son. After his marriage Mr. Johnstone happily refrained from assimilating his domestic arrangements to those of his royal prototype, but the ruling passion broke out when he came to build a home for himself on a small estate belonging to his wife near the mouth of the Thames, and resulted in the model of the Pavilion alluded to; a style of architecture which suited Mrs. Johnstone also well enough, as, in addition to the associations, more than half the rooms in the building could be used for nothing but the storing up of jams and pickles, the concoction of which articles was the delight of her life.

She managed to preserve herself—whether with sugar or vinegar, I decline to state—for fifteen years after marriage, and then she turned to mould, leaving her husband in a position to set up a grocery, had he been so minded. He was not; neither did he relapse into the sowing of wild-oats, perhaps because his morals had improved, but also because it was doubtful whether the soil would stand a second crop. He visited London only occasionally, and then his flag was pulled down. Hoisting and lowering that flag was his morning and evening amusement. On royal birthdays and coronation days he fired twenty-one small cannon, going from one to another with a red-hot poker, which was quite a sight. Otherwise he vegetated, and differed from a turnip principally in being occasionally bored, and entertaining vague wishes that some eligible woman would look him up and marry him. But the years passed away; George the Fourth became the prey of worms and satirists; a generation sprang up which knew little of that model gentleman, and had the bad taste to dislike that little. Mr. Johnstone could not now have gone about with ten yards of tablecloth round his neck, and coat buttons between his shoulder-blades, without causing the very sheep to baa at him. He modified his apparel, therefore; but his heart clung to the old times, and hugged the old resemblance; so he still had his wig made up in exact imitation of the ex-dandy's hair, still adopted his favorite attitudes, still took scented snuff. With his elder and only brother he had not, of late years, been on good terms. He owed him no grudge for having been born first; he forgave him for selling the small landed estate which had been in the family for a respectable number of years; but when he disgraced the name, by a succession of petty tricks and contrivances for raising a few pounds, and especially when he tried to make a milch cow of him, he quarrelled with him. His enmity dissolved, however, in the news of his death by drowning while crossing over to Jersey, and he hurried to London at once, and brought Annie to his Chinese home with despatch and secrecy. "I am glad to adopt you, my dear," he said; "but I do not want to adopt all your creditors."

It had been a struggle to Mr. Johnstone to break up the ordinary routine of his existence by establishing his niece as mistress of what had now for years been a bachelor home; but it almost always pays to do the right thing, and he was rewarded for his conquest of habit and indolence by being released from the thrall of his housekeeper, a tyrannical, stupid, pilfering, tipling dame, to whom he had not dared to mention his intentions with respect to Annie, which indeed had from the circumstances of the case been necessarily conceived and executed very suddenly, and upon whom this niece of her master's (term of courtesy) burst therefore like a thunderbolt from a clear sky. As Annie was very young and quiet in manner, Mrs. Gobble hoped at first, indeed, to overawe her, but soon finding that she had met her match, her emotions became too much for her, and, combined perhaps with an injudicious amount of nourishment, brought her gout to such a climax, that she could not even play at doing her work, and had to retire.

Annie's society had one curious effect upon her uncle: it resuscitated all his hankerings after a second marriage. For if he was to have a lady at the head of his house, why, he reasoned with himself, should it not be a wife? So a flirtation which had been budding between Mr. Johnstone and Miss Plumtree, of Southend, for the last three years began to throw out decided shoots. It was not so very absurd. Mr. Johnstone was a little over sixty, and Miss Plumtree was a little over forty. Both were comfortably off, and had calm and sober leanings towards matrimony. Miss Plumtree was not only forty, but fair and fat,—just such a figure as the monarch of Mr. Johnstone's soul would have admired; and this fact tended greatly to feed the mature flame. Then there was increased intimacy, for whereas he had only met her occasionally before his niece came to live with him, he now saw her almost daily, a fervent friendship having sprung up between her and Annie.

They were sitting together now in a willow-pattern summer-house, on the brink of a small pond, the lair of a dragon who was supposed to spout, but who followed the example of many gentlemen who are elected into a certain House for a similar purpose, and did n't. It was in the strawberry season, and a fine dish of the fruit stood on the table between them, with which, needlework, and confidential chat, they were beguiling the morning hours not unpleasantly.

"And so you have never heard of him since?" said Miss Plumtree.

"Never," replied Annie.

"Just like all the men, dear: 'Out of sight, out of mind.'"

"Nay, I do not blame him, poor fellow. I do not see how he could have found me out, if he tried ever so, I left so suddenly, so mysteriously."

"O, well," sighed Miss Plumtree, "if he had been his great-grandfather, he would have discovered you somehow; but young men are not what they were; they are so selfish, so listless, everything is too much trouble to them.—And you never hinted anything about it to your uncle?"

"O, no," said Annie; "besides, he does not take hints: you must speak out plainly if you want him to understand your wishes."

"Hum," said Miss Plumtree.

"And then," continued Annie, "he was so young, and not in a position to marry for ever so long; and the acquaintanceship was so short; and his friends would be sure to disapprove; so that altogether, perhaps, it is better as it is."

"And do you love him still, dear?"

"I think I do; he was kind, you see, when I had no one else, and—"

"There, don't cry, dear. Have a strawberry."

Annie recovered her equilibrium, and turned the subject. "I can't think what has happened to Uncle William," she said; "he does take such a funny interest in how I look all of a sudden. He takes in a paper with the fashions in it, and stands looking critically at me with his head on one side, and his eyes screwed up, for minutes together; and then he walks round me gravely, as if I were a horse; indeed, I expect him to say, "Come up; tuck, tuck; come over!" every moment, or to look in my mouth. And if my hair is not done, or my dress cut according to the fashion-plates, he scolds me. And then he takes me over to Southend whenever he hears that a packet is coming in, and walks me up and down that long pier. And he is always on the lookout for concerts or entertainments of any kind we can go to. Can you explain it?"

"I think I can give a guess," said Miss Plumtree; "in fact, I expect that my influence may have something to do with it. The plain truth is, my dear, that he wants to get you married."

"No!" cried Annie, with a jump. "But he told me distinctly, when I first came here, that, though I might expect to be provided for in his will, I must not look for any dowry, or even much of a trousseau, in case I were to marry; and that did not look much like great anxiety on the subject."

"No, dear; but his views have undergone a change. The fact is, that he does your humble servant the honor to wish—"

"O, and you will take him, won't you? It will be so nice to call you aunt, and have you living in the house!" cried Annie, enthusiastically.

"Well, dear," continued Miss Plumtree, "it seemed to me that the opportunity was a good one for advancing your interests, so I refused to give him a definite answer while you were unsettled; not but what I would sooner have you for a companion, of course, but it does not do to be selfish; and as your uncle is inclined to be what we may call careful in his money matters, which is often the case with those who have been somewhat extravagant in youth, I thought a little stimulant to his generosity would be beneficial. Hush! here he comes. Can anything be the matter?"

This possibility was suggested by Mr. Johnstone's face and manner, the former being bewildered, the latter hurried and excited, as he came towards them from his Joss House with an open letter in his hand.

Something the matter? Indeed, there was; nothing less than a threat of losing his late wife's property, and being reduced once more to the straits which had driven him into premature matrimony thirty years before. One of those Doctors' Commons grubbers, who live by holding out that they have discovered something to somebody's advantage, — which generally turns out to be a fraudulent mare's nest, but every now and then — just often enough to tempt fresh flocks of gulls — proves to be a discovery of real importance, — had fished up evidence that the late Mrs. Johnstone had by rights only a life-interest in her first husband's property; and having thereupon discovered the person who, under such circumstances, would be the claimant, he had put himself into communication with him. Said claimant proved indeed to be in the legal profession, which was a disappointment for the grubber; but as there was really something in the evidence he had lit upon, his time was not entirely thrown away.

This was the startling information which was conveyed to Mr. Johnstone in the hard, sharp words of a lawyer's letter, and which he now communicated in his distress to Miss Plumtree and Annie. They cheered him with sanguine speeches; and when he had gathered his wits together, he started for London, to seek an interview with his solicitor.

That acute gentleman informed him that there seemed to be really something in the claim which was set up, but that it would take a deal of legislation to prove it, and, so far as he could see, it was odds on the man in possession eventually winning the day. But still, if an advantageous compromise were to be suggested, it might be as well to take it into consideration.

So Mr. Johnstone took to walking for hours about the garden of Joss House Villa with his eyes bent on his toes, and his hands clasped behind his back, lost in thought, and muttering at intervals, "Advantageous compromise."

He was accustomed to spread a silk pocket-handkerchief over his head after dinner, and take forty winks, — at the rate of one wink to two minutes; but his slumbers now were strangely disturbed. He would turn and mutter, and his mutterings, to the excitement of Annie's curiosity, invariably formed some part of the words "Advantageous compromise!"

III. THE ADVANTAGEOUS COMPROMISE.

Miss Plumtree and Annie Johnstone sat in the same queer summer-house overlooking the dragon in the chickweed, employed in the same description of needlework, the advance of the year being shown by a basket of apricots which stood in the place of the strawberries. Mr. Johnstone sat near them in silent abstraction. At intervals, indeed, he would tilt his chair forward to bring his hand within range of the mellow fruit, of which he was devouring a choleraic quantity; but he seemed to do so mechanically, as if he did not quite know what he was about; and indeed, while his palate was engaged with the apricots, his mind was absorbed in contemplation of his position.

"That fine, that remarkably fine woman," he said to himself, as his eyes rested admiringly on Miss Plumtree, "will not marry me until that girl is off my hands, which is less likely to happen than ever, now that it is doubtful if I can give her, or even leave her a penny. And yet, if these fellows really manage to take away my money, — and there is no knowing what lawyers may not do in that way, — it will be an extra reason why I should marry a woman with a nice competence to make up. I wonder how George the Fourth would have acted under similar circumstances? But bah! how could he possibly have been placed in them? When a king has his property taken from him, he does not go to law; he fights, or rather other people fight, which is better still, and settle the matter that way."

His meditations were interrupted by a servant bearing a card, who told him that a gentleman wished to see him.

"Where have you shown him?"

"Into the grand music-hall," replied the girl.

Too much flurried to say a word to either of the ladies, Mr. Johnstone hastened to the grand music-hall, an apartment fifteen feet by thirteen, where he found a young man.

"The — ah! — the claimant, I believe?" said Mr. Johnstone, glancing from his visitor to the card he held in his hand.

"Yes," replied the other. "The course which I have taken, in calling upon you personally, may seem somewhat strange, especially for a lawyer; but there has been some mention of the possibility of a compromise; and to tell the simple truth, you have been in possession so long, and the information which enables me to contest your rights has come from so disreputable a quarter, that I am rather ashamed of my position, and would prefer settling the matter amicably to commencing a long course of litigation.

"A very professional view of the case, I own, but I beg you to believe that I should have no such scruples if I were acting for a client. It is a delicate matter, however, to make the first approaches towards a compromise in writing, because, if your opponent is unwilling to entertain it, he may take it as an acknowledgment of weakness, and become confirmed in the strength of his case; or he may find a weapon in some sentence of your letter which may be turned against you. So I have determined to sink the lawyer. I am only a very young one, and call upon you personally to talk the matter over quietly, and see if you are inclined to meet me half-way. Of course, you will commit yourself to nothing without consulting your solicitor."

"I am no great friend to litigation myself," said Mr. Johnstone; "and if you can show me that your claim is really a good one, I am ready to listen to what you have to propose."

The young man then commenced translating the case from jargon into English; and when his auditor seemed to have a pretty clear idea of it in all its bearings, he told him that he had sooner the first sketch of a compromise should come from him.

"Are you married?" cried Mr. Johnstone, his eyes brightening with a sudden idea.

"No."

"Then, by George!" slapping his thigh, "why not marry my niece?"

"You do me great honor, I am sure," stammered the young man. "So unexpected! so sudden! No idea of marrying, unless — Besides, I have not the pleasure of knowing the lady; in fact, was not aware you had a niece."

"O, you shall soon know her," cried Mr. Johnstone; "she is in the garden. Come and be introduced." And he led the way towards the summer-house, his visitor following with a face of comic perplexity.

"Marry another; perhaps afterwards to find her, — never!" he said to himself.

"Annie," said Mr. Johnstone, "let me introduce you to — Holloa!"

No wonder he, as well as Miss Plumtree, was astonished, for the stranger cried out; "Annie, my Annie, is it possible!" and rushed forward to seize her hand, which she gave him with a little cry of "Ned!"

"Why, Annie, have you met Mr. Whiston before?"

"Yes, uncle."

"O yes, sir," said Ned Whiston; "and when she disappeared from Dreary Street so mysteriously and suddenly, I was in despair. I have looked for her everywhere; I advertised in the sensation column of the Times, not by name, of course, but so that she might understand."

"We have it sent the second day, and the supplement does not come with it."

Well, I expect that you do not want the whole story over again, so we may omit the rest of the conversation. Everything was arranged satisfactorily. Ned Whiston, who was doing a respectable and yearly increasing business, married Annie when the peaches came in; a nice sum was paid down on their marriage, and the remainder of the property secured to them on Mr. Johnstone's death, subject to an annuity to be paid to his widow, if he left one.

A month after the young people had been settled in their new home, Mr. Johnstone and Miss Plumtree were quietly tied together; and the first thing the former did, after returning to Joss House Villa, was to walk into the kitchen and put the poker in the fire.

"What are you about, dear?" inquired his bride.

"I am going to fire a wedding salute, — twenty-one guns," replied her husband. And he did.

OXFORD AS IT IS.

To the anxious parent unable to decide whether he is or is not right in committing the plastic material of his son's nature to the all-moulding forces of a university career, and who finally, not without vague misgivings, excited by the remarkable stories that he has heard as to the way in which Oxford has been instrumental in shipwrecking the hopes of many a promising young man, intrusts his charge to the critical influences of academical existence; to all those who know Oxford only as it is depicted in the pages of flimsy novelists and sensational playwrights; to those, in short, who have formed their impressions of the old university town upon the basis of the strength of loose intelligence conveyed to them second or third hand, and who may care about correcting them by reference to the standard of reality and truth, the remarks, which we shall have to make in this paper on the subject of Oxford as it is, will be not merely, considering the fact that the present month witnesses the inauguration of the academical year, seasonable, but, in view of the insight which it is to be hoped we may give them, and the errors which we may tend to remove, profitable and valuable as well. Precisely in proportion as the class from which the colleges of Oxford are annually recruited with undergraduates has increased, will the importance of this theme have increased also, and the circle of interests to which it necessarily appeals have become enlarged. It seems somewhat remarkable that the time which the champions of that sonorous war-cry should have selected for demanding the nationalization of the universities, should be above all others the present, when the ideal condition of things so clamorously and unceasingly shouted for is infinitely nearer attainment than it ever was before. Assuredly if by nationalization is meant a gathering together of the representatives of every grade and order in our social economy, from the highest to the lowest, within our academic walls, nationalization is pre-eminently the feature already existing in the Oxford of to-day.

Happy is the nation which has no history; happy would it be for Oxford, and for those who, for whatever reason, are interested in her, if she had never attracted the attention of the writers of flimsy novels and fashionable romances. By these she has been monstrously caricatured at every turn. She has suffered alike at the hands of friend and foe, and those who would have wished her best have misrepresented her most. We all know the kind of view which authors of this type have delighted to give of the every-day existence of the average undergraduate. As we recall it to our mind there float before us visions of apartments gorgeous with mirrors and luxurious with velvet, replete in every corner with articles of virtu from the East and delicate knick-knacks from Turin. The atmosphere is pervaded by a rich fragrance of rare exotics, and there, languidly stretched on a subtly-devised couch, in the very heart of this chamber of Sybaris, this bower of roses, reclines the youthful hero of the spot, the master of the academic revel, wearied by the nightly dissipation of his extravagant career, surrounded by companions encrowned as to their heads with metaphorical laurel-wreaths and figurative roses, sipping the perfect produce of some price-less vintage. Or we may change the scene and contemplate a different feature in the work of these remarkable sketchers of ordinary Oxford life. If one of this order of novelists has desired to introduce us to the night-side of academic usages, he has given us a meretriciously graphic painting of what goes on in these several splendid chambers towards the small hours. He has lifted the curtain, and we have gazed upon a youthful band of academic revellers plunging in each maddest excess which their inflamed imagination could conceive. We have been told of flushed faces and high play; of hair dishevelled, and of prospects ruined; of fearful losings and nefarious winnings. Dark pools of Burgundy have stained the Brussels carpet on the floor: there has been a reckless waste of material, which would have supplied the most elaborate supper; profusion, prodigality, and vice,—this has been the trinity of features held up by these annalists of the impossible to our contemplation. Or supposing the ingenious writer has desired, for some reason or other, to contrast this mode of undergraduate life with another species of existence, and to introduce to us the reading man of the period,—what a dilapidated picture of studious mortality have we not had! Could we conceive of a more emphatic caution to young men in general not to go and do likewise? Morning, noon, and night this creature is perpetually poring in his cloistered cell over dusty old tomes and recondite treatises, which one enthusiastic lady represents him as having “disentombed among the archives of the Bodleian,” it being one of the rules of the Bodleian Library, by the by, that no volume belonging to it shall be removed from the premises. As for his social traits, how should he have any, seeing that his whole existence is passed exclusively in his own room? He is a youthful anchorite,—a complete troglodyte. And what is the pinnacle of ambition which he is allowed to reach? In due time he gains, of course, a double first class,—let us remark, en passant, that writers of this order always appear to think that a double first makes a man twice as good a classical scholar as a single first, and that nothing more is wanted to confer the dual honor in question save a knowledge of “Aristotle’s Ethics” and other germane subjects standing towards that displayed by less gifted youths in the relation of five to one. He is waited on in the dingy little attic, already referred to, by the members’ whole tutorial staff of the college—which comprises all the fellows, it being a necessary sequence, in the opinion of these novelists, that the fellow should also be a tutor—one fine morning, who request that henceforward he will become one of themselves, and reap the fruits of the same endowments as those which they enjoy.

Immediately he is caught up, as it were, in a cloud, and the episode terminates, for the present, with his apotheosis in the common room, there to make Greek puns, and to endeavor to recruit his nerves, shattered by much study, on the celebrated old college port wine. Probably, however, all the port wine which was ever drunk on a “gaudy day” in the most bibulous of Oxford colleges, would not suffice to repair the ravages which a too lavish consumption of the nightly oil in the past has made upon the studious hero; for the author or authoress, as the case may be, by way of pointing out a melancholy moral to all studiously disposed youths, generally kills off the newly made fellow before the curtain falls, and the desperately hard-reading man in the first volume is, in the majority of examples, represented as a corpse in the third. It is only the other day that a novel, in which nearly all these conditions were exactly fulfilled, was written and published, the author being, we believe, or professing to be, a member of one or other of the two great English universities.

Now, stupidly monstrous and unnatural—and we must confess that it was the stupidity of the piece which impressed us infinitely more than a conviction of its tendencies moral or immoral—as Mr. Boucicault’s drama of “Formosa,” which all persons who happen just now to be in London are crowding to see, it is nothing more than a reductio ad absurdum of this most vicious habit of misrepresentation of the facts of university life. If Mr. Boucicault has fallen into a few additional absurdities more or less than those ordinarily perpetrated by the writers of such books as “Charlie Villars,” that is simply due to the circumstance that his ignorance has compelled him to draw somewhat more largely upon his imagination. Energetically as Oxford men, young and old, and all who have the interest of Oxford at heart, ought to protest against Mr. Boucicault’s tissue of dramatic monstrosities, as against a series of libels upon the character of undergraduates in general, and the aquatic undergraduates in particular, they are by no means more objectionable than the subtler and less extravagantly glaring misrepresentation which finds favor with fashionable novelists.

Indeed, by reason of this very fact their danger is probably much less. The calumnious caricatures of a playwright, who would wish his audience to believe that the university crew is trained by a prizefighter,—that its members invariably walk about the streets of London in straw hats and white flannels,—that a course of frantic debauchery does not sufficiently interfere with the most rigidly self-denying ordinance of training, to prevent the stroke of the boat doing his work on the day of trial, so as to enable his companions to win the race in admirable style, are not likely to carry with them any large amount of popular conviction. The world has heard too much lately of the abstemious austerity of living to which the selected crews of Harvard and Oxford had to submit before they engaged in the contest of the 27th of last August, to believe that victory on the Thames is compatible with orgies in the Haymarket, and nights spent on the sofas of boudoirs in a cottage ornée at Fulham.

It is somewhat surprising, too, that this literary or dramatic passion for investing our academic youth with vices more “splendid” than, as a class, they ever possessed,—for surrounding them with a halo of purely fictitious iniquity,—and for portraying them in the gaudy colors of a perfectly spectral mode of life, should still retain any attraction whatever. As we have said, within the last few years the pale of Oxford has become extended to an unprecedented degree. Its mysteries have been not indeed violated, — that is not the word, but certainly divulged sub aulis. The existence which is passed within those cloistered walls — if there still lingers around it any charm of romance — has ceased to be anything of a secret: intus et in cute novimus; the world knows or might know exactly how the mass of our undergraduates live, and that if their existence is not passed Diogenes-like in tubs, college rooms are yet very far from supplying an adequate reproduction of the social usages of the island of Cyrene.

Yet, in spite of all this, it is not so very long ago that "tutors of thirty years' standing" seized their pen and wrote to the papers a series of remarkable epistles conveying the surprising intelligence that the great proportion of our lads at Oxford were proceeding to ruin with the utmost rapidity and the most unswerving certainty, by means of that particular avenue of which a greensward, a betting-ring, and a betting-book are the sure symbols; that not merely were these youngsters in the habit of living at a rate which their allowances and the incomes of their fathers failed altogether to justify, but that it was their systematic practice nightly to lose at cards sums which would make respectable gamblers open their eyes; and that throughout the whole of the racing season study was impossible on the banks of the Isis, because the young gentlemen who ought to be busy with their Latin and Greek, were wholly and solely occupied with making up their books for the great events of the year. Indeed, these tutors, who gave us to understand that they were in possession of the accumulated experience of three decades, vouchsafed us intelligence more alarming even than this. It was no such uncommon thing, they positively assured us, for young men, infants and undergraduates, to be either part or entire owners of race-horses, — a circumstance which they declared was perfectly well known to the college authorities, yet winked at by them. In fact, these gentlemen, with the air of men who had a great public duty to perform, pretty plainly let us understand that to send a lad to Oxford at the present day, was but to put him upon that broad and downward-slanting road which leads to destruction, — simply to cut for him the first turf of what Mr. Boucicault, à propos to his new play, calls the "The Railroad to Ruin."

Presently, however, a fact came out which shed a new light upon the alarming communications of these experienced educationalists. That their remarks should not have been allowed to pass unchallenged, was only natural; that the tutors of thirty years' standing should not have turned round, and endeavored to vindicate the veracity of their original strictures upon what, by a monstrous abuse of an ancient and classical tongue, they chose to call "the gambling diathesis," was perhaps equally natural. In the course of so doing, however, they let escape them an admission which enabled people to account for the surprising statements originally made in an altogether new manner. According to their own confession, the erewhile academical authorities had not the slightest personal experience of Oxford at the present day. Tutors, indeed, of thirty years' standing is just what they were not; that was the extent of their seniority probably as graduates, and according to their own account fifteen or twenty years had elapsed since they were actually engaged in the work of college tuition. They were guilty, in fact, at once of an absurd logical fallacy and a most mischievous moral anachronism. They had proceeded upon the assumption that an order of things which they recollected in their own time to prevail in what were probably only a few isolated instances, must prevail universally in the present day as well, — that the social features of Oxford in this current year of grace must be identical with the social features of the Oxford of the past, — and that undergraduate extravagance must be in general now precisely what in a few particular instances it once was.

It is thirty years since; and it is precisely because the period which these newspaper correspondents now in view bears that remote date, that their remarks upon Oxford were absolutely worthless, and their much-vaunted experience altogether irrelevant and inapplicable.

It is almost impossible to over-estimate the magnitude and the importance of the change which has come over the social condition — and it is to the social side of Oxford that we shall entirely confine ourselves here — in the course of the last twenty-five, ten, nay, even five years. Very possibly such beautiful glimpses of studious and simple undergraduate life as Sir John Coleridge has given us may not be perfect specimens of the average existence which these young gentlemen actually lead. If the ideal which Wordsworth proposed and which he immortalized in felicitous diction, "Plain living and high thinking," be not in both its factors fully realized, there is certainly in the Oxford of the present day an infinitely nearer approach to one of them than there ever was. "Plain living" is gaining ground, as a principle of daily conduct, rapidly upon the banks of the Isis. Academic extravagance and the superfluities of academic luxury are fast disappearing, — swiftly ceasing to be salient characteristics of the place and of its inhabitants. It is important for readers of this article to remember that we are speaking from as close, accurate, and as personal a knowledge of the Oxford of the present day, and of the Oxford of ten years since, as it is perhaps possible to possess. But our object in writing is practical: and being such we can have no reason "to extenuate, or ought set down in malice." Let those persons who knew Oxford fifteen years since, or even those who have not been very closely en rapport with it during the last four or five years, renew their acquaintance with it now. They will assuredly find that the university revisited is a place wholly changed in a vast multitude of respects from what it once was. Why, for the truth of this remark you need not extend your inquiries beyond the Oxford tradesman. If you put up at the Mitre, as you probably will do, — for amid much alteration the comfort of the Mitre as a hostelry remains unaltered, — the very waiters, who will probably recognize your face, — the hostess of the Mitre is extremely Conservative in the matter of waiters, — will inform you, as they lay your cloth for dinner, or take your orders for breakfast, that things are vastly different from what they once were.

"The University's quite changed, sir," remarks the trusty William; "none of the old lot, sir, up at all: quite a new set of young men"; and William says these last two words in a somewhat contemptuous tone, that contrasts very much with the "gentleman" of the old days. "Can't understand it at all, sir. As for dinners, we don't have one where we used to have ten. Hunting! there's no hunting at all, sir. Strikes me that all the gentlemen of the sort we used to have must go to Cambridge now. Depend upon it, sir, the University's ruined. What wine will you have, sir?"

And your order given, the faithful William whisks off, leaving you to reflect upon the melancholy fact of the decadence of the academic halls which old association makes you love.

Perhaps you think it well, not that you wish to throw any discredit upon the somewhat sweeping statement, and the Cassandralike vaticination of the head waiter at the Mitre, somewhat to extend the circle of your investigations and to judge for yourself. Or you may choose, for reasons of your own, to interrogate some of the tradesmen whose imposing windows line the High Street. In the spirit of the thing you find that they one and all tally as accurately as possible with William's assurance. Non sumus quales cramus, — that is the one unvarying burden of the aggregate of their collected replies. The undergraduate you rapidly discover, vulgaris species, is not the money-spending, fast-going, devil-may-care young fellow that he once was. The livery-stable keepers tell you that their occupation is nearly gone. Charles Symonds, — his name has become historical, — shaking his head the while in the Burleigh-like manner peculiar to him so far back as mortal memory can reach, beneath the arched entrance to his stables in Holywell Street, informs you that "Men don't hunt and can't ride as they once did." All of which intelligence, saddening though it is to these gentlemen themselves, must be welcome enough, you reflect, to the parents who send their sons to Oxford, not to learn how to keep up with hounds, but to pass their examinations, imbibe a certain amount of culture in the course of preparation for their degree, live economically, and quit the University out of debt.

Now all these replies, whether from head waiters or from tradesmen, strike you as most significant, and so assuredly they are most significant. The conclusions which they suggest you find entirely corroborated by the result of inquiries and observations elsewhere. Renew your personal acquaintance with the undergraduate tribe, — and as the undergraduate still retains his hospitable instincts, though on a somewhat limited scale, you will have no difficulty in doing this, — and you will speedily and inevitably notice the prevalence of a very different régime from that which existed in the days of the Consulship of Plancus. There is no doubt about the youngsters having become ten times more quiet and studious than you knew them once to be. The conviction on their parts that a certain amount of reading really ought to be done before lunch has decidedly gained ground. It is generally acknowledged that unlimited billiards is a bad thing. It is universally admitted that a man ought not to get plucked if he can get through, and that it is well to stretch a point, and not quit the University without having taken honors in at least one of the schools. Hot luncheons, you notice — fearfully seductive allurements to systematic idleness — have almost entirely gone out. As for suppers, those most fatal snares of profuse academic expenditure in the days gone by, are hardly ever heard of. There is no demand for matutinal soda-water, as in the days of Mr. Verdant Green. College quads have ceased to resound with discordant melodies at night. To cut a lecture is quite exceptional. As for stealthy expeditions to town, they are very seldom carried out. Van John and Loo, you find, are by no means the institutions that they once were; and as for the "gambling diathesis," about the only noticeable signs of it are quiet whist at fourpenny points. If men get proctorized for appearing after dusk in non-academical costume, they don't turn round and tell that official that if he will call in on them to-morrow he will find some devilled anchovies at lunch, and a hand at écarte; they merely apologize, and go home to their colleges trembling and quaking at the thought of the morrow's interview.

No doubt instances occasionally there are when this even tenor of average undergraduate virtue is broken by the revelation of some abnormal undergraduate deflection from the straight path of propriety. Some one or other "runs a mucker," gets into debt, gets rusticated, and finally has to be taken away by the father whom he has almost ruined, and whose heart he has almost broken. But the doctrine of averages is of universal application, and if you would form a fair estimate you must argue from the practices of a majority, not of a distinct minority. Now the picture which we have drawn of the modern undergraduate, of his way of thinking and his way of living, is perfectly accurate. No doubt this young gentleman is occasionally priggish and conceited, full of insufferable airs, and imperatively requiring the wholesome discipline of a punctual course of snubbing. In the main, however, the undergraduate of the present day is a very promising specimen of a healthy young Englishman. He is manly and courageous. Athletic sports flourish with unabated vigor at Oxford, and find with the Oxford undergraduate as much popularity as they ever did. The lad is as good a cricketer as ever, and the art of that fatally long workmanlike stroke, which seems destined to win Oxford an interminable series of victories on the river, has by no means been lost. The only thing is that upon the manly materials and prowess of the Oxford undergraduate have been very generally grafted new habits of economy and study. We absolutely search in vain, in the majority of Oxford colleges, to discover the existence of the rowing rowdy sets which once gave them their tone.

Now how has all this change in the current practices of the University — and a change undoubtedly of great magnitude it is — been accomplished? We believe that there are certain obvious circumstances to which it may be referred. In the first place, within the last few years a very remarkable alteration has taken place in the personnel of the undergraduate body. The number of those who are the sons of parents of position and of wealth, are not now, as they once were, in a majority, but in a distinct minority; and it is the majority which will naturally give the tone to the community. The number of open scholarships and the energetic measures which the various college authorities have taken to put down all superfluous expenses — resulting in the most veritable minimizing of the necessary costs of a university career — have placed a university education within the reach of an immense class to whom it was formerly denied. Now we must say frankly that we entertain no particular affection to the unattached student scheme; but we must say, with equal frankness, that there are certain unquestionable benefits which, directly or indirectly, it has been instrumental in producing

It is a manifestation of precisely the same spirit as that which has brought about the measure to which we have alluded that induced, in the first place, the colleges to reduce their tariffs; and it was the rivalry which the unattached scheme has practically constituted which compelled them to reduce these charges still more. To make Oxford perfectly national, all that was required was to make it reasonably economical. This has now been done, and the consequence is that, seeing the number of college scholarships and school exhibitions which have ceased to be close, and invite the most catholic sort of competition, Oxford is accessible to every lad in the land whom it is likely to benefit.

This is saying much, but it is not saying too much. If the necessary social expenses of Oxford have been diminished to a minimum, so, too, have the equally necessary expenses of tuition and education. It must be remembered that the old generation of don, — the old race of college tutor, — who went through their lectures anyhow, and cared nothing how it was conducted, so long as they got it over, has completely died out. That was an order of things under which it was impossible for a student to pass successfully and honorably his examination without securing special private assistance in his studies. Then a private tutor — and the expense which a private tutor involved was heavy — was a necessity. Now we have a new tribe of college fellows and tutors — young men who are up to their work, and who are energetic in their execution of it — who spare no pains so long as their duty is done, and who will devote any time that the industrious undergraduate likes to ask of them to private supervision of his work. College lectures may once have been a sham, they are now a reality. The college tutor may at one time too often have been a man whose main object was to shirk his work: now he is a man whose one object it is to perform that work honestly and efficiently. Parents often ask to know how is it that I have to pay for a private tutor for my son? We will tell them how it is. It is by no means too much to say that the only instances in which, in all the best colleges at Oxford, private tuition is necessary, are those of exceptional and abnormal crassness or unmitigated indolence. If a lad is the victim of the former, he never ought to have been sent to Oxford at all; if of the latter, he has no right to be kept there.

But this is not the only step which the college authorities of Oxford have recently taken towards an economical reform. If they have almost wholly enabled the student to dispense with the necessity of private tuition, they have also enabled him to dispense with the necessity of going outside his college walls for the purchase of certain articles which he could previously only procure at shops.

For the wares of grocery, &c., the colleges have themselves opened their own emporia. That the movement is very much the reverse of popular with the town is scarcely to be wondered at; and we may remark that we are not entirely convinced as to the prudence or necessity of the step. The sole cause which has compelled the tradesmen of Oxford to charge higher prices for their goods than those which the colleges charge under the new order of things, has been the long-credit system. Once have this abolished, and there is not a tradesman in Oxford dealing in such commodities who would not gladly consent to supply undergraduates with the articles that they now purchase of their colleges at precisely the same price. We make these remarks because it is of the utmost importance that between the University and the town a good understanding should exist. If, however, by the plan which they have adopted the college authorities should have dealt the first real blow at the long-credit system, they will have been instrumental in conferring a benefit upon all Oxford undergraduates and the parents of all Oxford undergraduates which it is impossible to exaggerate.

We have sufficiently exemplified the change which has taken place at Oxford, and have given what appear to us the main causes of that change. Briefly to summarize, what we have said comes to this: the days of Oxford as an aristocratic institution are over, consequently the vices of Oxford as such have disappeared; hence the alarm which parents are apt to feel at first sending their son "to study learning on the Isis" is mainly groundless. Oxford is rapidly becoming essentially middle-class, — middle-class in all her social ideas, and middle-class in most of her views of life. She possesses, and will henceforward possess, the faults and the excellences of a middle-class institution; and the faults of a middle-class institution are not those on which fashionable writers and ignorant playwrights dwell. We say nothing as to our opinion on the entire desirability of the change: we only chronicle it as a fact. Five years ago a great middle-class college in Oxford, such as that which Queen's for instance, has become, would have been an impossibility. But we have Queen's, and we know that the impossibility is a fact. What the pious Eaglesfield would have said, could he have witnessed the respectable assemblage of middle-class youths who congregate in the hall for their daily dinner is another question. We must accept circumstances as they are; and, from its senior tutor down to its freshest freshman, Queen's is the centre and shrine of everything which is middle-class. Now, we believe that Queen's may be taken as a fair type of the tone which the whole university a few years hence will assume. And yet there are persons who profess surprise that the political opinions of resident Oxford are Liberal.

We should have been glad to have said something on the subject of the intellectual aspect of Oxford, — its features and its pitfalls. But this is scarcely the place. Scepticism, if scepticism there be, is but a transient phase, not a permanent condition, and herein many anxious parents may take refuge. What we have mainly wished to do here, is to point out the absurdity, the misrepresentations of the Oxford of to-day, — to demolish the idola which may or must prevail in the popular mind concerning her, and to show the social condition of the University, not as it was, but as it is.

FOREIGN NOTES.

LOUIS NAPOLEON is superintending a cheap edition of his "Life of Cæsar" for general distribution.

THE Belgravia Annual for 1870 will contain a story entitled "Sir Philip's Wooing" by the mysterious Babington White. Madam Braddon also contributes a tale to the same number.

LORD RUSSELL was the last visitor whom Lady Palmerston received at Brocket, and the last person with whom she had lengthened conversations. The visit was proposed by Lord Russell, who desired to confer with Lady Palmerston as to the memoir from Lord Palmerston's papers on which Sir Henry Bulwer is engaged.

GARIBALDI is preparing a work which will, it is said, throw some light upon many political matters that have been but partly understood. The theme, if not the title, of the book is, "Rome in the Nineteenth Century."

THE burial of Lady Palmerston in Westminster Abbey has been in fulfilment of the condition on which she consented to Lord Palmerston being buried there, viz. that her own remains should be placed by his side.

BULWER'S "Last Days of Pompeii," which has so often furnished the libretto of an opera, is once more put to use by MM. Nuitter and Joncières for the Lyrique. Originally it stood as La Nydia, but now it is to be called Pompéi.

LA BELLE HÉLÈNE has again been revived in Paris at the Variétés, with M. Dupuis and several members of the original cast. But the new Hélène, Mlle. Aimée, does not please the Parisians. Anything less strong than Schneider is not to their taste.

M. ARMAND, a French savant, has stated to the Academy of Sciences that he has discovered a sure antidote to nicotine in the common watercress. It destroys the poisonous effects of nicotine, and yet does not alter the aroma of tobacco. A solution of watercress may therefore be employed for steeping the leaves of tobacco, and would thus divest them of their noxious properties, and, moreover, a draught of the same will act as a sure antidote to nicotine. In the face of this important discovery, anti-tobacco societies will no longer have any excuse for the affectionate interest they have hitherto displayed in the health of smokers, or for the lavish abuse they have so freely bestowed upon their victims. Instead of tracts, the anti-tobacconists should now distribute watercresses.

THE Gaulois gives a detailed account of the Emperor's study at St. Cloud, which is a small room containing a mahogany secretaire, some arm-chairs, and some of Panama straw. The room has but one ornament, and that is a drawing of Gustave Doré, — executed, if my memory serves me, during the visit of that artist to Compiègne, whence he was recalled to Paris by a telegram from Madame Rossini announcing her husband's death. The result of Doré's return to town was the painting, after death, of the mighty composer, which picture is now exhibiting in London. To paint that portrait Doré spent seven hours by the bedside of his late friend and steady admirer. The only works of art, besides the drawing by Doré, in his Majesty's study, are two small pictures of the Empress and of the Prince Imperial, copied from Franck's photographs, and an exquisite portrait of Queen Hortense.

THERE are few persons who have not at some time or other experienced the inconvenience of driving up and down a street on a dark night, with the assistance of a probably stupid and possibly surly coachman, in search of an invisible door-number. A French chemist, struck by the unpleasantness attendant on these nocturnal explorations, has invented a method of rendering the numbers of houses and names of shops as easily visible by night as by day. It consists in rubbing the figures and letters with a certain phosphoric paste, which, though not discernible in the daylight, will in the dark shine with perfect distinctness. The application would only require renewing about once a month, and involves a very trifling expense. A commission has been appointed to report on the desirability of adopting this proposal. Certainly a row of houses numbered in characters of fire would present a curious and striking coup d'œil.

AN enterprising individual at Berlin has submitted the following plan to the authorities: He proposes to board over all the gutters on each side of the streets and this roadway, three or four feet wide, is to be the future velocipede high-road of the city. A thousand tricycles are to be placed on it, each with a practised driver dressed in a neat uniform, who will undertake to conduct one person with letters, parcels, &c. along this road. As velocipedestrians always drive straight room to turn is not required, and when the road is free it will serve as a footpath. A small charge for passengers, parcels, and letters will, it is estimated, give a fair return for the cost of construction. He argues that, besides the general convenience of his plan, it will be a great advantage to Berlin to bridge over the gutters, as they are at present very unsightly, and are liable to be frozen over in winter. Moreover, the establishment of footpaths will facilitate the better regulation of the street traffic, and effect a great saving in the expense now incurred by cleaning the streets. The tricycles are to have a little canopy in winter, an umbrella being a sufficient protection in the summer. The projector calculates that a speed may be attained equal to that of an ordinary carriage at least, and guarantees all possible convenience and safety in the transit.

DANTON, the celebrated caricaturist who died recently at Baden-Baden, had a wonderful power of modelling from memory. After one long look at his subject he could go to his studio and make a bust perfect in its resemblance. Numbers of anecdotes are told of his feats in this way. One day a young man came into his studio and told him he had a sister mortally ill, and that his family wished to have her portrait. They dared not ask her to sit; to do so would have been to awaken her suspicion. In a word, Danton undertook to reproduce her features from memory. The next day the brother informed his sister that he intended to make her a present of a jewel for her next ball. Danton was introduced as the young man from the jeweller's, and while the young lady was looking at the specimens sent the artist made his observations. On going home he produced a bust of striking resemblance. Next year an old man, the father of the brother and sister, came to ask Danton to do the bust of his son, also from memory, for the young man was dead. Danton succeeded as well for the brother as he had for the sister. He was not, however, always so successful. On one occasion a gentleman who could not get his wife to sit asked Danton to take his place on a given day at a given hour, in one of the omnibuses running from the Madeleine to the Bastille, and he would see his wife there, and might observe her attentively. Danton did as directed, executed a splendid bust, sent it to the husband, and received for answer that it was not in the least like his wife, but was the very image of her maid. Danton had made a mistake in the 'bus. He left a splendid fortune, as the result of his art labors.

THE Daily News is alarmed at the rapid growth of the British national library. Every man living has a pen in his hand; and if only his writing takes the form of a book entered at Stationers' Hall, it will be preserved for ages in the British Museum. Centuries hence the bookworm will find there, illustrated with woodcuts, verbatim reports of the trials of Palmer and Rush, the Mannings, Madeleine Smith, and Mdm. Rachel. Centuries hence also he will find those numerous volumes which it is the fashion for tradesmen to issue, and which are but a sublimated form of trade circular. The wine merchant has a volume on his wines, and the hatter on his hats, and the jeweller on his jewels, and the sewing-machine manufacturer on his sewing-machines, and the lock-maker on his locks, and the bootmaker on his boots, and the cook on his viands. How are we to stow all these away, and at the same time to keep pace with the literature of foreign countries, which is scarcely less productive? We think of our future librarians as of those children renowned in fairy tales, who have impossible tasks appointed them by malicious godmothers,—to collect in a day all the sands of the shore, or to count ere dinner-time all the grains of wheat in the kingdom. There will appear no exaggeration in this to any one who will go to the British Museum and study the catalogue. A man may take a good constitutional walk every day in hunting for half a dozen books in this enormous catalogue, which of itself fills about one thousand volumes. We find historians in our day, like Mr. Carlyle, complaining of the immeasurable amount of rubbish which they have to sift in order to get at a few paltry facts. Must we not pity the historians of the future if they should at any time be so conscientious as to turn over the mountains of waste paper which are now being shot by cartloads into the Museum? Human eyes and human hands cannot possibly work through a century of such agglomeration. The human mind will despair, perhaps, of power to deal with the illimitable mass. May we hope that when things come to such a crisis, human labor of the literary sort may be in part superseded by machinery? Machinery has done wonders, and when we think of what literature is becoming it is certainly to be wished that we could read it by machinery, and by machinery digest it.

THE Times remarks that if, as there is every reason to believe, the Emperor Napoleon is now in full possession of his health and faculties, it must be avowed that his conduct is not easily accounted for. He had given rise to the belief that, impressed with the results of the last general election, he deemed it advisable to introduce most important modifications in his policy, to put an end to personal rule, and to govern in accordance with the will of the nation. His scheme of reform has been brought before the Senate, on the acceptance of which body the Emperor might have relied beforehand as on a matter of course. The new Constitution may be looked upon as already virtually in vigor. The amnesty extended to every class of political opponents, the thorough tolerance not only of a free but even of a licentious press,—every circumstance contributes to foster the general conviction that the new era has dawned for France; yet the Emperor abides at St. Cloud in apparent inactivity, as if he considered that everything was done, or that there never was anything to be done. A cry has gone forth which could not fail to find an echo in many organs of public opinion. "How long is France to wait for the convocation of the Legislative Body?" The uneasiness arising from the delay has gone so far that some of the members of that body contend the Emperor could not put off the meeting of the Chamber beyond the 26th of next month without a breach of the Imperial Constitution; and they are even contemplating an invasion of their own premises at that epoch, with a view to deliberate with or without the consent of the Executive,—a resolution which might be attended with grave complications. Of course, no one expects that matters will be carried to such extremities. But, admitting that the Emperor's procrastination might be justifiable as a matter of right, it is certainly open to objection on the ground of expediency. There is no end to the unjust and uncharitable constructions that are put on the Emperor's doings. Men assert, not by any means in inaudible murmurs, that the Emperor is bent on revoking his own concessions; that he meditates a new coup d'état; that the Legislative Body will not be reassembled either within the legal term or at all; that lists of proscription are already drawn up; that it is with these views that the Emperor has such frequent interviews with M. Pietri, his Prefect of the Police; that it is in pursuit of this object that changes are to be introduced into the command of the Paris army. It is even added that the aggravation of absolute rule at home is to be complicated by preparations for hostility abroad; and that it is with this understanding that Count von Beust, who is now on his holiday travels, and who was falsely reported to have been in Paris and to have seen M. Rouher, has, at all events, come into French territory as far as Strasbourg, where he had an interview with Prince Metternich, his agent at the Court of the Tuileries, to frame a plan of diplomatic campaign to be followed by military operations. To allude to these worse than idle surmises is to put their glaring absurdity into full evidence. They ought, nevertheless, to make the Emperor aware of the in expediency of persevering in an inaction which can give rise to no favorable interpretation.

A CORRESPONDENT of the London Star, travelling in North Germany, thus describes a gambling scene at Baden:—

"On my way to Baden I travelled with a lady who was reading a German translation of John Stuart Mill's essay on the 'Subjection of Women.' I was led to observe curiously, since here we have human nature pretty fairly tested in both sexes, how women enter into big battle for money. The unaccustomed are a little excitable over small sums,—they betray their excitement more, and have not our self-flattering slang of an assumed philosophy. Wealthy old ladies, like the famous Countess K—below the Taunus, playing merely for the excitement over the grave of all other passions, are out of the list. I speak of the average of women who come to win, as men do, for the money's sake. They are in the proportion of about one eighth to the men. When they have passed the ordeal of the florins and five-franc pieces, they are pre-eminently concentrated and stoical. Their foreheads are not so moist; they glance less at the cards or the ball. They do not frown on the board, or smile, or exclaim pettishly in an undertone, or call a friend to remark the extreme singularity, nay, comicality, of a run of persistent ill-luck. Their judgment is faulty, for they double on a loss, and rarely venture to stand more than once on the double of a gain. So they do not break banks. I am noticing their self-command, which is worthy of contemplation.

"Part of it may be ascribed to their greater subordination to their bien-seances; it is self-command still. The test is exceedingly trying. I saw it one evening when it was at furnace heat. There came to the roulette table a venerable, stately dame with long locks of iron-gray hair, and firm, handsome features. Previously to sitting down she had a consultation with her son, who resembled her on the ugly side, like the shadow of a hand on the wall. They had evidently come to play for money wanted. She commenced with a cast of five-louis pieces. Probably she preferred the warm game of roulette to trente et quarante, from a taste for odd and even, upon which she commenced betting successfully, while her son skirmished on numbers. He soon lost his head. After a fair course of luck, she attacked the black and red, securing herself against zero as well as she could with one louis or two. For a considerable time she had undiminished good fortune, and continued to fold up the influx of mille-franc billets in her vast red morocco pocket-book. I marked the change of the tide on the face of her son. The poor fellow was staring at six of these bank-notes swept into captivity. Six others followed them, and for many times six more. Incapable of hiding the horror of his sensations, he stalked up and down the room, peeping at the game from every point; his head was over everybody's shoulder. You heard the agonized creak of his expressive boots, and knew him behind you. She, meanwhile, remained absolutely impassive: nothing in the eyes, nothing on the skin, betrayed emotion; nothing in the tone of the voice. Half a dozen of our countrymen, surveying the field of battle with that air of respectful disgust peculiar to them when great things are doing upon it, pronounced her, in vernacular slang, an astonishing woman. Whenever her luck swayed back to her, she was meditatively eyed by the rest present. I found the man, her son, with his body projected out of one of the windows, where he nearly lost his balance in the recurrence of a fit of frenzied desire to catch a glimpse of the progress of the duel. She looked on our faces and his with equal composure, and his one would have supposed enough to unnerve a mother. She played for five hours. It was only during the last that her bosom gave now and then a deeper heave, and occasionally the tell-tale thin division of the lips, drawing hard breath in, was seen. The mouth is the gambler's index in women as in men. How much she lost, the red morocco pocket-book did not reveal. It waxed lean. Upon the closing of the bank she rose to look for her son, and discovered the burly creature with difficulty. He plunged into questions, to which she calmly adjourned all answer, and walked forth. This was but one woman, clearly a woman rarely to be matched, but she offered an exhibition of the powers of her sex in various ways. Not knowing her, I am unable to say how she comforted herself after the effort. She had not the appearance of one who would take to the diversion of hysterics and the cordial of despair. I admit that the example should be followed through before it may be said that in addition to physical endurance and consummate nerve, she has the quality we presume to call manly. But it may truly be said that few men with such a moping, creaking, desperate animal of an offspring hanging on their chances, would have fought the duel out so victorious of aspect. Unlike the Lady Macbeth, familiarly cited as an instance of woman's inevitable tendency to spoil the show, collapse, and finish badly after a mighty effort, she herself did the deed. Grant that she is used to it, the argument is none the weaker on behalf her sex's ability to play most of the games of life on a footing with men."

THE LAST BOAT.

THE last boat out from Margate pier!

Farewell to folly and unreason!

Kind reader, please to drop a tear

And bid adieu to Margate season.

The jetty's left behind, beyond

The scene seems anything but pleasant,

A long farewell to Spiers and Pond,

And fascinating Royal Crescent.

Prone are our castles on the sand,

Knocked over by the sea invading;

Bluff equinoctial gales command

An end of matutinal spading.

The proud proprietors of goats,

And donkey boys, have ceased their rackets,

Grim salts sit straddling on their boats,

And look far bluer than their jackets.

Alone the little schooner lies

With not a cockney left to man it;

In vain the cursing carman cries

For riders round the Isle of Thanet.

Hushed are the revelries of night,—

The song and chorus on the jetty,—

No longer Luna sheds her light

On Harry whispering to Hetty!

No more the antiquaries sob,

For calm of Canterbury's cloister;

Smart maidens vainly offer Cobb

To wash down the neglected oyster.

A sorry change creeps o'er the town,

For all reside, and no one lodges,

And Margate merciless must own

The undivided sway of Hodges.

The last boat out! once welcomed waves

Have turned their backs upon us truly;

The swell most certainly behaves

In manner rough and most unruly.

This husbands' boat, which in the sun

Dear wives excitedly have sighted,

Takes back both wife and little one

To home and Camden Town delighted.

Ah! love, we'll weather out the squall!

Maybe the little ones are weary,

Still home is sweetest after all,

And autumn fires are very cheery.

The last boat out from Margate pier—

When our short holiday is over—

Brings you and me to haven, dear!

And all the little pets to clover!

ST. PAUL AND PROTESTANTISM.

BY MATTHEW ARNOLD.

I.

MONSIEUR RENAN sums up his recent interesting volume on St. Paul by saying: "After having been for three hundred years, thanks to Protestantism, the Christian doctor par excellence, Paul is now coming to an end of his reign." All through his book Monsieur Renan is possessed with a sense of this close relationship between St. Paul and Protestantism. Protestantism has made Paul, he says; Pauline doctrine is identified with Protestant doctrine; Paul is a Protestant doctor, and the counterpart of Luther. Monsieur Renan has a strong distaste for Protestantism, and this distaste extends itself, therefore, to the Protestant Paul. The reign of this Protestant is now coming to an end, and such a consummation evidently has Monsieur Renan's approval.

St. Paul is now coming to an end of his reign. Precisely the contrary, I venture to think, is the judgment to which a true criticism of men and of things leads us. The Protestantism which has so used and abused St. Paul is coming to an end; its organizations, strong and active as they look, are touched with the finger of death; its fundamental ideas, sounding forth still every week from thousands of pulpits, have in them no significance and no power for the progressive thought of humanity. But the reign of the real St. Paul is only beginning; his fundamental ideas, disengaged from the elaborate misconceptions with which Protestantism has overlaid them, will have an influence in the future greater than any which they have yet had, — an influence proportioned to their correspondence with a number of the deepest and most permanent facts of human nature itself.

Elsewhere I have pointed out how, for us in this country, Puritanism is the strong and special representative of Protestantism. The Church of England existed before Protestantism, and contains much besides Protestantism; remove the schemes of doctrine, Calvinistic or Arminian, which for Protestantism, merely as such, make the very substance of its religion, and all which is most valuable in the Church of England would still remain. These schemes, or the ideas out of which they spring, show themselves in the Prayer Book; but they are not what gives the Prayer Book its importance and value. But Puritanism exists for the sake of these schemes; its organizations are inventions for enforcing them more purely and thoroughly. Questions of discipline and ceremonies have always been admitted to be in themselves secondary; it is because that conception of the ways of God to man which Puritanism has formed for itself appears to Puritanism superlatively true and precious, that Independents and Baptists and Methodists in England, and Presbyterians in Scotland, have been impelled to constitute for inculcating it a church-order where it might be less swamped by the additions and ceremonies of men, might be more simply and effectively enounced, and might stand more absolute and central than in the church-order of Anglicans or Roman Catholics. Of that conception the cardinal points are fixed by the terms election and justification. These terms come from the writings of St. Paul, and the scheme which Puritanism has constructed with them professes to be St. Paul's scheme.

The same scheme, or something very like it, has been, and still is, embraced by many adherents of the Churches of England and Rome; but these Churches rest their claims to men's interest and attachment, not on the possession of such a scheme, but on other grounds with which we have for the present nothing to do. Puritanism's very reason for existing depends on the worth of this its vital conception, derived from St. Paul's writings; and when we are told that St. Paul is a Protestant doctor whose reign is ending, a Puritan, keen, pugnacious, and shutting up religion of the heart into theories of the brain about election and justification, we in England, at any rate, can best try the assertion by fixing our eyes on our own Puritans, and comparing their doctrine and their hold on vital truth with St. Paul's.

This we propose now to do; and, indeed, to do it will only be to complete what we have already begun. For already, when we were speaking of Hebraism and Hellenism,* we were led to remark how the over-Hebraizing of Puritanism, and its want of a wide culture, do so narrow its range and impair its vision that even the documents which it thinks all-sufficient, and to the study of which it exclusively rivets itself, it does not rightly understand, but is apt to make of them something quite different from what they really are. In short, no man, we said, who knows nothing else, knows even his Bible. And we showed how readers of the Bible attached to essential words and ideas of the Bible a sense which was not the writer's; and in particular how this had happened with regard to the Pauline doctrine of resurrection. Let us take the present opportunity of going further in the same road; and instead of lightly disparaging the great name of St. Paul, let us see if the needful thing is not rather to rescue St. Paul and the Bible from the perversions of them by mistaken men.

* See Culture and Anarchy, p. 176.

So long as the well-known habit, on which we have so often enlarged, prevails amongst our countrymen, of holding mechanically their ideas themselves, but making it their chief aim to work with energy and enthusiasm for the organizations which profess those ideas, English Puritanism is not likely to make such a return upon its own thoughts, and upon the elements of its being, as to accomplish for itself an operation of the kind needed; though it has men whose natural faculties, were they but free to use them, would undoubtedly prove equal to the task. The same habit prevents our Puritans from being reached by philosophical works, which exist in sufficient numbers and of which Monsieur Reuss's history of the growth of Christian theology is an admirable specimen, — works where the entire scheme of Pauline doctrine is laid out with careful research and impartial accuracy. To give effect to the predominant points in Paul's teaching, and to exhibit these in so plain and popular a manner as to invite and almost compel all men's comprehension, is not the design of such works; and only by writings with this design in view will English Puritanism be reached. Our one qualification for the business in hand lies in that belief of ours, so much contested by our countrymen, of the primary needfulness of seeing things as they really are, and of the greater importance of ideas than of the machinery which exists for them. If by means of letting our consciousness play upon them freely, and by following the methods of studying and judging thence generated, we are shown that we ought in real truth neither to abase St. Paul and Puritanism together, as Monsieur Renan does, nor to abase St. Paul but exalt Puritanism, nor yet to exalt both Puritanism and St. Paul together, but rather to abase Puritanism and exalt St. Paul, then we cannot but think that even for Puritanism itself, also, it will be the best, however unpalatable, to be shown this. Puritanism certainly wishes well to St. Paul; it cannot wish to compromise him by an unintelligent adhesion to him and a blind adoption of his words, instead of being a true child to him. Yet this is what it has really done. What in St. Paul is secondary and subordinate, Puritanism has made primary and essential; what in St. Paul is figure and belongs to the sphere of feeling, Puritanism has transported into the sphere of intellect and made formula. On the other hand, what is with St. Paul primary, Puritanism has treated as subordinate: and what is with him thesis, and belonging (so far as anything in religion can properly be said thus to belong) to the sphere of intellect, Puritanism has made image and figure.

And first let us premise what we mean in this matter by primary and secondary, essential and subordinate. We mean, so far as the apostle is concerned, a greater or less approach to what really characterizes him and gives his teaching its originality and power. We mean, so far as truth is concerned, a greater or less agreement with facts which can be verified, and a greater or less power of explaining them. What essentially characterizes a religious teacher, and gives him his permanent worth and vitality, is, after all, just the scientific value of his teaching, its correspondence with important facts, and the light it throws on them. Never was the truth of this so apparent as now.

The scientific sense in man never asserted its claims so strongly; the propensity of religion to neglect those claims, and the peril and loss to it from neglecting them, never were so manifest. The license of affirmation about God and his proceedings, in which the religious world indulge, is more and more met by the demand for verification. When Calvinism tells us, "It is agreed between God and the Mediator Jesus Christ, the Son of God, surety for the redeemed, as parties-contractors, that the sins of the redeemed should be imputed to innocent Christ, and he both condemned and put to death for them, upon this very condition, that whosoever heartily consents unto the covenant of reconciliation offered through Christ, shall, by the imputation of his obedience unto them, be justified and holden righteous before God"; — when Calvinism tells us this, is it not talking about God just as if he was a man in the next street, whose proceedings Calvinism intimately knew and could give account of, could verify that account at any moment, and enable us to verify it also? It is true, when the scientific sense in us — the sense which seeks exact knowledge — calls for that verification, Calvinism refers us to St. Paul, from whom it professes to have got this history of what it calls "the covenant of redemption." But this is only pushing the difficulty a stage further back. For if it is St. Paul, and not Calvinism, that professes this exact acquaintance with God and his doings, the scientific sense calls upon St. Paul to produce the facts by which he verifies what he says: and if he cannot produce them, then it treats both St. Paul's assertion, and Calvinism's assertion after him, as of no real consequence.

No one will deny that such is the behavior of science towards religion in our day, though many may deplore it. And it is not that the scientific sense in us denies the rights of the poetic sense, which employs a figured and imaginative language. But the language we have just been quoting is not figurative and poetic language, it is scholastic and scientific language. Assertions in scientific language must stand the tests of scientific examination. Neither is it that the scientific sense in us refuses to admit willingly and reverently the name of God, as a point in which the religious and the scientific sense may meet, as the least inadequate name for that universal order which the intellect feels after as a law, and the heart feels after as a benefit. "We, too," might the men of science with truth say to the men of religion, — "we, too, would gladly say God, if only, the moment one says God, you would not pester one with your pretensions of knowing all about him." That stream of tendency by which all things strive to fulfil the law of their being, and which, inasmuch as our idea of real welfare resolves itself into this fulfilment of the law of one's being, man rightly deems the fountain of all goodness, and calls by the worthiest and most solemn name he can, which is God, science also might willingly own for the fountain of all goodness, and call God. But however much more than this the heart may with propriety put into its language respecting God, this is as much as science can with strictness put there. Therefore, when the religious world, following its bent of trying to describe what it loves, amplifying and again amplifying its description, and guarding finally this amplified description by the most precise and rigid terms it can find, comes at last, with the best intentions, to the notion of a sort of magnified and non-natural man, who proceeds in the fashion laid down in the Calvinistic thesis we have quoted, then science strikes in, remarks the difference between this second notion and the notion it originally admitted, and demands to have the new notion verified, as the first can be verified, by facts. But this does not unsettle the first notion, or prevent science from acknowledging the importance and the scientific validity of propositions which are grounded upon the first notion, and shed light over it.

Nevertheless, researches in this sphere are now a good deal eclipsed in popularity by researches in the sphere of physics, and no longer have the vogue which they once had. I have related how an eminent physicist with whose acquaintance I am honored imagines me to have invented the author of the Sacra Privata: and that fashionable newspaper, the Morning Post, undertaking — as I seemed, it said, very anxious about the matter — to supply information as to who the author really was, laid it down that he was Bishop of Calcutta, and that his ideas and writings, to which I attached so much value, had been among the main provocatives of the Indian mutiny. Therefore it is perhaps expedient to refresh our memory as to these schemes of doctrine, Calvinistic or Arminian, for the upholding of which, as has been said, British Puritanism exists, before we proceed to compare them, for correspondence with facts and for scientific validity, with the teaching of St. Paul.

Calvinism, then, begins by laying down that God from all eternity decreed whatever was to come to pass in time; that by his decree a certain number of angels and men are predestinated, out of God's mere free grace and love, without any foresight of faith or good works in them, to everlasting life; and others foreordained, according to the unsearchable counsel of his will, whereby he extends or withholds mercy as he pleases, to everlasting death. God made, however, our first parents, Adam and Eve, upright and able to keep his law, which was written in their hearts; at the same time entering into a contract with them, and with their posterity as represented in them, by which they were assured of everlasting life in return for perfect obedience, and of everlasting death if they should be disobedient. Our first parents, being enticed by Satan, a fallen angel speaking in the form of a serpent, broke this covenant of works, as it is called, by eating the forbidden fruit; and hereby they, and their posterity in them and with them, became not only liable to eternal death, but lost also their natural uprightness and all ability to please God; nay, they became by nature enemies to God and to all spiritual good, and inclined only to evil continually. This, says Calvinism, is our original sin; the bitter root of all our actual transgressions, in thought, word, and deed.

Yet, though man has neither power nor inclination to rise out of this wretched fallen state, but is rather disposed to lie insensible in it till he perish, another covenant exists by which his condition is greatly affected. This is the covenant of redemption, made and agreed upon, says Calvinism, between God the Father and God the Son in the Council of the Trinity before the world began. The sum of the covenant of redemption is this: God having, by the eternal decree already mentioned, freely chosen to life a certain number of lost mankind, gave them before the world began to God the Son, appointed Redeemer, on condition that if he humbled himself so far as to assume the human nature in union with the divine nature, submit himself to the law as surety for the elect, and satisfy justice for them by giving obedience in their name, even to suffering the cursed death of the cross, he should ransom and redeem them from sin and death, and purchase for them righteousness and eternal life. The Son of God accepted the condition, or bargain, as Calvinism calls it; and in the fulness of time came, as Jesus Christ, into the world, was born of the Virgin Mary, subjected himself to the law, and completely paid the due ransom on the cross.

God has in his word, the Bible, revealed to man this covenant of grace or redemption. All those whom he has predestinated to life he in his own time effectually calls to be partakers in the release offered. Man is altogether passive in this call, until the Holy Spirit enables him to answer it. The Holy Spirit, the third person in the Trinity, applies to the elect the redemption purchased by Christ, through working faith in them. As soon as the elect have faith in Jesus Christ, that is, as soon as they give their consent heartily and repentantly, in the sense of deserved condemnation, to the covenant of grace, God justifies them by imputing to them that perfect obedience which Christ gave to the law and the satisfaction also which upon the cross Christ gave to justice in their name. They who are thus called and justified are by the same power likewise sanctified; the dominion of carnal lusts being destroyed in them, and the practice of holiness being, in spite of some remnants of corruption, put in their power. Good works, done in obedience to God's moral law, are the fruits and evidences of a true faith; and the persons of the faithful elect being accepted through Christ, their good works also are accepted in him and rewarded. But works done by other and unregenerate men, though they may be things which God commands, cannot please God, and are sinful. The elect can after justification and sanctification no more fall from the state of grace, but shall certainly persevere to the end and be eternally saved; and of this they may, even in the present life, have the certain assurance. Finally, after death, their souls and bodies are joyfully joined together again in the resurrection, and they remain thenceforth forever with Christ in glory; while all the wicked are sent away into hell with Satan, whom they have served.

We have here set down the main doctrines of Calvinistic Puritanism almost entirely in words of its own choosing. It is not necessary to enter into distinctions such as those between sublapsarians, supralapsarians, between Calvinists who believe that God's decree of election and reprobation was passed in foresight of original sin and on account of it, and Calvinists who believe that it was passed absolutely and independently. The important points of Calvinism — original sin, free election, effectual calling, justification through imputed righteousness — are common to both. The passiveness of man, the activity of God, are the great features in this scheme; there is very little of what man does, very much of what God does; and what God does is described with such particularity that the figure we have used of the man in the next street cannot but recur strongly to our minds. The positive Protestantism of Puritanism, with which we are here concerned, as distinguished from the negative Protestantism of the Church of England, has nourished itself with ardor on this scheme of doctrine. It informs and fashions the whole religion of Scotland, established and nonconforming. It is the doctrine which Puritan flocks delight to hear from their ministers. It was Puritanism's constant reproach against the Church of England, that this essential doctrine was not firmly enough held and set forth by her. At the Hampton Court Conference in 1604, in the committee of divines appointed by the House of Lords in 1641, and again at the Savoy Conference in 1661, the reproach regularly appeared. "Some have defended," is the Puritan complaint, "the whole gross substance of Arminianism, that the act of conversion depends upon the concurrence of man's free will; some do teach and preach that good works are concauses with faith in the act of justification; some have defended universal grace, some have absolutely denied original sin." As Puritanism grew, the Calvinistic scheme of doctrine hardened and became stricter; of the Calvinistic confessions of faith of the sixteenth century, — the Helvetic Confession, the Belgic Confession, the Heidelberg Catechism, — the Calvinism is so moderate as to astonish any one who has been used only to its later developments. Even the much-abused canons of the Synod of Dort no one can read attentively through without finding in parts of them a genuine movement of thought, — sometimes even a philosophic depth, — and a powerful religious feeling. In the documents of the Westminster Assembly, twenty-five years late, this has disappeared; and what we call the British Philistine stands in his religious capacity, sheer and stark, before us. Seriousness is the one merit of these documents, but it is a seriousness too mixed with the alloy of mundane strife and hatred to be called a religious feeling; not a trace of delicacy of perception, or of philosophic thinking; the mere rigidity and contentiousness of the controversialist and political dissenter; a Calvinism exaggerated till it is simply repelling; and to complete the whole, a machinery of covenants, conditions, bargains, and parties-contractors, such as could have proceeded from no one but the born Anglo-Saxon man of business, British or American.

However, a scheme of doctrine is not necessarily false because of the style in which its adherents may have at a particular moment enounced it. From the faults which disfigure the performance of the Westminster divines the profession of faith prefixed to the Congregational Year-Book is free. The Congregationalists form one of the two great divisions of English Puritans. "Congregational churches believe," their Year-Book tells us, "that the first man disobeyed the divine command, fell from his state of innocence and purity, and involved all his posterity in the consequences of that fall. They believe that all who will be saved were the objects of God's eternal and electing love, and were given by an act of divine sovereignty to the Son of God. They believe that Christ meritoriously obtained eternal redemption for us, and that the Holy Spirit is given in consequence of Christ's mediation."

The essential points of Calvinism are all here. To this profession of faith, annually published in the Year-Book of the Independents, subscription is not required; Puritanism thus remaining honorably consistent with the protests which, at the Restoration, it made against the call for subscription. But the authors of the Year-Book say with pride, and it is a common boast of the Independent churches, that though they do not require subscription, there is, perhaps, in no religious body, such firm and general agreement in doctrine as among Congregationalists. This is true, and it is even more true of the flocks than of the ministers, of whom the abler and the younger begin to be lifted by the stream of modern ideas. Still, up to the present time, the Protestantism of one great division of English Puritans is undoubtedly Calvinist, the Baptists holding in general the scheme of Calvinism yet more strictly than the Independents.

The other great division of English Puritanism is formed by the Methodists. Wesleyan Methodism is, as is well known, not Calvinist but Arminian. The Methodist Magazine was called by Wesley the Arminian Magazine, and kept that title all through his life. Arminianism is an attempt made with the best intentions, and with much truth of practical sense, but not in a very profound philosophical spirit, to escape from what perplexes and shocks us in Calvinism. The God of Calvinism is a magnified and non-natural man, who decrees at his mere good pleasure some men to salvation and other men to reprobation; the God of Arminianism is a magnified and non-natural man who foreknows the course of each man's life, and who decrees each of us to salvation or reprobation in accordance with this foreknowledge. But so long as we remain in this anthropomorphic order of ideas the question will always occur: Why did not a being of infinite power and infinite love so make all men as that there should be no cause for this sad foreknowledge and sad decree respecting a number of them? In truth, Calvinism, is both theologically more coherent, and also shows a deeper sense of reality than Arminianism, which, in the practical man's fashion, is apt to scrape the surface of things only. For instance, the Arminian Remonstrants, in their zeal to justify the morality, in a human sense, of God's ways, maintained that he sent his word to one nation rather than another according as he saw that one nation was more worthy than another of such a preference. The Calvinist doctors of the Synod of Dort have no difficulty in showing that Moses and Christ both of them assert, with respect to the Jewish nation, the direct contrary; and not only do they here obtain a theological triumph, but in rebutting the Arminian theory they are in accordance with historical truth and with the real march of human affairs. The Calvinists seize the fact here, while the Arminians miss it. The Calvinist's fault is in his scientific appreciation of the fact; in the reasons he gives for it. God, he says, sends his word to one nation rather than another at his mere good pleasure. Here we have again the magnified and non-natural man, who likes and dislikes, knows and decrees just as a man, only on a scale immensely transcending anything of which we have experience; and whose proceedings we nevertheless describe as if he were in the next street, for people to verify all we say about him.

Arminian Methodism, however, puts aside the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination. The foremost place, which in the Calvinist scheme belongs to the doctrine of predestination, belongs in the Methodist scheme to the doctrine of justification by faith. More and more prominently does modern Methodism elevate this as its essential doctrine; and the era in their founder's life which Methodists select to celebrate is the era of his conversion to it. It is the doctrine of Anselm, adopted and developed by Luther, set forth in the confession of Augsburg, and current all through the popular theology of our day. We shall find it in almost any popular hymn we happen to take, but the following lines of Milton exhibit it classically. By the fall of our first parents, says he, —

"Man, losing all,
To expiate his treason hath naught left,
But to destruction sacred and devote
He with his whole posterity must die;
Die he or justice must; unless for him
Some other able, and as willing, pay
The rigid satisfaction; death for death."

By Adam's fall, God's justice and mercy were placed in conflict. God could not follow his mercy without violating his justice. Christ by his satisfaction gave the Father the right and power (nudum jus Patri acquirebat, said the Arminians) to follow his mercy, and to make with man the covenant of free justification by faith, whereby, if a man has a sure trust and confidence that his sins are forgiven him in virtue of the satisfaction made to God for them by the death of Christ, he is held clear of sin by God, and admitted to salvation. This doctrine, like the Calvinist doctrine of predestination, involves a whole history of God's proceedings, and gives, also, first and almost sole place to what God does, with disregard to what man does. It has thus an essential affinity with Calvinism; indeed, Calvinism is but this doctrine of original sin and justification, plus the doctrine of predestination; nay, the Welsh Methodists, as is well known, have no difficulty in combining the tenet of election with the practices and most of the tenets of Methodism. The word solifidian points precisely to that which is common to both Calvinism and Methodism, and which has made both these halves of English Puritanism so popular, — their sensational side, as it may be called, their laying all stress on what God wondrously gives and works for us, not on what we bring or do for ourselves. "Plead thou singly," says Wesley, "the blood of the covenant, the ransom paid for thy proud stubborn soul." Wesley's doctrines of conversion, of the new birth, of sanctification, of the direct witness of the Spirit, of assurance, of sinless perfection, — all of them thus correspond with doctrines which we have noticed in Calvinism, and show a common character with them. The instantaneousness Wesley loved to ascribe to conversion and sanctification points all the same way. "God gives in a moment such a faith in the blood of his Son as translates us out of darkness into light, out of sin and fear into holiness and happiness." And again, "Look for sanctification just as you are, as a poor sinner that has nothing to pay, nothing to plead but Christ died." This is the side in Wesley's teaching which his followers have above all seized, and which they are eager to hold forth as the essential part of his legacy to them.

It is true that from the same reason which prevents, as we have said, those who know their Bible and nothing else from really knowing even their Bible, Methodists, who for the most part know nothing but Wesley, do not really know even Wesley. It is true that what really characterizes this most interesting and most attractive man, is not his doctrine of justification by faith, or any other of his set doctrines, but is entirely what we may call his genius for godliness. Mr. Alexander Knox, in his remarks on his friend's life and character, insists much on an entry in Wesley's Journal in 1767, where he seems impatient at the endless harping on the tenet of justification, and asks "if it is not high time to return to the plain word: 'He that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted with him.'" Mr. Knox is right in thinking that the feeling which made Wesley say this is what gave him his vital worth and character as a man; but it is not what gives him his character as the teacher of Methodism. Methodism rejects Mr. Knox's version of its founder, and insists on making the article of justification the very corner-stone of the Wesleyan edifice. And the truth undoubtedly is, that not by his assertion of what man brings, but by his assertion of what God gives, by his doctrines of conversion, instantaneous justification and sanctification, assurance, and sinless perfection, does Wesley live and operate in Methodism. "You think I must first be or do thus or thus (for sanctification). Then you are seeking it by works unto this day. If you seek it by faith, you may expect it as you are; then expect it now. It is of importance to observe that there is an inseparable connection between these three points: expect it by faith, expect it as you are, and expect it now. To deny one of them is to deny them all; to allow one is to allow them all." This is the teaching of Wesley, which has made the great Methodist half of English Puritanism what it is, and not his hesitations and recoils at the dangers of his own teaching. No doubt, as the seriousness of Calvinism, its perpetual converseance with deep matters and with the Bible, have given force and fervency to Calvinist Puritans, so the loveliness of Wesley's character, and what we have called his genius for godliness, have sweetened and made amiable numberless lives of Methodist Puritans. But as a religious teacher, Wesley is to be judged by his doctrine; and his doctrine, like the Calvinistic scheme, rests with all its weight on the assertion of certain supposed proceedings on God's part, independent of us, our experience, and our will; and leads its recipients to look, in religion, not so much for an arduous progress on their own part, and the exercise of their activity, as for strokes of magic, and what may be called a sensational character.

In the Heidelberg Catechism, after an answer in which the catechist rehearses the popularly received doctrine of original sin and vicarious satisfaction for it, the catechizer asks the pertinent question: "Unde id scis?" — how do you know all that? The Apostle Paul is, as we have already shown, the great authority for it whom formal theology invokes; his name is used by popular theology with the same confidence. I open a modern book of popular religion at the account of a visit paid to a hardened criminal seized with terror the night before his execution. The visitor says: "I now stand in Paul's place, and say: In Christ's stead we pray you, be ye reconciled to God. I beg you to accept the pardon of all your sins, which Christ has purchased for you, and which God freely bestows on you for his sake. If you do not understand, I say: God's ways are not as our ways." And the narrative goes on: "That night was spent in singing the praises of the Saviour who had purchased his pardon." Both Calvinism and Methodism appeal to the Bible, and, above all, to St. Paul, for this history they propound of the relations between God and man; but Calvinism relies most, in enforcing it, on man's fears, Methodism on man's hopes. Calvinism insists on man's being under a curse; it then works the sense of sin, misery, and terror in him, and appeals pre-eminently to the desire to flee from the wrath to come. Methodism, too, insists on his being under a curse; but it works most the sense of hope in him, the craving for happiness, and appeals pre-eminently to the desire for eternal bliss. No one, however, will maintain that the particular account of God's proceedings with man, whereby Methodism and Calvinism operate on these desires, proves itself by internal evidence, and establishes without external aid its own scientific validity. So we may either directly try, as best we can, its scientific validity in itself, or as it professes to have Paul's authority to support it, we may first inquire what is really Paul's account of God's proceedings with man, and whether this tallies with the Puritan account and confirms it. The latter is in every way the safer and the more instructive course to follow. And we will follow Puritanism's example in taking St. Paul's mature and greatest work, the Epistle to the Romans, as the chief place for finding what he really thought on the points in question.

We have already said elsewhere,* indeed, what is very true, and what must never be forgotten, that what St. Paul, a man so separated from us by time, race, training, and circumstances, really thought, we cannot make sure of knowing exactly. All we can do is to get near it, reading him with the sort of critical tact which the study of the human mind and its history, and the acquaintance with many great writers, naturally gives for following the movement of any one single great writer's thought; reading him, also, without preconceived theories to which we want to make his thoughts fit themselves.

It is evident that the English translation of the Epistle to the Romans has been made by men with their heads full of the current doctrines of election and justification we have been noticing; and it has thereby received such a bias, — of which a strong example is the use of the word atonement in the eleventh verse of the fifth chapter, — that perhaps it is almost impossible for any one who reads the English translation only, to take into his mind Paul's thought without a coloring from the current doctrines. But besides discarding the English translation, we must bear in mind, if we wish to get as near Paul's real thought as possible, two things which have greatly increased the facilities for misrepresenting him. In the first place, Paul, like the other Bible writers, and like the Semitic race in general, has a much juster sense of the true scope and limits of diction in religious deliverances than we have. He uses within the sphere of religious emotion expressions which, in this sphere, have an eloquence and a propriety, but which are not to be taken out of it and made into formal scientific propositions. We have used the word Hebraize for another purpose, — to denote the exclusive attention to the moral side of our nature, to conscience, and to doing rather than knowing; so, to describe the vivid and figured way in which St. Paul, within the sphere of religious emotion, uses words, without carrying them outside it, we will use the word Orientalize. When Paul says: "God hath concluded them all in unbelief that he might have mercy upon all," he Orientalizes; that is, he does not mean to assert formally that God acted with this set design, but, being full of the happy and divine end to the unbelief spoken of, he, by a vivid and striking figure, represents the unbelief as actually caused with a view to this end. But when the Calvinists of the Synod of Dort, wishing to establish the formal proposition that faith and all saving gifts flow from election and nothing else, quote an expression of Paul's similar to the one we have quoted, "He hath chosen us," they say, not because we were, but "that we might be holy and without blame before him," they go quite wide of the mark, from not perceiving that what the apostle used as a vivid figure of rhetoric, they are using as a formal scientific proposition.

When Paul Orientalizes, the fault is not with him when he is misunderstood, but with the prosaic and unintelligent western readers who have not enough tact for style to comprehend his mode of expression. But he also Judaizes; and here his liability to being misunderstood by us western people is undoubtedly due to a defect in the critical habit of himself and his race. A Jew himself, he uses the Jewish Scriptures in a Jew's arbitrary and uncritical fashion, as if they had a talismanic character; as if for a doctrine, however true in itself, their confirmation was still necessary, and as if this confirmation was to be got from their mere words alone, however detached from the sense of their context, and however violently allegorized or otherwise wrested. To use the Bible in this way, even for purposes of illustration, is often an interruption to the argument, a fault of style; to use it in this way for real proof and confirmation is a fault of reasoning. An example of the first fault may be seen in the tenth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, and in the beginning of the third chapter; the apostle's point in either place — his point that faith comes by hearing, and his point that God's oracles were true though the Jews did not believe them — would stand much clearer without their scaffolding of Bible quotation. An instance of the second fault is in the fourth chapter of the Epistle to the Galatians, where the Biblical argumentation by which the apostle seeks to prove his case is as unsound as his case itself is sound. How far these faults are due to the apostle himself, how far to the requirements of those for whom he wrote, we need not now investigate. It is enough that he undoubtedly uses the letter of Scripture in this arbitrary and Jewish way; and thus Puritanism, which has only itself to blame for misunderstanding him when he Orientalizes, may fairly put upon the apostle himself some of its blame for misunderstanding him when he Judaizes, and for Judaizing so strenuously along with him.

To get, therefore, at what Paul really thought and meant to say, it is necessary for us modern and western people to translate him. And not as Puritanism, which has merely taken his letter and recast it in the formal propositions of a modern scientific treatise; but his letter itself must be recast before it can be properly conveyed by such propositions. And as the order in which, in any series of ideas, the ideas come, is of great importance to the final result, and as Paul, who did not write scientific treatises, but had always religious edification in direct view, never set out his doctrine with a design of exhibiting it as a scientific whole, we must also find out for ourselves the order in which Paul's ideas naturally stand, and the connection between one of them and the other, in order to arrive at the real scheme of his teaching, as compared with the schemes exhibited by Puritanism.

We remarked how what sets the Calvinist in motion seems to be the desire to flee from the wrath to come; and what sets the Methodist in motion, the desire for eternal bliss. What is it which sets Paul in motion? It is the impulse which we have elsewhere noted as the master-impulse of Hebraism, — the desire for righteousness. To the Hebrew, this moral order, or righteousness, was pre-eminently the universal order, the law of God; and God, the fountain of all goodness, was pre-eminently to him the giver of the moral law. The end and aim of all religion,—access to God,—the sense of harmony with the universal order,—the partaking of the divine nature,—that our faith and hope might be in God,—that we might have life and have it more abundantly,—meant, for the Hebrew, access to the source of the eternal statutes of the moral order in especial, and harmony with it. It was the greatness of the Hebrew race that it felt the authority of this order, its preciousness and its beneficence, so strongly. "The law of thy mouth is better than thousands of gold and silver." It was the greatness of their best individuals that in them this feeling was incessantly urgent to prove itself in the only sure manner,—in action. "Blessed are they who hear the word of God, and keep it." "If thou wouldst enter into life, keep the commandments." "Let no man deceive you, he that doeth righteousness is righteous."

* See Culture and Anarchy, p. 178.

What distinguishes Paul is both his conviction that the commandment is holy, and just, and good; and also his desire to give effect to the commandment, to establish it. It was this which gave him insight to see that there could be no radical difference in respect of salvation and the way to it between Jew and Gentile: "Upon every soul of man that worketh evil, whoever he may be, tribulation and anguish; to every one that worketh good, glory, honor, and peace!" His piercing practical religious sense, joined to his deep intellectual power, enabled him to discern and follow the range of the commandment, both as to man's actions and as to his heart and thoughts, with extraordinary force and closeness. His religion had, as we shall see, a preponderantly mystic side, and nothing is so natural to the mystic as in rich single words, such as faith, light, love, to sum up and take for granted, without specially enumerating them, all good moral principles and habits; yet nothing is more remarkable in Paul than the frequent, nay, incessant lists, in the most particular detail, of moral habits to be pursued or avoided. Lists of this sort might in a less sincere and profound writer be formal and wearisome; but to no attentive reader of St. Paul will they be wearisome, for in making them he touched the solid ground which was the basis of his religion,—the solid ground of his hearty desire for righteousness and of his thorough conception of it,—and only on such a ground was so strong a superstructure possible. The more one studies these lists, the more does their significance come out. To illustrate this, let any one go through for himself the enumeration, too long to be quoted here, in the four last verses of the first chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, of "things which are not convenient"; or let him merely consider with attention this catalogue, towards the end of the fifth chapter of the Epistle to the Galatians, of fruits of the Spirit: "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, kindness, goodness, faith, mildness, self-control." The man who wrote with this searching minuteness knew accurately what he meant by sin and righteousness, and did not use these words at random. His diligent comprehensiveness in his plan of duties is only less admirable than his diligent sincerity. The sterner virtues and the gentler, his conscience will not let him rest till he has embraced them all. In his deep resolve "to make out by actual trial what is that good and perfect and acceptable will of God," he goes back upon himself again and again, he marks a duty at every point of our nature, and at points the most opposite, for fear he should by possibility be leaving behind him some weakness still indulged, some subtle promptings to evil not yet brought into captivity.

It has not been enough remarked how this incomparable honesty and depth in Paul's love of righteousness is probably what chiefly explains his conversion. Most men have the defects, as the saying is, of their qualities: because they are ardent and severe they have no sense for gentleness and sweetness; because they are sweet and gentle they have no sense for severity and ardor. A Puritan is a Puritan, and a man of feeling is a man of feeling. But with Paul the very same fulness of moral nature which made him an ardent Pharisee, "as concerning zeal, persecuting the church, touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless," was so large that it carried him out of Pharisaism and beyond it, when once he found how much needed doing in him which Pharisaism could not do. Every attentive regard of the character of Paul, not only as he was before his conversion but as he appears to us till his end, must have been struck with two things: one, the earnest insistence with which he recommends "bowels of mercies," as he calls them, meekness, humbleness of mind, gentleness, unwearying forbearance, crowned all of them with that emotion of charity "which is the bond of perfectness"; the other, the force with which he dwells on the solidarity (to use the modern phrase) of man,—the joint interest, that is, which binds humanity together, the duty of respecting every one's part in it, and of doing justice to his efforts to fulfil that part. Never surely did such a controversialist, such a master of sarcasm and invective, commend, with such manifest sincerity and such persuasive emotion, the qualities of meekness and gentleness! Never surely did a worker, who took with such energy his own line, and who was so born to preponderate and predominate in whatever line he took, insist so often and so admirably that the lines of other workers were just as good as his own! At no time, perhaps, did Paul arrive at practising quite perfectly what he thus preached; but this only sets in stronger light the thorough love of righteousness which made him seek out, and put so prominently forward, and so strive to make himself and others fulfil, parts of righteousness which do not force themselves on the common conscience like the duties of soberness, temperance, and activity, and which were somewhat alien, certainly, to his own particular nature. Therefore we cannot but believe that into this spirit, so possessed with the hunger and thirst for righteousness, and precisely because it was so possessed by it, the characteristic doctrines of Christ which brought a new aliment to feed this hunger and thirst of Christ, whom he had never seen, but who was in every one's words and thoughts,—the Teacher who was meek and lowly in heart, who said men were brothers and must love one another, that the last should often be first, that the exercise of dominion and lordship had nothing in them desirable, and that we must become as little children,—sank down and worked there even before Paul ceased to persecute, and had no small part in getting him ready for the crisis of his conversion.

Such doctrines offered new fields of righteousness to the eyes of this indefatigable explorer of it, and enlarged the domain of duty of which Pharisaism showed him only a portion. Then, after the satisfaction thus given to his desire for a full conception of righteousness, came Christ's injunctions to make clean the inside as well as the outside, to beware of the least leaven of hypocrisy and self-flattery, of saying and not doing;—and, finally, the injunction to feel, after doing all we can, that, as compared with the standard of perfection, we are still unprofitable servants. These teachings were, to a man like Paul, for the practice of righteousness what the others were for the theory,—sympathetic utterances, which made the inmost chords of his being vibrate, and which irresistibly drew him sooner or later towards their utterer. Need it be said that he never forgot them, and that in all his pages they have left their trace? Is it not even affecting to see, how, when he is driven for the very sake of righteousness to put the law of righteousness in the second place, and to seek outside the law itself for a power to fulfil the law, how, I say, he returns again and again to the elucidation of his one sole design in all he is doing; how he labors to prevent all possibility of misunderstanding, and to show that he is only leaving the moral law for a moment in order to establish it forevermore victoriously. "Do I condemn the law?" he keeps saying; "do I forget that the commandment is holy, just, and good? Because we are no longer under the law, are we to sin? Am I seeking to make the course of my life and yours other than a service and an obedience?" This man, out of whom an astounding criticism has deduced Antinomianism, is in truth so possessed with horror of Antinomianism, that he goes to grace for the sole purpose of extirpating it, and even then cannot rest without perpetually telling us why he is gone there. This man, whom Calvin and Luther and their followers have shut up into the two scholastic doctrines of election and justification, would have said, could we hear him, just what he said about circumcision and uncircumcision in his own day: "Election is nothing, and justification is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God."

This foremost place which righteousness takes in the order of St. Paul's ideas makes a signal difference between him and Puritanism. Puritanism, as we have said, finds its starting-point either in the desire to flee from eternal wrath or in the desire to obtain eternal bliss. Puritanism has learned from revelation, as it says, a particular history of the first man's fall, of mankind being under a curse, of certain contracts having been passed concerning mankind in the Council of the Trinity, of the substance of those contracts, and of man's position under them. The great concern of Puritanism is with the operation of those contracts on man's condition; its leading thought, if it is a Puritanism of a gloomy turn, is of awe and fear caused by the threatening aspect of man's condition under these contracts; if of a cheerful turn, of gratitude and hope caused by the favorable aspect of it. But in either case, foregone events, the covenant passed, what God has done and does, is the great matter; what there is left for man to do, the human work of righteousness, is secondary, and comes in but to attest and confirm our assurance of what God has done for us. We have seen this in Wesley's words already quoted; the first thing for a man is to be justified and sanctified, and to have the assurance that, without seeking it by works, he is justified and sanctified; then the desire and works of righteousness follow as a proper result of this condition. Still more does Calvinism make man's desire and works of righteousness mere evidences and benefits of more important things; the desire to work righteousness is among the saving graces applied by the Holy Spirit to the elect, and the last of those graces. Denique, says the Synod of Dort, last of all, after faith in the promises and after the witness of the Spirit, comes, to establish our assurance, a clear conscience and righteousness. It is manifest how unlike is this order of ideas to Paul's order, who starts with the thought of righteousness, and builds upon that thought his whole system.

But this difference constitutes from the very outset an immense scientific superiority for the scheme of Paul. Hope and fear are elements of human nature like the love of right, but they are far blinder and less scientific elements of it. "The Bible is a divine revelation; the Bible declares certain things; the things it thus declares move our hopes and fears";—this is the line of thought followed by Puritanism. But what science pursues is a more satisfying, rational conception of things than we had before; what fails to give this, what gives the contrary of this, may indeed be of a nature to move hope and fear, but is to science of none the more value on that account. Instead of covering the scientific inadequacy of a conception by the authority of a revelation, science rather proves the authority of a revelation by the scientific adequacy of the conceptions given in it, and limits the sphere of that authority to the sphere of that adequacy. The more an alleged revelation seems to contain precious and striking things, the more will science be inclined to doubt the correctness of any deduction which draws from it, within the sphere of these things, a conception which rationally is not satisfying. That the scheme of Puritanism is rationally so little satisfying inclines science, not to take it on the authority of the Bible, but to doubt whether it is really in the Bible. The first appeal which this scheme, having begun outside the sphere of reality and experience, makes in the sphere of reality and experience,—its first appeal, therefore, to science—the appeal to the witness of human hope and fear, does not much mend matters; for science knows that numberless conceptions not rationally satisfying are yet the ground of hope and fear. Paul does not begin outside the sphere of science; he begins with an appeal to reality and experience. And the appeal here with which he commences has, for science, undoubted force and importance; for he appeals to a rational conception which is a part, and perhaps the chief part, of our experience; the conception of the law of righteousness, the very law and ground of human nature, so far as this nature is moral. Things as they truly are—facts—are the object-matter of science; and the moral law in human nature is among the greatest of facts.

If I were not afraid of intruding upon Mr. Ruskin's province, I might point out the witness which etymology itself bears to this law as a prime element and clew in man's constitution. Our word righteousness means going straight, going the way we are meant to go; there are languages in which the word way or road is also the word for right reason and duty; the Greek word for justice and righteousness has for its foundation, probably, the idea of describing a certain line, following a certain necessary orbit. But for these fanciful helps there is no need. When Paul starts with affirming the grandeur and necessity of the law of righteousness, science has no difficulty in going along with him.

When he fixes as man's right aim, "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, kindness, goodness, faith, mildness, self-control," he appeals for witness to the truth of what he says to an experience too intimate to need illustration or argument. The best confirmation of the scientific validity of the importance which Paul thus attaches to the law of righteousness, God's moral law, the law of reason and conscience, is to be found in its agreement with the importance attached to this law by teachers the most unlike him; since in the eye of science an experience gains as much by having universality, as in the eye of religion it seems to gain by having uniqueness. "Would you know," says Epictetus, "the means to perfection which Socrates followed? they were these: in every single matter which came before him he made the rule of reason and conscience his one rule to follow." Such was precisely the aim of Paul also; it is an aim to which science does homage as a satisfying rational conception. And to this aim hope and fear properly attach themselves; for on our following the clew of moral order, or losing it, depend our happiness or misery, — our life or death in the true sense of those words, our harmony with the universal order or our disharmony with it, our partaking, as St. Paul says, of the wrath of God or of the glory of God. So that looking to this clew, and fearing to lose hold on it, we may truly say with the author of the "Imitation": Omnia vanitas, præter amare Deum, et illi soli servire.

But to serve God, to follow that central clew in our moral being which unites us to the universal order, is no easy task; and here again we are on the most sure ground of experience and psychology. In some way or other, says Bishop Wilson, every man is conscious of an opposition in him between the flesh and the spirit. Video meliora proboque, deteriora sequor, say the thousand times quoted lines of the Roman poet. The philosophical explanation of this conflict does not indeed attribute, like the Manichean fancy, any inherent evil to the flesh and its workings; all the forces and tendencies in us are, like our proper central moral tendency the desire of righteousness, in themselves beneficent; but they require to be harmonized with this tendency, because this aims directly at our total welfare, our harmony with the law of our nature and the law of God, and derives thence a pre-eminence and a right to moderate. But though not evil in themselves, the evil which flows from these workings is undeniable. The lusts of the flesh, the law in our members, passion, according to the Greek word used by Paul, inordinate affection, according to the admirable rendering of Paul's Greek word in our English Bible, take naturally no account of anything but themselves; this arbitrary and unregulated action of theirs can produce only confusion and misery. The spirit, the law of our mind, takes account of the universal order, the will of God, and is indeed the voice of that order expressing itself in us. Paul talks of a man sowing to his flesh, because each of us has of his own this individual body, this congeries of flesh and bones, blood and nerves, different from that of every one else, and with desires and impulses driving each of us his own separate way; and he says that a man who sows to this sows to a thousand tyrants, and can reap no worthy harvest. But he talks of sowing to the spirit, because there is one central tendency, which for us and for all men is the law of our being; and through reason and righteousness we move in the universal order and with it. In this conformity to the will of God is our peace and happiness.

But how to find the energy and power to bring all these self-seeking tendencies of the flesh, these multitudinous, swarming, eager, and incessant impulses, into obedience to the central tendency? Mere commanding and forbidding is of no avail, and only irritates opposition in the desires it tries to control. It even enlarges their power, because it makes us feel our impotence; and the confusion caused by their ungoverned working is increased by our being filled with a deepened sense of disharmony, remorse, and dismay. "I was alive without the law once," says Paul; the natural play of all the forces and desires in me went on smoothly enough so long as I did not attempt to introduce order and regulation among them. That natural law of reason and conscience which all men have, was sufficient by itself to produce a consciousness of rebellion and disquietude. Matters became only worse by the exhibition of the Mosaic law, the offspring of a moral sense keener and stricter than that of the mass of mankind. Its very stringency increased the feeling of dismay and helplessness; it set forth the law of righteousness clearly, yet did not supply any sufficient power to keep it. Neither the law of nature nor the law of Moses availed to bind men to righteousness. So we come to the word which is the governing word of the Epistle to the Romans, — the word all. As the word righteousness is the governing word of St. Paul's entire mind and life, so the word all is the governing word of this his chief epistle. "All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." All do what they would not, and do not what they would; all feel themselves enslaved, impotent, and miserable. "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?"

Hitherto, we have followed Paul in the sphere of morals; we have now come with him to the point where he enters the sphere of religion. Religion is that which binds and holds us to the practices of righteousness. We have accompanied Paul, and found him always treading solid ground, till he is brought to straits where a binding and holding power of this kind is necessary. Here is the critical point for the scientific worth of his doctrine. "Now at last," cries Puritanism, "the great apostle is about to become even as one of us; there is no issue for him now, but the issue we have always declared he finds. He has recourse to our theurgy of election, substitution, vicarious satisfaction, and imputed righteousness." We will proceed to show that Paul has recourse to nothing of the kind.

SERVED OUT.

In the year 183— there lived at Bordeaux the last — or one of the last — of a long line of scoundrels who had made that part of France infamous (to our ideas) by a succession of cold-blooded murders, committed under the sanction of what people were pleased to call the Code of Honor. This was a certain Comte de V—, a man of great physical strength, imperturbable sangfroid, and relentless cruelty. Not a bad sort of companion, as some said, when the fit — the duelling fit — was not on him; but this came on once in about every six months, and then he must have blood, it mattered little whose. He had killed and maimed boys of sixteen, fathers of families, military officers, journalists, advocates, peaceful country gentlemen. The cause of quarrel was of no importance; if one did not present itself readily, he made one; always contriving that, according to the code aforesaid, he should be the insulted party, thus having the choice of weapons; and he was deadly with the small-sword. It is difficult for us to realize a state of society in which such a wild beast could be permitted to go at large; but we know it to be historically true that such creatures were endured in France; just as we are assured that there were at one time wolves in Yorkshire; only the less noisome vermin had a harder time of it as civilization progressed than was dealt out to the human brute.

The latest exploit of the Comte de V—— previous to the story I am about to tell was to goad a poor young student into a challenge; and when it was represented to him that the boy had never held a sword in his life, so that it would be fairer to use pistols, he replied, that "fools sometimes made mistakes with pistols," and the next morning ran him through the lungs. The evil fit was on him; but the blood thus shed quieted him for another half-year, and rather more, for public opinion was unfavorable, and the air of Bordeaux became too warm for him.

But the scandal blew over after a time, and he came back to his old haunts, one of which was a café by the river-side, where many used to spend their Sunday. Into the little garden of this establishment our wolf swaggered one fine summer afternoon, with the heavy dark look and nervous twitching of the hands which those who were acquainted with him knew well meant mischief. The evil fit was on him; consequently he found himself the centre of a circle which expanded as he went on. This did not displease him. He liked to be feared. He knew he could make a quarrel when he chose, so he looked around for a victim.

At a table almost in the middle of the garden sat a man of about thirty years of age, of middle height, and an expression of countenance which at first struck one as mild and good-humored. He was engaged reading a journal which seemed to interest him, and eating strawberries, an occupation which does not call forth any latent strength of character. Above all, he was profoundly unconscious of the presence of M. le Comte de V——, and continued eating his strawberries and reading his paper as though no wolf were in that pleasant fold.

As the Count approached this table, it became sufficiently well known whom he was about to honor with his insolence; and the circle narrowed again to see the play. It is not bad sport, with some of us, to see a fellow-creature baited, — especially when we are out of danger ourselves.

The strawberry-eater's costume was not such as was ordinarily worn in France at that time, and he had a curious hat, which — the weather being warm — he had placed on the table by his side. "He is a foreigner," whispered some in the dress-circle. "Perhaps he does not know Monsieur le Comte."

Monsieur le Comte seated himself at the table opposite the unconscious stranger, and called loudly, "Garçon!"

"Garçon," he said, when that functionary appeared, "take me away that nasty thing!" pointing to the hat aforesaid.

Now the stranger's elbow, as he read his journal, was on the brim of the "nasty thing," which was a very good hat, but of British form and make. The garçon was embarrassed.

"Do you hear me?" thundered the Count. "Take me that thing away! No one has a right to place his hat on the table."

"I beg your pardon," said the strawberry-eater, politely, placing the offending article on his head, and drawing his chair a little aside; "I will make room for Monsieur."

The garçon was about to retire well satisfied, when the bully called after him, —

"Have I not commanded you to take that thing which annoys me away?"

"But, Monsieur le Comte, the gentleman has covered himself."

"What does that matter to me?"

"But, Monsieur le Comte, it is impossible."

"What is impossible?"

"That I should take the gentleman's hat."

"By no means," observed the stranger, uncovering again. "Be so good as to carry my hat to the lady at the counter; and ask her, on my behalf, to do me the favor to accept charge of it for the present."

"You speak French passably well for a foreigner," said the bully, stretching his arms over the table, and looking his neighbor full in the face, — a titter of contempt going round the circle.

"I am not a foreigner, Monsieur."

"I am sorry for that."

"So am I."

"May one, without indiscretion, inquire why?"

"Certainly. Because, if I were a foreigner, I should be spared the pain of seeing a compatriot behave himself very rudely."

"Meaning me?"

"Meaning, precisely, you."

"Do you know who I am?" asked the Count, half turning his back upon him, and facing the lookers-on, as much as to say, "Now observe how I will crush this poor creature."

"Monsieur," replied the strawberry-eater, with perfect politeness in his tone, "I have the honor not to know you."

"Death of my life! I am the Comte de V——."

The strawberry-eater looked up, and the easy, good-natured face was gone. In its place was one with two gray eyes which flashed like fire, and a mouth that set itself very firmly.

"The Comte de V——," he repeated in a low voice.

"Yes, Monsieur. And what have you to say against him?"

"I? O nothing."

"That may be well for you."

"But there are those who say he is a coward."

"That is enough," said the bully, starting to his feet. "Monsieur will find me in two hours at this address," flinging him a card.

"I shall not trouble myself to seek Monsieur le Comte," replied the strawberry-eater, calmly tearing the card in two.

"Then I shall say of Monsieur what he, permitting himself to lie, said just now of me."

"And that is?"

"That he is a coward."

"You may say what you please, Monsieur le Comte. Those who know me would not believe you, and those who do not, — my faith! what care I what they think?"

"And thou — thou art a Frenchman!"

No one but a Frenchman could have thrown so much disdain as he did into the "thou."

The strawberry-eater made no reply, but turned his head and called "Garçon!" The poor trembling creature came up again, wondering what new dilemma was prepared for him, and stood quaking some ten yards off.

"Garçon," said the stranger, "is there a room vacant in the hotel?"

"Without doubt, Monsieur."

"A large one?"

"But certainly. They are all large,—own apartments."

"Then engage the largest for me for to-day, and another — no matter what — for Monsieur le Comte."

"Monsieur, I give my own orders when necessary," said the count, loftily.

"I thought to spare you the trouble. Go, if you please," (this to the waiter,) "and prepare my rooms."

Then the strawberry-eater returned to his strawberries. The bully gnawed his lip. He could not make head or tail of this phlegmatic opponent. The circle grew a little wider, for a horrid idea got abroad, that the count had not found one who was likely to suit him, and that he would have to seek elsewhere what he wanted.

The murmur that went round roused the bully, "Monsieur," he hissed, "has presumed to make use of a word which amongst men of honor —"

"I beg your pardon?"

"Which amongst men of honor —"

"But what can Monsieur le Comte possibly know what is felt amongst men of honor?" asked the other, with a shrug of incredulity.

"Will you fight yourself with me, or will you not?" roared the count, goaded to fury.

"If Monsieur le Comte will give himself the trouble to accompany me to the apartment which, no doubt, is now prepared for me," replied the stranger, rising, "I will satisfy him."

"Good," said the other, kicking down his chair; "I am with you. I waive the usual preliminaries. I only beg to observe that I am without arms; but if you —"

"O, don't trouble yourself on that score," said the stranger, with a grim smile. "If you are not afraid, follow me."

This he said in a voice sufficiently loud for the nearest to hear, and the circle parted right and left, like startled sheep, as the two walked towards the house.

Was there no one to call "police," no one to try and prevent what to all seemed imminent? Not a soul! The dreaded duelist had his evil fit on, and every one breathed freely now that he knew the victim was selected. Moreover, no one supposed it would end there.

The count and his friend (?) were ushered into the apartment prepared for the latter, who, as soon as the garçon had left, took off his coat and waistcoat, and proceeded to move the furniture, so as to leave the room free for what was to follow, — the count standing with folded arms, glaring at him, the while. The decks being cleared for action, the stranger locked the door, placed the key on the mantel-piece behind him, and said, —

"I think you might have helped a little; but never mind. Will you give me your attention for five minutes?"

"Perfectly."

"Thank you. I am, as I have told you, a Frenchman, but I was educated in England, at one of her famous public schools. Had I been sent to one of our own Lycées, I should, perhaps, have gained more book-knowledge; but, as it is, I have learned some things which we do not teach, and one of them is, not to take a mean advantage of any man, but to keep my own head with my own hands. Do you understand me, Monsieur le Comte?"

"I cannot flatter myself that I do."

"Ha! Then I must be more explicit. I learned, then, that one who takes advantage of mere brute strength against the weak, or who, practised in any art, compels one unpractised in it to contend with him, is a coward and a knave. Do you follow me now, Monsieur le Comte?"

"I came here, Monsieur —"

"Never mind for what you came; be content with what you will get. For example, — to follow what I was observing, — if a man skilled with the small-sword, for the mere vicious love of quarrelling, goads to madness a boy who has never fenced in his life, and kills him, that man is a murderer; and more, — a cowardly murderer, and a knavish."

"I think I catch your meaning; but if you have pistols here —" foamed the bully.

"I do not come to eat strawberries with pistols in my pocket," replied the other, in the same calm tone he had used throughout. "Allow me to continue. At that school of which I have spoken, and in the society of men who have grown out of it, and others where the same habit of thought prevails, it would be considered that a man who had been guilty of such cowardice and knavery as I have mentioned, would be justly punished if, some day, he should be paid in his own coin by meeting some one who would take him at the same disadvantage as he placed that poor boy at."

"Our seconds shall fix your own weapons, Monsieur," said the count; "let this farce end."

"Presently. Those gentlemen whose opinions I now venture to express, not having that craze for blood which distinguishes some, — who have not had a similar enlightened education, — would probably think that such a coward and knave as we have been considering would best meet his deserts by receiving a humiliating castigation befitting his knavery and his cowardice."

"Ah! I see; I have a lawyer to deal with," sneered the count.

"Yes. I have studied a little law, but I regret to say I am about to break one of its provisions."

"You will fight me then?"

"Yes. At the school we have been speaking of, I learned, amongst other things, the use of my hands; and, if I mistake not, I am about to give you as sound a thrashing as any bully ever got."

"You would take advantage of your skill in the box?" said the Count, getting a little pale.

"Exactly. Just as you took advantage of your skill in the small-sword with poor young B——."

"But it is degrading — brutal!"

"My dear Monsieur, just consider. You are four inches taller and some thirty to forty kilogrammes heavier than I am. I have seldom seen so fine an outside. If you were to hit me a good swinging blow, it would go hard with me. In the same way, if poor young B—— had got over your guard, it would have gone hard with you. But, then, I shall only black both your eyes, and perhaps deprive you of a tooth or so, unhappily in front; whereas you killed him."

"I will not accept this barbarous encounter."

"You must; I have done talking. Would you like a little brandy before we begin? No? Place yourself on guard, then, if you please. When I have done with you, and you are fit to appear, then you shall have your revenge, — even with the small-sword, if you please. At present, bully — coward — knave, take that, and that, and that!"

And the wiry little Anglo-Frank was as good as his word. In less time than it takes to write it the great braggart was rendered unrepresentable for many a long day. That number one caused him to see fifty suns beaming in the firmament with his right eye; that number two produced a similar phenomenon with his left; that number three obliged him to swallow a front tooth, and to observe the ceiling more attentively than he had hitherto done. And when one or two other thats had completely cowed him, and he threw open the window and called for help, the strawberry-eater took him by the neck and — well, another and lower part, and flung him out of it on to the flower-bed below.

The strawberry-eater remained a month at Bordeaux to fulfil his promise of giving the Count his revenge. But then, again, the bully met with more than his match. The strawberry-eater had had Angelo for a master as well as Owen Swift, and after a few passes the Count, who was too eager to kill his man, felt an unpleasant sensation in his right shoulder. The seconds interposed, and there was an end of the affair. It was his last duel. Some one produced a sketch of him as he appeared being thrown out of the hotel window, and ridicule — so awful to a Frenchman — rid the country of him. The strawberry-eater was alive when the Battle of the Alma was fought, and is the only man to whom the above facts are known who never talks about them.

WOMEN AND POLITICS.

BY THE REV. CHARLES KINGSLEY.

SOMEWHAT more than three hundred years ago, John Knox, who did more than any man to mould the thoughts of his nation, — and indeed of our English Puritans likewise, — was writing a little book on the "Regiment of Women," in which he proved woman, on account of her natural inferiority to man, unfit to rule.

And but the other day, Mr. John Stuart Mill, who has done more than any man to mould the thought of the rising generation of Englishmen, has written a little book in the exactly opposite sense, on "The Subjection of Women," in which he proves woman, on account of her natural equality with man, to be fit to rule.

Truly "the whirligig of Time brings round its revenges." To this point the reason of civilized nations has come, or at least is coming fast, after some fifteen hundred years of unreason, and of a literature of unreason, which discoursed gravely and learnedly of nuns and witches, hysteria and madness, persecution and torture, and, like a madman in his dreams, built up by irrefragable logic a whole inverted pyramid of seeming truth upon a single false premise. To this it has come, after long centuries in which woman was regarded by celibate theologians as the "noxious animal," the temptress, the source of earthly misery, which derived — at least in one case — "femina" from "fe" faith, and "minus" less, because women had less faith than men; which represented them as of more violent and unbridled animal passions; which explained learnedly why they were more tempted than men to heresy and witchcraft, and more subject (those especially who had beautiful hair) to the attacks of demons; and, in a word, regarded them as a necessary evil, to be tolerated, despised, repressed, and if possible shut up in nunneries.

Of this literature of celibate unreason those who have no time to read for themselves the pages of Sprenger, Nider, or Delrio the Jesuit, may find notices enough in Michelet and in both Mr. Lecky's excellent works. They may find enough of it and to spare, also, in Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy." He, like Knox and many another scholar of the sixteenth and of the first half of the seventeenth century, was unable to free his brain altogether from the idola specûs which haunted the cell of the bookworm. The poor student, knowing nothing of women, save from books or from contact with the most debased, repeated, with the pruriency of a boy, the falsehoods about women which, armed with the authority of learned doctors, had grown reverend and incontestable with age; and even after the Reformation more than one witch-mania proved that the corrupt tree had vitality enough left to bring forth evil fruit.

But the axe had been laid to the root thereof. The later witch-prosecutions were not to be compared for extent and atrocity to the mediæval ones; and first, as it would seem, in France, and gradually in other European countries, the old contempt of women was being replaced by admiration and trust. Such examples as that of Marguerite d'Angoulême did much, especially in the south of France, where science as well as the Bible was opening men's eyes more and more to nature and to fact. Good little Rondelet, or any of his pupils, would have as soon thought of burning a woman for a witch as they would have of immuring her in a nunnery.

In Scotland, John Knox's book came, happily for the nation, too late. The woes of Mary Stuart called out for her a feeling of chivalry which has done much, even to the present day, to elevate the Scotch character. Meanwhile, the same influences which raised the position of women among the Reformed in France raised it likewise in Scotland; and there is no country on earth in which wives and mothers have been more honored, and more justly honored, for two centuries and more. In England, the passionate loyalty with which Elizabeth was regarded, at least during the latter part of her reign, scattered to the winds all John Knox's arguments against the "Regiment of Women"; and a literature sprang up in which woman was set forth no longer as the weakling and the temptress, but as the guide and the inspirer of man. Whatever traces of the old foul leaven may be found in Beaumont and Fletcher, Massinger, or Ben Jonson, such books as Sidney's Arcadia, Lilly's Euphues, Spenser's Fairy Queen, and last, but not least, Shakespeare's Plays, place the conception of woman and of the rights of woman on a vantage-ground from which I believe it can never permanently fall again, — at least until (which God forbid) true manhood has died out of England. To a boy whose notions of his duty to woman had been formed, not on Horace and Juvenal, but on Spenser and Shakespeare, — as I trust they will be some day in every public school, — Mr. John Stuart Mill's new book would seem little more than a textbook of truths which had been familiar and natural to him ever since he first stood by his mother's knee.

I say this not in depreciation of Mr. Mill's book. I mean it for the very highest praise. M. Agassiz says somewhere that every great scientific truth must go through three stages of public opinion. Men will say of it, first, that it is not true; next, that it is contrary to religion; and lastly, that every one knew it already. The last assertion of the three is often more than half true. In many cases every one ought to have known the truth already, if they had but used their common sense. The great antiquity of the earth is a case in point. Forty years ago it was still untrue; five-and-twenty years ago it was still contrary to religion. Now every child who uses his common sense can see, from looking at the rocks and stones about him, that the earth is many thousand, it may be many hundreds of thousands of years old; and there is no difficulty now in making him convince himself, by his own eyes and his own reason, of the most prodigious facts of the glacial epoch.

And so it ought to be with the truths which Mr. Mill has set forth. If the minds of lads can but be kept clear of Pagan brutalities and mediæval superstitions, and fed instead on the soundest and noblest of our English literature, Mr. Mill's creed about women will, I verily believe, seem to them as one which they have always held by instinct; as a natural deduction from their own intercourse with their mothers, their aunts, their sisters; and thus Mr. Mill's book may achieve the highest triumph of which such a book is capable; namely, that years hence young men will not care to read it, because they take it all for granted.

There are those who for years past have held opinions concerning women identical with those of Mr. Mill. They thought it best, however, to keep them to themselves, trusting to the truth of the old saying, "Run not round after the world. If you stand still long enough, the world will come round to you." And the world seems now to be coming round very fast towards their standing-point; and that not from theory, but from experience. As to the intellectual capacity of girls when competing with boys (and I may add as to the prudence of educating boys and girls together), the experience of those who for twenty years past have kept up mixed schools, in which the farmer's daughter has sat on the same bench with the laborer's son, has been corroborated by all who have tried mixed classes, or have, like the Cambridge local examiners, applied to the powers of girls the same tests as they applied to boys; and still more strikingly by the results of admitting women to the Royal College of Science in Ireland, where young ladies have repeatedly carried off prizes for scientific knowledge against young men who have proved themselves, by subsequent success, in life to have been formidable rivals. On every side the conviction seems growing (a conviction which any man might have arrived at for himself long ago, if he would have taken the trouble to compare the powers of his own daughters with those of his sons), that there is no difference in kind, and probably none in degree, between the intellect of a woman and that of a man; and those who will not as yet assent to this are growing more willing to allow fresh experiments on the question, and to confess that, after all (as Mr. Fitch well says in his report to the Schools Inquiry Commission), "The true measure of a woman's right is her capacity for receiving it, and not any theories of ours as to what she is fit for, or what use she is likely to make of it."

This is, doubtless, a most important concession. For if it be allowed to be true of woman's capacity for learning, it ought to be — and I believe will be — allowed to be true of all her other capacities whatsoever. From which fresh concession results will follow, startling no doubt to those who fancy that the world always was, and always will be, what it was yesterday and to-day; but results which some who have contemplated them steadily and silently for years past, have learnt to look at not with fear and confusion, but with earnest longing and high hope.

However startling these results may be, it is certain from the books, the names whereof head this article, that some who desire their fulfilment are no mere fanatics or dreamers. They evince, without exception, that moderation which is a proof of true earnestness. Mr. Mill's book it is almost an impertinence in me to praise. I shall not review it in detail. It is known, I presume, to every reader of this Magazine, either by itself or reviews; but let me remind those who only know the book through reviews, that those reviews (however able or fair) are most probably written by men of inferior intellect to Mr. Mill, and by men who have not thought over the subject as long and as deeply as he has done; and that, therefore, if they wish to know what Mr. Mill thinks, it would be wisest for them to read Mr. Mill himself, — a truism which (in these days of second-hand knowledge) will apply to a good many books beside. But if they still fancy that the advocates of "Woman's Rights" in England are of the same temper as certain female clubbists in America, with whose sayings and doings the public has been amused or shocked, then I beg them to peruse the article on the "Social Position of Women," by Mr. Boyd Kinnear; to find any fault with it they can; and after that, to show cause why it should not be reprinted (as it ought to be) in the form of a pamphlet, and circulated among the working-men of Britain, to remind them that their duty toward woman coincides (as do all human duties) with their own palpable interest. I beg also attention to Dr. Hodgson's little book, "Lectures on the Education of Girls, and Employment of Women"; and not only to the text, but to the valuable notes and references which accompany them. Or if any one wish to ascertain the temper, as well as the intellectual calibre of the ladies who are foremost in this movement, let them read, as specimens of two different styles, the Introduction to "Woman's Work and Woman's Culture," by Mrs. Butler, and the article on "Female Suffrage" by Miss Wedgwood, at page 247. I only ask that these two articles should be judged on their own merits, — the fact that they are written by women being ignored meanwhile. After that has been done, it may be but just and right for the man who has read them to ask himself (especially if he has had a mother) whether women who can so think and write have not a right to speak, and a right to be heard when they speak, of a subject with which they must be better acquainted than men, — woman's capacities, and woman's needs?

If any one who has not as yet looked into this "Woman's Question," wishes to know how it has risen to the surface just now, let them consider these words of Mrs. Butler. They will prove at least, that the movement has not had its origin in the study, but in the market; not from sentimental dreams or abstract theories, but from the necessities of physical fact:—

"The census taken eight years ago gave three and a half millions of women in England working for a subsistence: and of these two and a half millions were unmarried. In the interval between the census of 1851 and that of 1861, the number of self-supporting women had increased by more than half a million. This is significant; and still more striking, I believe, on this point, will be the returns of the next census two years hence."*

Thus a demand for employment has led naturally to a demand for improved education, fitting woman for employment; and that again has led, naturally also, to a demand on the part of many thoughtful women for a share in making those laws and those social regulations which have, while made exclusively by men resulted in leaving women at a disadvantage at every turn. They ask,—and they have surely some cause to ask,—What greater right have men to dictate to women the rules by which they shall live, than women have to dictate to men? All they demand—all, at least, that is demanded in the volumes noticed in this review—is fair play for women,—“A clear stage and no favor.” Let “natural selection,” as Miss Wedgwood well says, decide which is the superior, and in what. Let it by the laws of supply and demand, draft women as well as men into the employments and positions for which they are most fitted by nature. To those who believe that the laws of nature are the laws of God, the Vox Dei in rebus revelata; that to obey them is to prove our real faith in God, to interfere with them (as we did in social relations throughout the Middle Ages, and as we did till lately in commercial relations likewise) by arbitrary restrictions is to show that we have no faith in God, and consider ourselves wise enough to set right an ill-made universe,—to them at least this demand must seem both just and modest.

Meanwhile many women, and some men also, think the social status of women is just now in special peril. The late extension of the franchise has admitted to a share in framing our laws many thousands of men of that class which—whatever be their other virtues, and they are many—is most given to spending their wives' earnings in drink, and personally maltreating them; and least likely—to judge from the actions of certain trades—to admit women to free competition for employment. Further extension of the suffrage will, perhaps in a very few years, admit many thousands more. And it is no wonder if refined and educated women, in an age which is disposed to see in the possession of a vote the best means of self-defence, should ask for votes, for the defence, not merely of themselves, but of their lowlier sisters, from the tyranny of men who are as yet—to the shame of the State—most of them altogether uneducated.

As for the reasonableness of such a demand, I can only say,—what has been said elsewhere,—that the present state of things, “in which the franchise is considered as something so important and so sacred that the most virtuous, the most pious, the most learned, the most wealthy, the most benevolent, the most justly powerful woman, is refused it, as something too precious for her; and yet it is intrusted, freely and hopefully, to any illiterate, drunken, wife-beating ruffian who can contrive to keep a home over his head,” is equally unjust and absurd.

There may be some sufficient answer to the conclusion which conscience and common sense, left to themselves, would draw from this statement of the case as it now stands: but none has occurred to me which is not contrary to the first principle of a free government.

This I presume to be: that every citizen has a right to share in choosing those who make the laws; in order to prevent, as far as he can, laws being made which are unjust and injurious to him, to his family, or to his class; and that all are to be considered as “active” citizens, save the criminal, the insane, or those unable to support themselves. The best rough test of a man's being able to support himself is, I doubt not, his being able to keep a house over his head, or, at least, a permanent lodging; and that, I presume, will be in a few years the one and universal test of active citizenship, unless we should meanwhile obtain the boon of a compulsory Government education, and an educational franchise founded thereon. But it must be asked,—and answered also,—What is there in such a test, even as it stands now, only partially applied, which is not as fair for women as it is for men? “Is it just that an educated man, who is able independently to earn his own livelihood, should have a vote; but that an equally educated woman, equally able independently to earn her own livelihood, should not? Is it just that a man owning a certain quantity of property should have a vote in respect of that property; but that a woman owning the same quantity of property, and perhaps a hundred or a thousand times more, should have no vote?” What difference, founded on Nature and Fact, exists between the two cases?

If it be said that Nature and Fact (arguments grounded on aught else are to be left to monks and mediæval jurists) prove that women are less able than men to keep a house over their head, or to manage their property, the answer is that Fact is the other way. Women are just as capable as men of managing a large estate, a vast wealth. Mr. Mill gives a fact which surprised even him,—that the best administered Indian States were those governed by women who could neither read nor write and were confined all their lives to the privacy of the harem. And any one who knows the English upper classes must know more than one illustrious instance,—besides that of Miss Burdett Coutts, or the late Dowager Lady Londonderry,—in which a woman has proved herself able to use wealth and power as well or better than most men. The woman at least is not likely by gambling, horse-racing, and profligacy, to bring herself and her class to shame. Women, too, in every town keep shops. Is there the slightest evidence that these shops are not as well managed, and as remunerative, as those kept by men?—unless, indeed, as too often happens, poor Madame has her Mantalini and his vices to support, as well as herself and her children. As for the woman's power of supporting herself and keeping up at least a lodging respectably, can any one have lived past middle age without meeting dozens of single women or widows, of all ranks, who do that and do it better and more easily than men, because they do not, like men, require wine, beer, tobacco, and sundry other luxuries? So wise and thrifty are such women that very many of them are able, out of their own pittance, to support beside themselves others who have no legal claim upon them. Who does not know, if he knows anything of society, the truth of Mrs. Butler's words? — "It is a very generally accepted axiom, and one which it seems has been indorsed by thoughtful men without a sufficiently minute examination into the truth of it, that a man — in the matter of maintenance — means generally a man, a wife, and children: while a woman means herself alone, free of dependence. A closer inquiry into the facts of life would prove that conclusions have been too hastily adopted on the latter head. I believe it may be said with truth that there is scarcely a female teacher in England who is not working for another or others besides herself, — that a very large proportion are urged on of necessity in their work by the dependence on them of whole families, in many cases of their own aged parents, — that many hundreds are keeping broken-down relatives, fathers, and brothers out of the workhouse, and that many are widows supporting their own children. A few examples taken at random from the lists of governesses applying to the Institution in Sackville Street, London, would illustrate this point. And let it be remembered that such cases are the rule; and not the exception. Indeed, if the facts of life were better known, the holowness of this defence of the inequality of payment would become manifest; for it is in theory alone that in families man is the only bread-winner, and it is false to suppose that single women have no obligations to make and to save money as sacred as those which are imposed on a man by marriage; while there is this difference that a man may avoid such obligation if he pleases, by refraining from marriage, while the poverty of parents or the dependence of brothers and sisters are circumstances over which a woman obliged to work for others has no control."*

True: and, alas! too true. But what Mrs. Butler asserts of governesses may be asserted, with equal truth, of hundreds of maiden aunts and maiden sisters who are not engaged in teaching, but who spend their money, their time, their love, their intellect, upon profligate or broken-down relations, or upon their children; and who exhibit through long years of toil, anxiety, self-sacrifice, a courage, a promptitude, a knowledge of business and of human nature, and a simple but lofty standard of duty and righteousness, which if it does not fit them for the franchise, what can?

It may be that such women would not care to use the franchise if they had it. That is their concern, not ours. Voters who do not care to vote may be counted by thousands among men: some of them, perhaps, are wiser than their fellows, and not more foolish, and take that method of showing their wisdom. Be that as it may, we are no more justified in refusing a human being a right, because he may not choose to exercise it, than we are in refusing to pay him his due, because he may probably hoard the money.

The objection that such women are better without a vote, because a vote would interest them in politics, and so interfere with their domestic duties, seems slender enough. What domestic duties have they, of which the State can take cognizance, save their duty to those to whom they may owe money, and their duty to keep the peace? Their other and nobler duties are voluntary and self-imposed; and, most usually, are fulfilled as secretly as possible. The State commits an injustice in debarring a woman from the rights of a citizen because she chooses, over and above them, to perform the good works of a saint.

And, after all, will it be the worse for these women, or for the society in which they live, if they do interest themselves in politics? Might not (as Mr. Boyd Kinnear urges in an article as sober and rational as it is earnest and chivalrous) their purity and earnestness help to make what is now called politics somewhat more pure, somewhat more earnest? Might not the presence of the voting power of a few virtuous, experienced, well-educated women keep candidates, for every shame, from saying and doing things from which they do not shrink, before a crowd of men who are, on the average, neither virtuous, experienced, nor well-educated, by wholesome dread of that most terrible of all earthly punishments, — at least in the eyes of a manly man, — the fine scorn of a noble woman? Might not the intervention of a few women who are living according to the eternal laws of God, help to infuse some slightly stronger tincture of those eternal laws into our legislators and their legislation? What women have done for the social reforms of the last forty years is known, or ought to be known, to all. Might not they have done far more, and might not they do far more hereafter, if they, who generally know far more than men do of human suffering, and of the consequences of human folly, were able to ask for further social reforms, not merely as a boon to be begged from the physically stronger sex, but as their will, which they, as citizens, have a right to see fulfilled, if just and possible? Woman has played for too many centuries the part which Lady Godiva plays in the old legend. It is time that she should not be content with mitigating by her entreaties or her charities the cruelty and greed of men, but exercise her right, as a member of the State, and (as I believe) a member of Christ and a child of God, to forbid them.

As for any specific difference between the intellect of women and that of men, which should preclude the former meddling in politics, I must confess that the subtle distinctions drawn, even by those who uphold the intellectual equality of women, have almost, if not altogether, escaped me. The only important difference, I think, is, that men are generally duller and more conceited than women. The dullness is natural enough, on the broad ground that the males of all animals (being more sensual and selfish) are duller than the females. The conceit is easily accounted for. The English boy is told from childhood, as the negro boy is, that men are superior to women. The negro boy shows his assent to the proposition by beating his mother, the English one by talking down his sisters. That is all.

But if there be no specific intellectual difference (as there is actually none), is there any practical and moral difference? I use the two epithets as synonymous, for practical power may exist without acuteness of intellect; but it cannot exist without sobriety, patience, and courage, and sundry other virtues, which are "moral" in every sense of that word.

I know of no such difference. There are, doubtless, fields of political action more fitted for men than for women; but are there not again fields more fitted for women than for men? — fields in which certain women, at least, have already shown such practical capacity, that they have established not only their own right, but a general right for the able and educated of their sex, to advise officially about that which they themselves have unofficially mastered. Who will say that Mrs. Fry, or Miss Nightingale, or Miss Burdett Coutts, is not as fit to demand pledges of a candidate at the hustings on important social questions as any male elector; or to give her deliberate opinion thereon, in either House of Parliament, as any average M. P. or peer of the realm? And if it be said that these are only brilliant exceptions, the rejoinder is, What proof have you of that? You cannot pronounce on the powers of the average till you have tried them. These exceptions rather prove the existence of unsuspected and unemployed strength below. If a few persons of genius, in any class, succeed in breaking through the barriers of routine and prejudice, their success shows that they have left behind them many more who would follow in their steps if those barriers were but removed. This has been the case in every forward movement, religious, scientific, or social. A daring spirit here and there has shown his fellow-men what could be known, what could be done; and behold, when once awakened to a sense of their own powers, multitudes have proved themselves as capable, though not as daring, as the leaders of their forlorn hope. Dozens of geologists can now work out problems which would have puzzled Hutton or Werner; dozens of surgeons can perform operations from which John Hunter would have shrunk appalled; and dozens of women, were they allowed, would, I believe, fulfil in political and official posts the hopes which Miss Wedgwood and Mr. Boyd Kinnear entertain.

But, after all, it is hard to say anything on this matter, which has not been said in other words, by Mr. Mill himself, in pages 98-104 of his "Subjection of Women"; or give us more sound and palpable proof of women's political capacity than the paragraph with which he ends his argument:—

"Is it reasonable to think that those who are fit for the greater functions of politics are incapable of qualifying themselves for the less? Is there any reason, in the nature of things, that the wives and sisters of princes should, whenever called on, be found as competent as the princes themselves to their business, but that the wives and sisters of statesmen, and administrators, and directors of companies, and managers of public institutions, should be unable to do what is done by their brothers and husbands? The real reason is plain enough; it is that princesses, being more raised above the generality of men by their rank than placed below them by their sex, have never been taught that it was improper for them to concern themselves with politics, but have been allowed to feel the liberal interest natural to any cultivated human being, in the great transactions which took place around them, and in which they might be called on to take a part. The ladies of reigning families are the only women who are allowed the same range of interests and freedom of development as men; and it is precisely in their case that there is not found to be any inferiority. Exactly where and in proportion as women's capacities for government have been tried, in that proportion have they been found adequate."

Though the demands of women just now are generally urged in the order of—first, employment, then education, and lastly, the franchise, I have dealt principally with the latter, because I sincerely believe that it, and it only, will lead to their obtaining a just measure of the two former. Had I been treating of an ideal, or even a truly civilized polity, I should have spoken of education first; for education ought to be the necessary and sole qualification for the franchise. But we have not so ordered it in England in the case of men; and in all fairness we ought not to do so in the case of women. We have not so ordered it, and we had no right to order it otherwise than we have done. If we have neglected to give the masses due education, we have no right to withhold the franchise on the strength of that neglect. Like Frankenstein, we may have made our man ill: but we cannot help his being alive; and if he destroys us, it is our own fault.

If any reply, that to add a number of uneducated women-voters to the number of uneducated men-voters will be only to make the danger worse, the answer is: That women will be always less brutal than men, and will exercise on them (unless they are maddened, as in the first French Revolution, by the hunger and misery of their children) the same softening influence in public life which they now exercise in private; and, moreover, that as things stand now, the average woman is more educated, in every sense of the word, than the average man; and that to admit women would be to admit a class of voters superior not inferior, to the average.

Startling as this may sound to some I assert that it is true.

We must recollect that the just complaints of the insufficient education of girls proceed almost entirely from that "lower-upper" class which stocks the professions, including the Press; that this class furnishes only a small portion of the whole number of voters; that the vast majority belong (and will belong still more hereafter) to other classes, of whom we may say, that in all of them the girls are better educated than the boys. They stay longer at school,—sometimes twice as long. They are more open to the purifying and elevating influences of religion. Their brains are neither muddled away with drink and profligacy, nor narrowed by the one absorbing aim of turning a penny into five farthings. They have a far larger share than their brothers of that best of all practical and moral educations, that of family life. Any one who has had experience of the families of farmers and small tradesmen knows how boorish the lads are, beside the intelligence, and often the refinement, of their sisters. The same rule holds (I am told) in the manufacturing districts. Even in the families of employers, the young ladies are, and have been for a generation or two, far more highly cultivated than their brothers, whose intellects are always early absorbed in business, and too often injured by pleasure. The same, I believe, in spite of all that has been written about the frivolity of the girl of the period, holds true of that class which is, by a strange irony, called "the ruling class." I suspect that the average young lady already learns more worth knowing at home than her brother does at the public school. Those, moreover, who complain that girls are trained now too often merely as articles for the so-called "marriage market," must remember this,—that the great majority of those who will have votes will be either widows, who have long passed all that, have had experience, bitter and wholesome, of the realities of life, and have most of them given many pledges to the State in the form of children; or women who, by various circumstances, have been early withdrawn from the competition of this same marriage market and have settled down into nurand honorable celibacy, with full time, and generally full inclination, to cultivate and employ their own powers. I know not what society those men may have lived in who are in the habit of sneering at "old maids." My experience has led me to regard them with deep respect, from the servant retired on her little savings to the unmarried sisters of the rich and the powerful, as a class pure, unselfish, thoughtful, useful, often experienced and able; more fit for the franchise, when they are once awakened to their duties as citizens than the average men of the corresponding class. I am aware that such a statement will be met with "laughter, the unripe fruit of wisdom." But that will not affect its truth.

Let me say a few words more on this point. There are those who, while they pity the two millions and a half, or more, of unmarried women earning their own bread, are tempted to do no more than pity them, from the mistaken notion that after all it is their own fault, or at least the fault of nature. They ought (it is fancied) to have been married: or at least they ought to have been good-looking enough and clever enough to be married. They are the exceptions, and for exceptions we cannot legislate. We must take care of the average article, and let the refuse take care of itself. I have but plainly, it may be somewhat coarsely, a belief which I believe many men hold, though they are too manly to express it. But the belief itself is false. It is false even of the lower classes. Among them, the cleverest, the most prudent, the most thoughtful, are those who, either in domestic service or a few—very few, alas!—other callings, attain comfortable and responsible posts which they do not care to leave for any marriage, especially when that marriage puts the savings of their life at the mercy of the husband,—and they see but too many miserable instances of what that implies. The very refinement which they have acquired in domestic service often keeps them from wedlock. "I shall never marry," said an admirable nurse, the daughter of a common agricultural laborer. "After being so many years among gentlefolk, I could not live with a man who was not a scholar, and did not bathe every day."

And if this be true of the lower class, it is still more true of some, at least, of the classes above them. Many a "lady" who remains unmarried does so, not for want of suitors, but simply from nobleness of mind; because others are dependent on her for support; or because she will not degrade herself by marrying for marrying's sake. How often does one see all that can make a woman attractive—talent, wit, education, health, beauty—possessed by one who never will enter holy wedlock. "What a loss," one says, "that such a woman should not have married, if it were but for the sake of the children she might have borne to the State." "Perhaps," answer wise women of the world, "she did not see any one whom she could condescend to marry."

And thus it is that a very large proportion of the spinsters of England, so far from being, as silly boys and wicked old men fancy, the refuse of their sex, are the very élite thereof; those who have either sacrificed themselves for their kindred, or have refused to sacrifice themselves to that longing to marry at all risks of which women are so often and so unmanly accused.

Be all this as it may, every man is bound to bear in mind that over this increasing multitude of "spinsters," of women who are either self-supporting or desirous of so being, men have, by mere virtue of their sex, absolutely no rights at all. No human being has such a right over them as the husband has (justly or unjustly) over the wife, or the father over the daughter living in his house. They are independent and self-supporting units of the State, owing to it exactly the same allegiance as, and neither more nor less than, men who have attained their majority. They are favored by no privilege, indulgence, or exceptional legislation from the State; and they ask none. They expect no protection from the State save that protection for life and property which every man, even the most valiant, expects, since the carrying of side-arms has gone out of fashion. They prove themselves daily, whenever they have simple fair play, just as capable as men of not being a burden to the State. They are in fact in exactly the same relation to the State as men. Why are similar relations, similar powers, and similar duties not to carry with them similar rights? To this question the common sense and justice of England will have soon to find an answer. I have sufficient faith in that common sense and justice, when once awakened to face any question fairly, to anticipate what that answer will be.

THE TIDAL WAVE.

THE approach of one of the highest Tides which the combined attraction of the sun and moon can possibly raise has made many of us look up our acquaintance with the laws of Tidal Motion. Every one has satisfied himself why the coming spring tide will be higher than usual. We know that the moon will be near the equinoctial when new, and also near her perigee; and that the combination of these circumstances at a season of the year when the tidal wave raised by the sun is unusually high, must necessarily result in causing a very remarkable tide, even though the winds should be unfavorable. For if we do not have a particularly high tide, owing to the influence of the winds being opposed to the progress of the tidal wave, there will be the equally significant phenomenon of a singular withdrawal of the water at the time of low tide. A few years ago, when a very high tide was expected on the shores of France, the winds drove back the sea, and many who had come from far inland to witness the great influx of water returned disappointed. But had they waited for six hours or so, they would have been well rewarded for their journey, since at the time of low tide the water withdrew far within the usual limits, and strange sights were revealed to the wondering fishermen who lived along that shore.

Wrecks of forgotten ships were to be seen half-buried in the ooze and slime of a bottom which had remained sea-covered for centuries. Old anchors were disclosed to view, with the broken cables attached to them, on which the lives of many gallant men had once depended, so that every parted strand seemed the record of a lost life. And crawling things and stranded fish showed how far the great sea had retreated within its ordinary bounds. We may, therefore, expect that results well worth noting will under any circumstances accompany the tidal action of October 6th, on which day the effects of the conjunction of the sun and moon on October 5th will be most strikingly manifested.

But our object at present is less to consider the effects of the great tidal wave of October 6th, than to dwell upon some interesting effects and peculiarities of tidal motion. When we learn that astronomers for the most part recognize in the tidal wave a cause which will one day reduce the earth's rotation so effectually that instead of twenty-four hours our day will last a lunar month,—while many astronomers believe that the same wave will at a yet more distant day bring the moon into collision with our globe,—it will be seen that the laws of the tides have a comical as well as a local interest. They involve more important considerations than whether the water in the Thames will rise a foot or two higher than usual at Vauxhall Bridge on any particular day. And though many thousands of years must elapse before either of the events looked forward to by astronomers shall have happened, yet we cannot but look with deep interest into the long vista of the coming centuries. To the astronomer, at any rate, the study of what will be, or of what has been, is as interesting even as the study of what is.

But at the very threshold of the inquiry we are met by the question, "Do any of us know the law of the tides?" The reader may be disposed to smile at such a question. Does not every book of geography, every popular treatise on astronomy, teach us all about the tides? Cannot every person of average education and intelligence run through the simple explanation of the tidal wave?

Certainly it is so. Most of us suppose we know in a general way (and that is all that we at present want), how the moon or sun draws a tidal wave after it. The explanation which nine hundred and ninety-nine (at least) out of every thousand would give runs much on this wise: Being nearer to the water immediately under her than to the earth's centre, the moon draws that water somewhat away from the earth; and again, being nearer to the earth's centre than to the water directly beyond, the moon draws the earth away from that water. Thus, underneath the moon a heap of water is raised, and at the directly opposite point a heap of water is left (so to speak). So that were it not for the effects of friction, the water would assume a sort of egg-shaped figure, whose longest diameter would point directly towards the moon.

And not only is this the explanation which is invariably given in popular treatises, but scientific men of the utmost eminence have adopted it, as correctly exhibiting the general facts of the case. Recently, for example, when Mr. Adams had published his proof that the moon's motion is gradually becoming accelerated in a way which the lunar theory cannot account for, M. Delaunay, a leading French astronomer, endeavored to prove that in reality it is the earth's rotation which is diminishing, instead of the moon's motion which is increasing. He thought the tidal wave, continually checked by the earth's friction as it travels against the direction of her rotation, would act as a sort of "break," since its friction must, in turn, check the earth. And in discussing this matter he took, as his fundamental axioms, the law of tidal motion commonly given in our books of geography and astronomy. This presently called up the Astronomer Royal, who gave a very clear and convincing demonstration that there would always be low water under the moon, if there were no friction.

But this is not all, nor is it even the most remarkable part of the case. Eminent as the Astronomer Royal deservedly is, and especially skilful as we know him to be in questions such as the one we are considering, yet if he were solus contra mundum, we might readily believe that there was some flaw in his reasoning since, as every one knows, the most eminent mathematicians have sometimes misconceived the bearings of a perplexing problem.

But, as Mr. Airy himself pointed out, Newton and Laplace were both with him!

How is it that the views of Newton and Laplace, admittedly the very highest authorities which could be quoted, have found no place in our treatises of astronomy? Their views have never been disproved. In fact, as we have seen, one of the most eminent of our mathematicians, in re-examining the question, has come to precisely the same conclusion. Can it be that the explanation actually given is preferred, on account of its greater simplicity? That would be reasonable, if the two explanations were accordant, but they happen unfortunately to be wholly opposed to each other, and therefore one of them must be false. Those who teach us our geography and astronomy ought to look to this.

The worst of it is, that most of the consequences which astronomers ascribe to the action of the tidal wave depend on the choice we make between the rival theories. If the ordinary view is right, the moon's motion is continually being hastened by the attraction of the bulging tidal wave, and this hastening will bring the moon into a smaller and smaller orbit until at last she will be brought into contact with the earth, unless, as Professor Alexander Herschel suggests, she should crumble under the increased effects of the earth's action, and so come to form a ring of fragments around our globe. If, however, the other view is right, the moon's motion will be continually retarded,* her orbit will gradually widen out, and some day, presumably, we shall lose her altogether.

Again, if the views commonly given are just, the earth's friction should cause the tidal wave to lag behind its true place. But if Newton, Laplace, and Airy are right, then, to use the words of the last-named astronomer, "the effect of friction will be to accelerate the time of each individual tide."

We apprehend that there is room for improvement in the current account of the tides. Many eminent men, as Whewell, Lubbock, and Haughton, have discussed in the most elaborate and skilful manner the laws according to which the actual tidal wave travels along the great sea-paths. But as yet no one has tried to reconcile the theory of Newton, which may be called the dynamical theory of the tides, with that commonly given in our books, which may be called the statical theory.

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF JOHN ACKLAND.

A TRUE STORY.

IN THIRTEEN CHAPTERS. CHAPTER IX.

ON inquiry at the police station in Charleston, S. C. Mr. Tom Ackland, accompanied by Mr. Cartwright, was shown the hat and book mentioned by the Charleston Messenger. Mr. Tom Ackland rather thought that he had once seen the book in the possession of his Cousin John. But of this he could not feel sure. The name, both in the book and in the hat, was printed. The handwriting on the margin of the page opposite the marked passage in the book proved to be quite illegible, but bore a strong resemblance to the sprawling and unsteady characters of the last two letters received by Mr. Tom Ackland from his cousin. Inside the hat they found the mark of a Georgetown maker, partly effaced. The police, after their first inquiries in Charleston, having jumped to the conclusion that they were being hoaxed, had treated the whole affair so carelessly that they had not even attempted to follow up this indication. Cartwright was the first to point it out. In consequence of this discovery, Mr. Tom Ackland immediately proceeded to Georgetown, and had no difficulty in finding there the hatter whose name and address Cartwright had detected inside the hat. On examining the hat, and referring to his books, the hatter identified it as having been sold on the 29th of last September. To whom? He could not say. So many different hats were sold in the course of a day to so many different people. He would ask his young men. One of his young men thought he had sold a hat of that description some time ago, but could not positively say it was on the 29th of September, to a gentleman who had one arm in a sling. Right arm? Could not remember, but thought it was the right arm. Hat was paid for in ready money. Was the gentleman on foot, or in a carriage? Thought he was on foot, but could not remember distinctly.

* The retarding and hastening mentioned in the above paragraph refer to the rate at which the moon completes her revolutions round the earth. As a matter of fact, paradoxical as it sounds, it is a continual process of retarding which eventually hastens the moon's motion. Every check on the moon's motion gives the earth an increased pull on her, and this pull adds more to her velocity than she lost by the check. And vice versa.

This was all the information Tom Ackland could obtain at Georgetown. He inquired at all the hotels there, but could not find the name of Ackland inscribed in any of their books. On his return to Charleston, Cartwright told him that his own inquiries at the hotels and boarding-houses in that city had been equally infructuous.

On inquiring at the post-office, they were informed that letters had certainly been received there for John K. Ackland, Esq., and regularly delivered to a gentleman so calling himself, who applied for them daily. What sort of looking gentleman? Very invalid-looking gentleman, always muffled up to the chin in a long cloak, and seemed to suffer from cold even when the weather was oppressively hot.

"Was he at all like this gentleman?" asked Cartwright, pointing to Tom Ackland.

Really could n't recall any resemblance.

Noticed anything else particular about him?

Yes. He carried one arm in a sling and limped slightly.

Anything else?

Yes. Spoke with rather an odd accent.

Yankee accent?

Well, hardly. Could n't well say what it was like. But the gentleman rarely spoke at all, and seemed rather deaf.

Had been for his letters lately?

Not since the 15th of October. There was one letter still lying there to his address. Explanations having been given by the two gentlemen, this letter was eventually, with the sanction of the police officer who accompanied them, handed over to Mr. Tom Ackland, that gentleman having claimed it on behalf of his cousin. It proved to be his own reply to John Ackland's last letter to himself.

Had the gentleman never communicated to the post-office his address in Charleston?

Never.

Tom groaned in the spirit. He could no longer entertain the least doubt that his worst fears had been but too well founded. The absolute and universal ignorance which appeared to prevail at Charleston of the existence of any such person as John Ackland would have been altogether inexplicable if John Ackland's own letters to Tom, alluding to the profound seclusion in which he had been living ever since his arrival in that city, did not partly explain it. No such person having ever been seen or heard of on 'Change, or at any of the banks in Charleston, how had John Ackland been living? Cartwright suggested that it was possible that he might have been living all this while on the money which he himself had paid over to him in notes at Glenoak.

"That is true," thought Tom Ackland; for he remembered that his cousin in his last letter from Glenoak, had stated that the notes were still in his possession. But nothing short of insanity could account for his not having deposited them, since then, at any bank. Unhappily such an hypothesis was by no means improbable. Who was that Spanish gentleman who professed to have discovered the hat and book of John Ackland's on the bank of the river? Could he have been John Ackland's assassin? But if so, why should he have spontaneously attracted attention to the disappearance of his victim, and promoted investigation into the circumstances of it? His story, as reported by the Charleston Messenger, was indeed so extravagant as to justify the opinion expressed by that journal. But Tom Ackland had in his possession letters from his cousin which made the story appear far less improbable to him than it might reasonably appear to any one not acquainted with the state of John Ackland's mind during the last month. It was very unlucky that there was now no possibility of seeing and speaking with that Spanish gentleman. For the gentleman in question, after having postponed his departure in order to aid the inquiries of the police, had left Charleston about two days before Tom Ackland's arrival there, on being assured by the authorities that his presence was not required. And he had left behind him no indication of his present whereabouts.

This was the position of affairs with Mr. Tom Ackland, and his inquiries appeared to have come to a hopeless dead lock, when, late one night, Mr. Cartwright (who had been absent during the whole of the day) burst into his room with the announcement that he had obtained important information about John Ackland.

It had occurred to him, he said, that John Ackland must, from all accounts, have been a confirmed invalid for the last few months. If so, he would probably have sought some country lodging in the neighborhood of Charleston, where the situation was healthiest, without being inconveniently far from town, in case he should require medical assistance. Acting at once on this supposition (which, in order not to excite false hopes, in case it should lead to nothing, he had refrained from communicating to Tom), he had determined to visit all the environs of Charleston. He had that morning selected for his first voyage of discovery a locality only a few miles distant from Charleston, which he knew to be a particularly healthy situation. His inquiries there were not successful, and he was on the point of returning to Charleston, when he fortunately recollected that he had not yet visited a little lodging-house where he remembered having once taken rooms himself, many years ago, when he was at Charleston with his poor wife, then in very weak health. He was not aware whether that house still existed, but he thought he would try; and he had been rewarded for his pains by learning from its landlady that some time ago a gentleman, who said his name was Ackland, called there, saw the house, and took it for six months. He paid the rent in advance, and had placed his effects in the house. But, to the best of the landlady's belief, he had not once slept at home since he became her tenant. He frequently came there, indeed, during the day, and had sometimes taken his meals there. But on all such occasions it was his habit to lock the door of his room as long as he was in it. Nothing would induce him to touch food in the presence of any one. She had served him his dinner often, but had never seen him eat it. Sometimes he carried part of it away with him; and once he told her that he did this in order to have the food analyzed. He appeared to be under a constant impression that his food was poisoned; and the landlady was of opinion that her lodger was a decided monomaniac, but that he was perfectly harmless. She said he was a very eccentric gentleman, but an excellent tenant. He had been at the house on the morning of the 16th (she remembered the date because of a washing bill which he told her to pay for him on that day, and for which she has not yet been reimbursed). He remained at home during the whole of the day, but locked up his room as usual. About six o'clock in the evening he went out, locking the doors of all the sitting-rooms and bedrooms and taking the key with him. Before leaving the house, he told her that he was likely to be absent for some time, as he was pursued by enemies, and that there would probably be inquiries about him, but she was not to notice them, and on no account to mention his name to any one. "She has never seen him since. But her description of him precisely tallies with that which was given us at the post-office. She is a very old woman, rather blind, rather deaf, and very stupid. I don't think she can either read or write. Most of this information I obtained from the nigger gal who does all the work of the house. She eventually promised to have the locks opened in our presence to-morrow; and I have settled that, if agreeable to you, we will drive over there after breakfast." Thus Cartwright to Tom Ackland.

Poor Tom Ackland was profoundly affected by this fresh evidence of zeal and sympathy on the part of Mr. Cartwright. But Cartwright himself made light of his own efforts. "Pcoh, pooh, my dear sir!" he said, in reply to Tom's repeated expressions of gratitude; "if he was your cousin, was he not also my friend?"

When Tom Ackland entered the first room, from which the lock was removed, in the house to which Cartwright conducted him on the following day, one glance round it told him all, and, with a low moan of pain, he fell upon the bed and sobbed. There, on that bed, was the dressing-gown which poor John Ackland had worn the last evening on which he and Tom had sat together discussing John's plans for the future. There, in the wardrobe, were John Ackland's clothes; there, on the shelf, were John Ackland's books; there, on the table, were John Ackland's papers. And among those papers Tom afterwards found an unfinished letter addressed to himself. It was written in those sprawling, shaky characters which Tom had lately been learning, sadly, to decipher, and which were so all unlike the once firm and well-formed handwriting of his cousin. "God bless you, dear Tom!" (the letter said.) "My last thought is of you. I have borne it long. I cannot bear it longer. Nobody will miss me but you. And you, if you could see me as I am now, if you could know all that I have been suffering, even you, would surely wish for me that relief from misery which only death can give. They are after me day and night, Tom. They have left me no peace. Mary Mordent is at the bottom of it all. She hides herself. But I know it. I have no heart to post this letter, Tom. I have no strength to finish it. Good by, Tom. Don't fret. Dear, dear Tom, good by."

Tom Ackland returned to Boston with two convictions, one, that his unfortunate cousin had perished by suicide on the night of the 16th of October; the other, that Philip Cartwright was a most unselfish, warm-hearted fellow. The whole story of John Ackland's mysterious disappearance and lamentable death had excited too much curiosity, and been too hotly discussed, both at Richmond and Boston, to be soon forgotten in either of those localities. Serious quarrels had arisen (in Richmond at least), and old acquaintances had become estranged in consequence of the vehemence with which diverse theories were maintained by their respective partisans on the subject of John Ackland's fate. But time went on, and, as time went on, the story became an old story which no one cared to refer to, for fear of being voted a bore. There were not wanting at Richmond, however, some few persons by whose suspicious fancies Philip Cartwright, against all evidence to the contrary, remained uncharitably connected with the mysterious disappearance and subsequent suicide of the Boston merchant, in a manner much less flattering to that gentleman's character than Mr. Tom Ackland's grateful recollection of his friendly exertion at Charleston.

ROMAN IMPERIALISM.

BY PROFESSOR SEELEY.

III. THE FIRST AND LAST PERIODS OF ROMAN IMPERIALISM COMPARED.

I HAVE already said that there are two very distinct periods in the imperial history, and that these are divided by a long revolutionary period of transition. The end of the first period I placed at Marcus Aurelius; we may be more precise if we choose and place it at the breaking out of the Marcomannic war. The beginning of the other period may be placed at the accession of Diocletian, when the unity and tranquillity of the Empire were restored and the outlines of the new system of government were sketched. The transition period which intervened is, perhaps, the most melancholy in European history. It presents some of the worst tyrannies, some of the bloodiest revolutions, and some of the most enormous calamities in history. It presents Europe suffering from two plagues at once; the one the plague properly so called; the other, a mutinous, omnipotent, and half-barbaric soldiery.

To this middle period I shall not again call your attention. I propose now to place the first and third periods before you in contrast, in order to make more clear the radical and universal change which had taken place in the interval. In other words, I propose to institute a detailed comparison between the Empire under Hadrian or the Antonines, and the Empire under Constantine or Theodosius.

First, then, in the early period the Roman world was clearly and broadly separated from the barbaric, but in the latter period the separation has disappeared. In the earlier period certain nations belonged to the one and certain other nations to the other; the nations beyond the frontier were of a different stock from the nations within it. There was a distinction of blood, as well as of place and of institutions. In the latter period the physical boundary remains, and also the distinction of institutions; but the German blood is to be found in the Roman population as much as out of it. Germans are within the Empire, and not only so, but more diffused through the Empire than any other nationality. The Empire had before been a specific substance with a distinct form. It is still a distinct form, but the substance or stuff is no longer distinguishable from that of barbarism. The word Roman has ceased to be a national designation, and has become a legal or technical term. There are Roman citizens still in the eyes of the law, but they are as likely to have the features and habits of barbarians as of those who are not Roman citizens. There is still a Roman army; there are still legions officered still by centurions and tribunes; but the soldiers are now very commonly Goths, Vandals, and Sarmatians. There are still famous Roman generals, as in the days of Scipio and Marius; and famous victories are won, as in old days, over barbarous hordes; but Stilicho was a Vandal and Aëtius a Sarmatian, and their victories were won perhaps with Roman science, but certainly by barbarian hands. Even the forms are in some cases barbarous. Roman soldiers now rushed to the charge with the old German war-cry, called the barritus; when Julian became emperor, he was lifted on a shield like a Frankish chief.

Even in the earlier period the word Roman had been stretched considerably beyond its original meaning. There were already multitudes of Roman citizens who had never set foot in Rome. But it was still a name denoting certain nations and excluding others, and it was still justified by the fact that Rome remained the seat of government and the centre of the Empire. It was considered the strangest instance of eccentricity in Tiberius that he retired without necessity from Rome, and deliberately preferred to live elsewhere; a hundred years later the first Antonine lived exclusively, and the second usually, at Rome. But now, not only had the word Roman ceased to be exclusive of any nationality, but it was used to describe an empire of which Rome was not the centre. Diocletian took the government away from Rome, and Constantine provided a worthy seat for it on the Bosphorus. Nor by this change did Rome merely cease to be the sole seat of government; it lost its metropolitan character altogether. The emperors of the West abandoned it as well as those of the East. They preferred to it first Milan and then Ravenna. There are still other claims to the title of Roman, which the earlier Empire had possessed and which the later Empire wanted.

In the times of the Antonines the fact that the Empire had been founded by a conquering nation issuing from Rome, was still conspicuously seen in the distinction between those subjects of the Empire who had the Roman citizenship and those had not. The distinction was becoming faint, but so long as it was recognized by the law, so long as in the army the legions consisting of Roman citizens were distinct from the allied cohorts and squadrons consisting of those who wanted the citizenship, so long the Empire might still be said, in a sense to be Roman. But during the transition period this distinction also was effaced. When all the freemen of the Empire were placed on an equal footing, and the distinction between legions and allies disappeared in the army, the last visible record of Rome's conquest was obliterated.

We are accustomed to think of that Holy Roman Empire which disappeared from the world within living memory, as having been Roman only in name. The misnomer in that case was certainly more glaring, but it was hardly more real than in the case of the Empire of Constantine. It is true that the Empire of Constantine had arisen out of that of the Antonines without breach of continuity, and that the change had been gradual. Still, it had been a very complete change; one by one most of the Roman characteristics had disappeared. The appropriateness of the title could only be discovered from history. The Empire might be called Roman as Constantine might be called Caesar. But Constantine was as much connected by blood with the old Julian gens of Alba Longa as the vast political system half Oriental, half barbaric, in which so many nations were united, was connected with the drowsy old provincial town on the banks of the Tiber, which Ammianus has described for us.

If the Empire was no longer Roman either by nationality or in the sense of being connected as an appurtenance or dependency with the city of Rome, neither was it Roman in the sense of possessing the political institutions which had originally belonged to Rome. Here the contrast between the age of Constantine and that of the Antonines is particularly marked.

Under the Antonines the Empire retained much of the political character of the old Republic. It was in fact nearer to the Republic than it had been under the first Cæsars. Just at that exceptional period the State was guided by a president for life, nominated by his predecessor from among the most promising men of the age, possessing indeed power limited by nothing but his will, but choosing for the most part to regard his Senate with deference. This Senate was a chosen body of distinguished men selected by the emperor from the whole Empire, and required to take up their residence in Italy. They formed a dignified club at Rome, and gave a powerful expression to the feelings of the upper classes. The old Republic had often witnessed a similar government, when a Dictator had managed the State with the confidence of the aristocratic Senate. The monarchical element was there but in the form least repugnant to Republicanism, for the monarch was not hereditary nor separated by any clear demarcation from his subjects.

In the time of Constantine the government is essentially different, for the Senate as an organ of general aristocratic opinion has practically disappeared, and the life-president has become a sultan. Both these changes were natural, and omens of them had appeared even before the Antonines. The Senate of Nero was almost as insignificant as that of Constantine, and no Sultan could trample on human beings more contemptuously than Caligula. When the earlier emperors were restrained, it was by their own good sense or virtue; the system was entirely without checks. But what before only the bad emperors had been, every emperor was now, and the Senate was now habitually as insignificant as before a bad emperor had occasionally made it. An Augustus, a Trajan, an Antoninus, had found it politic, and perhaps judged it right, to treat the Senate with great respect, and to secure its co-operation in government.

But the emperors of the later series who answer best to these, and who were the wisest rulers, — Diocletian, Constantine, Valentinian, Theodosius, — steadily disregarded and trampled on the Senate; only a weak Gratian flatters it. Nor has it only lost favor with the emperors; it has suffered a great change of character. In the first place, there is now no longer a single Senate, but two, one at Rome and another at Constantinople; and next, there are now a multitude of senators scattered through the provinces who do not practically attend the meetings of the body at either of the two capitals. These changes were calculated to destroy the influence of the Senate as an organ of public opinion. Its judgment was no longer the solemn decision of a picked body of distinguished men assembled at the centre of government. It was assembled partly at Rome, which was not the seat of government, but a venerated ancient city possessing a circle of very distinguished and extremely indolent, noble families; and partly at Constantinople, which was sometimes nominally the seat of empire, but often only the seat of the Eastern Government. The decisions of these two bodies might be contradictory, nor did they necessarily represent the opinion of the senatorian order which was scattered through the Empire. Thus changed in character, and steadily discouraged by the emperor, the Senate loses almost all its influence. It is preserved as a convenient nucleus of wealth for the operations of the tax-gatherer. As a political organ it becomes only once again conspicuous, and that is when the Roman Senate makes its fruitless protest in favor of the ancient gods, and once more sits, as in the old Gallic invasion, to represent a lost cause and to be bearded by victorious invaders. When I say that the Emperor has become a Sultan, I mean, not only that he has assumed Oriental state, and a kind of sacred character as head of the Christian Church, but also that his immeasurable superiority to his subjects is admitted by them in their hearts, that the very conception of liberty has disappeared, and that that period has already begun which only ended with the French Revolution, the period during which government had a supernatural character, and exercised a dazzling or enchanting power over the minds of men. This spell, which the whole seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were uneasily laboring to shake off, was first thrown upon men's minds by Diocletian and Constantine. By these men the deep distinction that had so long existed between the Greeks and Romans on the one hand, and the Orientals on the other, was effaced. They destroyed what we may call the classical view of life, which asserts human free will, and regards government merely as a useful and respectable machinery for economizing power, and introducing order, beauty, and virtue into human affairs. In place of it they introduced the Asiatic view, which rests upon unalterable necessity, and elevates government into a divinity, teaching the subject to endure whatever it may inflict, not only without resistance, but without even an inward murmur; and, in short, to say to government what religion commands us to say to Providence: "Thy will be done."

With the Oriental theory of government was introduced Oriental cruelty and wastefulness of human life. In the earlier Empire there had been seen cruel emperors, but now cruelty has become part of the system. The history of this time might be written in letters of blood. Executions, tortures, massacres, make the staple of the narrative even in the reigns of good emperors. The great Theodosius massacres thousands of innocent people in a transient fit of passion. Constantine puts to death his wife and son. Valentinian, a brave and able emperor, sheds as much blood as Caracalla, apparently from no bad motive, but only from a kind of mania for severity which has infected government. When the emperor is of weak character, this uniform cruelty is intensified by his fears. Constantius does not appear to have been a monster like Caligula or Nero; he was simply a weak man; yet his tyranny, as described by Ammianus, appears far more tremendous than theirs. Theirs at the utmost is European, his is Asiatic.

It is the redeeming feature of this despotism that the rule of hereditary succession is not habitually practised in it. The ablest generals are still frequently invested with the purple, and there appeared during this period rulers who, in their merciless energy and the vastness of their views, resembled the Czar Peter. But the hereditary principle would occasionally creep in, and when it did so it always inflicted irreparable injury. The evils of hereditary succession can be guarded against when they can be calculated upon. The real burden of government can then be devolved upon ministers. But when the law of birth intrudes itself into an elective monarchy, when a weak man or a child is placed upon a throne which is commonly filled by merit, he is expected to govern personally; no adequate ministerial organization is at hand to screen his deficiencies; and his incompetence tells to its full extent upon his empire. The hereditary principle should be excluded altogether if it is not exclusively adopted. The right of nominating his successor, which was given in the Roman Empire to the emperor, gave him the power of ruining everything by a single act. One corrupt or partial appointment was fatal. The nepotism of Aurelius brought on the dismal revolutionary period; the nepotism of Theodosius brought in the barbarians.

The worst kind of government is that which is regarded by its subjects as divine, and at the same time is really weak. Such was the government of Constantius, of Honorius, of Valentinian III.; imbecile, and at the same time despotic, plaguing the world like an angry deity, and misgoverning it like an ignorant child. But these were exceptional cases. Government during this period was commonly at a higher level. It was Asiatic, but it was commonly able. Compared with Asiatic governments, it was good.

If the emperor was regarded as a divinity, at least he earned his deification for the most part by merit. He was not such a deity as those which Egypt worshipped, a sacred ape or cat, but rather a Hercules or Quirinus, who had risen by superhuman labors to divine honors. But compared with the government of the Antonines, it was barbaric. The Empire has fallen into a lower class of states. Reason and simplicity have disappeared from it.

Subjects have lost all rights, and government all responsibility. The reign of political superstition has set in. Abject fear paralyzes the people, and those that rule are intoxicated with insolence and cruelty. It is an Iron Age.

Government having assumed Godhead, assumes at the same time the appurtenances of it. It is surrounded with "thousands of angels." A principal feature of this age as contrasted with that of the Antonines is the enormous multiplication of offices and officials. In this respect the Empire had from the beginning advanced upon the Republic. I have already shown that the most conspicuous change introduced by the imperial system was the creation of a number of great offices principally of a military character. A kind of martial regularity and strictness of discipline had been given to the State. By the side of the old civic and free organization had been placed a military organization which was despotic. Under the Antonines the two had subsisted together in harmony, and despotism had worn an almost republican dress. But the civic organization had now disappeared entirely, and had been superseded by a bureaucracy framed after the military model. The holders of function, who were originally elected by the people to rule over the people, have now become soldiers, bearing the commission and under the orders of the commander-in-chief. All officials alike bear the name of militēs, and their service is called militia; even when their functions are purely civil they bear military titles, such as centurio, principarius. It seemed at the beginning of this period as if the very conception of any power not military had disappeared from the world.

Where is now the toga of Cicero? The Empire had become a camp. But this state of things was not to last. It was indeed destined that all power should assume the military type; civil life was to be reorganized on the model of military life. But the distinction between the civil and the military power was brought back by Constantine soon after it had seemed to be lost. Civil life is merged for a moment in military, and is then again differentiated; but when it reappears, the military stamp is on it. The military title of prætorian præfect is given to four men whose functions are purely civil, and who exercise supreme jurisdiction each over a quarter of the Empire. Meanwhile the military functions are committed to new officers called Duces, the originals of our modern dukes; a distinctive war-office is created; there is a commander-in-chief of the infantry and a commander of the cavalry. The old legatus, such as he is described in the life of Agricola, — a despotic sovereign within his own province, a general and a judge at the same time, — has disappeared. The civil and military professions have been created, and each is elaborately organized; but the civil profession is an offshoot from the military. The Army, as it were, destroyed the State, and then created a new State out of itself.

Upon the system of the Antonines this is, in one sense, a great improvement. Such a vast empire evidently could not be satisfactorily governed without a complicated organization, nor could it be safe from disturbances without a separation of the civil and military governments. The distribution of the Empire into præfectures, vicariates, dioceses; the creation of an army, of public servants embodied and drilled with all the formality of an army; — these were administrative reforms of the first magnitude, and they make the government of Constantine seem a far more finished machine than that of the Antonines. But the well-being of a State does not always increase with the administrative efficiency of its government. An all-powerful government was created; since liberty in that age was out of the question, such a government, had it been wise, might have been the best thing for the State. But it was all-powerful for evil as well as for good, and in the end, after saving the Empire, it ruined it.

I showed in my last lecture that the Empire was essentially weak for want of the first conditions of vigor in a society, — population and industry. It was too weak to bear the ponderous weight of such a government. For, besides the cruelty, this government had all the wastefulness of Oriental rule. The army of officials might be necessary to carry on government, but they ruined the people. Their enormous number of itself entailed ruinous expenses. Moreover, in making ostentation a principle, the government had, as it were, committed itself to extravagance. Extravagance involved oppressive taxation, and the agents of this taxation, the official class, inevitably formed the habit of rapacity. Thus for the tyranny of an emperor, to which in earlier times the people were sometimes exposed, was now substituted the uniform, universal, crushing tyranny of an official class.

Evils seldom come in this world without their compensations. I have been enumerating the symptoms of a long decay, the decay of a world. Steadily downward to a lower level of civilization and of happiness sank the Roman Empire. Its population barbarized by immigrations from beyond the frontier; its old civic freedom disappearing even from memory; its organ of opinion, the Senate, sinking into an insignificant committee of placemen; its emperor putting off the sense of responsibility, and along with it all restraints of human feeling: its administration assuming a military ruthlessness and peremptoriness; its government generally becoming its own triumphant and insolent enemy, — Rome, the representative of European civilization, the inventor of civilized jurisprudence and the inheritor of Greek philosophy, descends to the level of an Asiatic State. She passes through the fire to that military Moloch whose minister she had made herself.

With genius dead, and the intellect fallen into such rudeness that she can scarcely tell us articulately the story of her woes, we see her more than once prostrate before one of those monstrous human idols that are worshipped in Asia, a silly creature educated in insolence and wearing a diadem, cruel and irresistible, deriving all his strength from human weakness, yet exacting copious libations of human blood and the utmost farthing of treasure. But to all these losses there were compensations, and these I proceed to consider. The Asiatic despotism had some points of advantage over the classic. Liberty, which in its old forms had disappeared, began to spring up in new ones. In the first place, at the moment when freemen sank to be slaves, slaves began to turn into freemen. We do not know distinctly the steps of the transformation, but, like all the other changes to which I have called attention, it took place between the age of the Antonines and that of Constantine. A class of agricultural serfs came into existence, attached to the soil and irremovable from the spot on which they lived. They are sometimes called slaves, but they appear to have had property, and they had rights against their masters and duties to the State. In the decay of population human beings had risen in value. The government wanted recruits for its legions, and began to lay claim to the services of those who before had been the chattels of private citizens. In the decay of industry it was necessary to provide for the cultivation of the soil. One of the peculiarities of this government, in which human free-will was almost suppressed, was its principle of assigning vocations by arbitrary compulsion to whole classes of men. Many governments have assumed the right of pressing people against their will into some vocations, particularly into military service. But in the age of Constantine a principle of forced enlistment is applied to almost all functions.

Men are forced into municipal offices against their will, in some cases they are pressed into trade. It was by another application of the same principle that one class of the population is bound to agricultural labor. The government, as it were, enlists an army of cultivators, whom it controls with as much rigor as its army, properly so called. These cultivators are in the strictest sense servants of the soil. They have a definite function in the community, and for the fulfilment of it they are responsible to the State. The State was no merciful master, but so far as it assumed authority over the serf it rescued him from the authority of his master. As the harshest system is better than individual caprice, we may believe that the lot of the coloni was better than that of the agricultural slaves of the earlier time. If so, an improvement is caused by the very principle of decay and dissolution, and the very rottenness of the carcase breeds new life.

At the same time there was spread through society a new principle, which, if it cannot properly be called Liberty, was a most powerful substitute for it. I have said that government had been erected into a divinity, and that the very tradition of liberty was lost. This is true, and yet a certain kind of resistance to government was carried on upon a vast scale, with unalterable resolution and with success. The edict of Diocletian commanding the Christians to sacrifice was resisted throughout the Empire; the resistance was maintained for seven years, until Diocletian's successor succumbed to it. Athanasius resisted Constantine and Constantius successfully. Ambrose not merely resisted, but rebuked and humbled Theodosius. This new spirit had indeed appeared in the Empire before the age of the Antonines. Aurelius had remarked what he called the "obstinacy" of a class of his subjects, but in his time the phenomenon, though striking, was not yet formidable. It became formidable early in the revolutionary period; and at the accession of Diocletian this obstinacy had spread so widely, organized itself so well, and rehearsed its part so carefully, that it proved irresistible.

This obstinacy in the Empire achieved deeds as memorable as had been achieved by liberty in the Republic. Yet it was not liberty. Liberty is a proud spirit; it regards government as a mere instrument of human happiness, and resists it when it becomes evidently prejudicial to happiness. Liberty flashes out against the government that murders innocent men and dishonors women. Liberty is force of character roused by the sense of wrong. It is consistent, indeed, with a sense of duty and a willingness to bear just restraint; uncombined with these it achieves nothing lasting; but it is more often allied with turbulence and impatience of discipline. Such had been liberty in the old Republic, the rebellion of strong spirits against laws strained too far, self-assertion, sturdiness, combativeness. Such was not the Christian obstinacy. In this when it was genuine there was no rebellion, there was no assertion of right. Those who practised it were not less obedient, but more obedient, than others. They had no turn for liberty; they had no quarrel with the despotism of the Cæsars; this they met, not in the spirit of Brutus or Virginius, but with religious resignation. The truth was, they were under two despotisms while others were under only one. They were not satisfied with submitting to the Cæsar who assuredly did not "bear the sword in vain"; they endeavored to obey the law of Christ also. They bore the double burden with all patience. Those were not the times for free spirits to flourish in. In the soldier-ridden Empire there was no atmosphere of hope in which a spark of spirit could live or a breath of free heroism be drawn. To this class of simple feelings the Christian obstinacy does not belong. It arose from no impatience of restraint, but from a conflict of laws. The law of Christ carried it over the law of Cæsar. The spiritual sovereign prevailed over the temporal. They resisted one master in the interest of another. Their resistance was without the feeling of independence, their rebellion without the wish for freedom; no movement of defiance in their mind, obedience was driven out by obedience and loyalty by loyalty. Therefore, saving the law of Christ, the Christians were the most loyal of the emperor's subjects, and Christianity confirmed as much as controlled despotism. It produced a complete change in the attitude of the people to the emperor. It made their loyalty more intense, but confined it within definite limits. It strengthened in them the feeling of submissive reverence for government as such; it encouraged the disposition of the time to political passiveness. It was intensely conservative, and gave to power with one hand as much as it took away with the other. Constantine, if he was influenced by policy, was influenced by a wise policy when he extended his patronage to the Church. By doing so he may be said to have purchased an indefeasible title by a charter. He gave certain liberties, and he received in return passive obedience. He gained a sanction for the Oriental theory of government; in return he accepted the law of the Church. He became irresponsible with respect to his subjects on condition of becoming responsible to Christ.

The difference, then, between the later series of emperors and the earlier is this. The earlier emperors were nominally Republican magistrates, but practically their power was unlimited. The later emperors were avowedly Oriental despots, but their power had one important and definite limitation. On the other hand, the later emperors had not so much active resistance to fear as the earlier. The spirit of liberty which prompts to active resistance was in the earlier period not quite dead; the spirit of religion and morality which was vigorous in the later period prompted only to passive resistance. The practical result was that the earlier emperors could not venture upon so much cruelty as the later, and the later emperors could not indulge so much caprice as the earlier. In the first century the Romans submitted for years to all the frenzied whims of a lunatic; at last they killed him for his cruelty. The later Romans submitted frequently to much more cruel governments, but they firmly resisted the virtuous Julian when he tried to change their institutions.*

The position assumed by the Church at this time towards government has determined its attitude throughout modern history. It has often controlled and defied kings, as Ambrose did; but it has always remained cold towards the spirit of liberty. Not that there is anything in Christianity incompatible with liberty, not that zealous champions of liberty may not be, or have not often been, zealous Christians. But Christianity sprang up and shaped its institutions, at a time when liberty was impossible, and when the wisest course for men in existing circumstances was to abandon the dream of it. Therefore, the earliest documents of Christianity, the biographies of its Founder, and the early history of the Church, bear the stamp of political quietism. In all disputes between authority and liberty the traditions of Christianity are on the side of authority. Passive obedience was plausibly preached by the Anglican clergy out of the New Testament; when the opposite party sought Scriptural sanction for the principles of freedom, they were swayed irresistibly back upon the Old Testament, where rebellions and tyrannicides may be found similar to those which fill classical history. The whole modern struggle for liberty has been conducted without help from the authoritative documents of Christianity. Liberty has had to make its appeal to those classical examples and that literature which were superseded by Christianity. In the French Revolution men turned from the New Testament to Plutarch. The former they connected with tyranny; the latter was their text-book of liberty. Plutarch furnished them with the teaching they required for their special purpose, but the New Testament met all their new-born political ardor with a silence broken only here and there by exhortations to submission.

But this, which has been the weakness of Christianity in recent times, was its strength in the first ages of its existence. The spirit of Liberty and the spirit of Nationality were once for all dead; to sit weeping by their grave might for a time be a pious duty, but it could not continue always expedient or profitable. Yet this is the attitude of the age of Trajan. Tacitus makes it his object to nurse the ancient spirit as much as possible. He canonizes the martyrs of the Senate, — Pætus, Rusticus, Helvidius. He studies to feel like a senator, though conscious that the dignity of that name is only traditional. He studies to feel like a Roman, though alien blood is everywhere corrupting the purity of race; but he cannot prevent the corruption of Roman blood, nor check the inundating flood of foreign manners. Plutarch buries himself in the past, and by the power of imagination repeoples with its ancient heroes the depopulated and demoralized Greece into which he was born. In the age of the Antonines, to read of Epaminondas, Dion, Timoleon, might be entertaining and elevating, but it could not be practically useful, for it was neither possible nor desirable to imitate such examples. A literary man, like Plutarch, might not keenly feel the hopeless contrast between the reality and his ideal; but Tacitus, in the Roman senate, feels it, and hence the cynical despair that pervades his works. It was, therefore, the strength of Christianity that it renounced this unprofitable ideal. When it came forward, in the age of Constantine, to lead the thought of the Empire, it presented a programme in which Liberty and Nationality were omitted. A noble life had before been necessarily a free and public life, but the New Testament shows how virtue may live under the yoke of an absolute government, and in a complete retirement from politics. Patriotism had been the great nurse of morality; the πολις had been the centre by which human beings had been held together. Christianity arose from the destruction of a nationality, and showed its power principally in effacing national distinctions, and in uniting first Jew and Gentile, and afterwards Roman and Barbarian. Who can wonder at its success? To a universal empire it offered a universal morality; by limiting despotism it relieved the people, and by sanctioning despotism it compensated the despot.

Thus the age was made somewhat happier by receding further from liberty. Under the Antonines it was fully conscious of its loss, and looked back with regret; but now it had forgotten its loss, had found for itself new objects, and was again looking forward. Tyranny was more cruel, and misery was more wide-spread, than in the days of the Antonines; but it was less felt, because the age had occupations which absorbed it, and was possessed with thoughts which, in a measure, numbed the sense of pain. The political languor of the age of the Antonines was not compensated by any intellectual or speculative activity. The old ideas were still before men's minds, but constantly becoming more obsolete; the old creeds were still officially accepted, but with less and less belief; the old sacrifices were still performed, but with less and less devotion. Seldom, perhaps, has there been a time when ideas had so little power over a highly civilized community. Roman literature was asleep; a movement was taking place in Greek literature, but it was of a popular and superficial kind. The itinerant Sophists, who travelled over the Greek world at this time delivering lectures or discourses, created perhaps something nearer to the popular literature of our own day than was known at any other period of antiquity. But they aim only at amusement, or very moderate edification; and the only one of them who has attained permanent fame, Lucian, exhibits most vividly the spiritual emptiness of the time. His dialogues are a universal satire, — a satire upon what men do, but still more upon what they think, upon what they profess to believe and to venerate. They give a low impression of the philosophy of the age; religious belief, except in the lowest forms of superstition, they represent as absolutely dead. Lucian writes for and of the people; a very different writer, a writer much too noble to be a fair representative of his age, the Emperor Aurelius, still shows us what was going on at the same time in the minds of the most cultivated. The ancient gods have disappeared from his creed, and no new objects of worship have taken their place. Piety remains, and serves to him as a kind of proof of the existence of its objects, but sometimes he feels the proof insufficient. Why should I care to live, he says, in a world void of gods and void of a Providence?

Pass over the revolutionary period, and what a contrast? We find ourselves in an age when ideas, good and bad, have an overmastering influence, and when, in particular, the sense of religion is more universal and more profound than it had ever been in the world before. Thoughts, reasonings, controversies, which in the age of the Antonines had been but languid in the schools, had now made their way into the world, and lived with an intense life. The populace, which in the age of the Antonines lies, as it were, outside the province of history, having neither opinions nor purposes, which counts in politics only as something to be fed and to be amused, as a reason for bringing corn-fleets from Egypt and Africa, and for building amphitheatres, — this populace, now in still greater poverty, and falling into a misery from which no government could any longer relieve it, is filled with vehement opinions, ardent beliefs, disinterested enthusiasm. Under the iron military rule human will and character begins to live again. Violent passions surge again, party divisions reappear, acts of free choice are done, men fight once more for a cause, once more choose leaders and follow them faithfully, and reward them with immortal fame. The trance of human nature is over, men are again busy and at work, in spite of tyranny and misery. The sense of a common interest thrills again through a vast mass, as it had thrilled through the citizens of Rome in old Republican days; but the mass is now composed, not of the citizens of a single city, but of the population of a world-wide empire.

* At the beginning of the third century the aristocracy of Rome looked on with an enormous patience while a shameless Syrian priest insulted its gods and its religion.

Representatives of many nations appear in the great parliament at Nicæa; the leaders in the party conflict which raged there had their enthusiastic followers in every country in which Roman camps had ever been pitched. For the first time it might be said that the Empire was alive. Up to this time the nations of which it was composed had been held together but by military force. Now for the first time they thought and felt in unison; now they had an organization not imposed from without, but developing from within; now they had a common imperial culture and system of philosophy.

Yet all this vivid activity, which contrasts so strongly with the languor of the age of the Antonines, was compatible with a despotism infinitely more absolute than that of the Antonines. Under the paternal rule of Aurelius the people had remained inert and lifeless; under the afflicting tyranny of Valentinian they lived, willed, and acted with spirit and energy. The explanation of this is that, as I have said, the later despotism was one which secured itself by accepting limitations. Its subjects surrendered finally one half of their liberties on condition of enjoying securely the other half. For a nominal freedom, which was in fact an unlimited slavery, they accepted an undisguised but limited slavery. Human free-will made terms with the victorious power of government, and accepted a fraction, but a secure fraction, of its original possessions. The corporate life of man, which hitherto had been one and undivided, began now to be regarded as twofold. A distinction was introduced like that which we now recognize between political life and social life. In political life despotism reigned with more undisputed title than ever, and was more remorselessly cruel. But from social life despotism was almost expelled; within this not narrow domain a government was set up which, whatever its faults, had influential parliaments and popular magistrates. The distinction was drawn roughly enough, and between the two authorities there was frequent border war; but the distinction was maintained, and was no small compensation to those unfortunate generations, the hard-pressed garrison of the beleaguered citadel of civilization.

It was in this way that a considerable share of liberty was reconquered in the Roman Empire, that the distinction between political and social life was first established, and that human free-will, expelled from the channels in which it had been accustomed to flow, found for itself a new channel. But what was the force by which this change was effected? It was a force which had seemed almost dead, — the force of Theology. During the revolutionary period the sceptical philosophies lost their influence, and so did that system of moral philosophy which threw man back upon himself. An age of faith set in, an age in which a large class had found a view of the universe which was satisfying and inspiring to them; and in which even those who had not, acknowledged the necessity of finding such a view, and endeavored in various ways to do so. A Theology was the necessity of this age: those who had not got one wished for one; those who rejected the most powerful and satisfying theology had recourse to less satisfying systems, and to spasmodic revivals of systems that were extinct. Outside the Christian Church, as well as within it, Theology was everywhere. In the time of the Antonines the most conspicuous fact, as I have said, is the decline of old beliefs. Doubtless the routine of rustic superstition went on as in earlier times; nor did philosophers speak generally with Lucian's contempt of the ancient gods. Plutarch has an explanation of them which warrants a sort of belief, but this explanation is evidently a concession to conservative feeling. The gods are venerated in the same way as the Senate, that is, for the sake of the past and on the condition of doing nothing. The exceptions to this, such as Apollonius, who had a more positive religious feeling, were in the earlier age only numerous enough to show the possibility of a Pagan revival.

During the revolutionary period this revival took place. The philosophers passed to theology over the bridge of Platonism. The close juxtaposition into which the different systems of religion prevailing in the different parts of the Empire had been brought, revealed certain features common to all. The revivalists fastened upon these common features, and Paganism in its last age returned to what was perhaps its earliest form and became Sun-worship.

This movement was spasmodic. The zeal of Julian, Porphyry, and others of that school, was not inspired by a belief, but by the wish for the belief. The influence moves in the wrong direction; it passes not from the belief to the men, but from the men to the belief. Their religion does not reanimate them, but they reanimate their religion. As a proof, however, of the need felt in that age for a religion, it is all the more striking. It was not by these Neo-Platonists and Neo-Pagans that that revival of human freedom and human activity of which I have spoken was produced, but the revival of Paganism shows more clearly than the introduction of Christianity the steady set of men's minds and feelings in that age towards religion. The picture I have given of the late Empire may suggest to us two among the many causes of this phenomenon.

First, then, the age was religious, because it was an age of servitude. Religious feeling is generally strong in proportion to the sense of weakness and helplessness. It is when man's own resources fail that he looks most anxiously to find a friend in the universe. Religion is man's consolation in the presence of a necessity which he cannot resist, his refuge when he is deserted by his own power, or energy, or ingenuity. Negroes are religious, the primitive races in the presence of natural phenomena which they could not calculate or resist were intensely religious; women, in their dependence are more religious than men; Orientals under despotic governments are more religious than the nations of the West. On the other hand, a time of great advance in power, whether scientific power over Nature, or the power to avert evils, given by wealth and prosperity, is commonly a time of decline in religious feeling, until man's wants, ever growing with his acquisitions, strike again against the impassable boundary. The age when Europeans became as subject and as helpless as Orientals naturally made them also as religious as Orientals.

Secondly, the Empire was made religious by vast calamities and miseries. It was during the revolutionary period that it took the religious stamp, and that, as I have pointed out, was the age of the Plague and also of unparalleled political disasters. In the presence of such evils, there was no choice but between religion and stoical apathy. The effect of the Plague is visible in the traces at this time of a revival of the worship of Æsculapius. Men cried to any deity that might be able to aid, and renounced the scepticism that left them helpless in their utmost need. And as the weather did not clear, as plague followed plague through nearly a century, and when this evil was removed the ficus and the barbarian afflicted society almost as heavily, men must have come to consider existence itself an evil, had not religion held before their eyes a future state. Those whose whole lives were spent in watching decay and dissolution, who were borne upon a steadfast backward current, who were familiar with the dwindling of population, the disappearance of wealth, the fall of noble institutions, the degradation of manners and culture, could not have been reconciled to life by any plain view of things, by any sober calculations. They could only repair such losses and relieve such beggary out of the inexhaustible treasury of hope and faith. It was well that, in their painful search after objects of worship and after supernatural protection, men were not finally driven back upon the outworn imaginations of mythology. Those imaginations had been lovely in their spring-time, in the days of Homer or Æschylus, but it was late autumn with them now; they were wholesome no longer.

There is nothing more pestilential in the social atmosphere than the exhalations of stale poetry. It was also well that they found in the end something better than that Sun-worship which was gradually evolved out of the comparison of religions. This worship, indeed, was far from being utterly hollow or spasmodic, but men could no longer be content with the most dazzling material glory. "Two things fill me with wonder," said Kant, "the starry heaven without, and the moral principle within." It was these two awful things that contended for empire over the hearts of men in the fourth century. The invisible Deity vanquished the visible one. There was superstition on both sides, and a Claudian might fancy that to worship beauty in Proserpina was as ennobling as to worship corruption in the ashes of Peter and Paul. But it was not corruption that was worshipped at the shrines of the martyrs, but a higher thing than beauty, — moral goodness.

It was because in that revolutionary period, that great chasm between the Old World and the New, the depth and breadth of which I hope I have now made clear to you, the Roman Empire, searching eagerly to find a religion, discovered in its bosom a worship which had the two things which the age demanded, — a supernatural character, and an ideal of moral goodness; and it was in a secondary degree because that ideal was of a type suiting the age, presenting virtue in the social sphere which was still open to it, and not in the political from which it was now excluded; it was for these reasons that when in the later period all the liberty which had still lingered in the age of the Antonines disappeared, when Asiatic Sultanism was set up, and all public functions fell into the hands of military officials, when tyranny was most oppressive and searching, when human life was cramped and stunted to the utmost, the spirit of freedom was able to assert itself in a form hitherto undreamed of, and when expelled from the State to reappear in the Church.

THE SCIENCE OF NAUSCOPIA.

IN March, 1785, there appeared in Paris, a man, by name Bottineau, with a grand discovery. He announced that he had found out means of perceiving the approach or the passage of ships at distances extending as far as even two hundred and fifty leagues. According to his own account, he had accidentally perceived, some twenty years before, being then employed in some civil capacity at the Isle of France, that certain phenomena in the heavens indicated the approach of ships; after an immense number of observations, failures, and uncertainties, he had arrived at a method of reading these indications (of what kind he declined to state), which, though from the nature of the case it was not quite certain, was yet so nearly correct as that, out of one hundred and fifty-five predictions of the arrival of ships, more than half, as he asserted, were absolutely correct, while a large part of the remainder were subsequently proved to be correct so far as the passage of the ships on the days, and at the distances stated, was concerned.

In one of these observations, says the writer of the Memoires Secrets, M. Bottineau announced several vessels in succession which, he felt sure, were an English fleet. They equipped a frigate and sent her out to observe. Two days after leaving Port Louis, the frigate actually fell in with the English fleet. "But," the writer continues, "the suspicious thing is, that M. Bottineau, like all charlatans, requires a large sum of money for his secret."

Three months later on, in the same year, we hear more of him. The government, struck by the pretensions of the man, investigated their correspondence with the Isle of France, and discovered that so far back as 1782, the governor of the island had written on the subject, speaking of him as a man who certainly possessed some part of the power which he professed.

M. Bottineau, meantime, was not idle. He published a long letter on his discovery, inviting savans to furnish him with a name.

"In order," he says, "to enable them to do this for me, I must commence by giving some idea of the new science. It consists in perceiving at sea the approach of land, five or six days before it is visible even to the most powerful telescope, — that is, at a distance of two hundred and fifty leagues. Further, the science may be used for the observation of ships from the land, at the same distance, and it furnishes principles for estimating the distance, and for announcing, therefore, the time of arrival of the ship, or the touching at the harbor. It can also be employed for distinguishing if there are several vessels or only one; if they number, for instance, five or six, or if they form a fleet. It shows the distance between ships invisible to the eye; their rate of speed, their stations, and many other circumstances interesting for war or commerce.

"Marvellous as this science may appear, it requires neither a special organization nor superior talents. All that is wanted is a knowledge of a certain physical phenomenon which circumstances have led me to discover.

"Being in the Isle of France, twenty years ago, and having the sea always before my eyes, I perceived that the arrival of ships was always preceded by a certain phenomenon of nature, and the recurrence of this singularity made me suspect that there might exist a correspondence between the phenomenon in question and the passage of ships. Following up this idea, I succeeded in discovering:—

"1. That this phenomenon was incontestably the result of the passage of a ship.

"2. That it began to manifest itself five or six days before the arrival of the ship.

"3. That certain variations were caused by the rate at which the ship moved.

"4. That other variations were caused by the number of the ships.

"5. That the same principles which showed to the observer on land the approach of ships were applicable to observers at sea.

"6. That the phenomenon, with certain changes, served to point out to one ship the approach of another.

"7. That the different variations were perceived by day or by night, in fair weather and foul.

"After passing twenty years in studying these modifications, I was enabled to classify and arrange them in an infallible manner, and to compose on this subject a set of principles and instructions which, increasing the sphere of human knowledge, must produce a science altogether new, and never before suspected by physicists, and calculated to bring safety to thousands of men."

He got the name he asked for, — a very good name, — nauscopie (from ναῦς and σκοπέω), and thus prepared — what did he do next? From that moment, M. Bottineau and his invention disappear from history; so far, at least, as I have been able to discover. He got no money from the government, et pour cause, — the luckless government being then on its last legs. Came the great wave of Revolution, and poor Bottineau's twenty years of patient labor were wasted, — the edifice of so much ingenuity was swept away, and the science of nauscopie forever lost to the human race. Nor will it ever be discovered whether the man was a mistaken enthusiast or an impudent impostor, or whether he had really been able to perceive, in that bright Mauritian sky, evidences, by reflection or otherwise, of approaching ships. There is, at least, no doubt that his pretensions were tested by the governor, and that, out of a great many announcements, a large proportion were correct. On the other hand, there was then a large and regular trade between the Isle of France, India, and Europe, and anybody might safely venture to predict the arrival of ships for any day, and generally be right.

He left, however, one disciple, follower, or imitator. Within the last thirty years there used to hang about the harbor-master's office, in Port Louis, an old Frenchman named Feillaiffé, who made it his business to go down every morning to the harbor, and report the approach of ships before they came within telescopic range. It is said that he was nearly always right, and that in cases where he was apparently wrong, it was afterwards found, as Bottineau boasted, that ships had actually passed.

Feillaiffé first came into notice, in 1810, by going to the governor, then M. Decaen, and informing him that a number of ships, presumably an English fleet, were assembling in the direction of Rodrigues, an island three hundred miles from Mauritius. It is even stated that he gave the number. The governor threatened to send him to prison as an alarmist, unless he held his tongue. But he was perfectly right, the fleet was at the moment actually assembling there, and a few days afterwards arrived off Mauritius.

It does not appear that Feillaiffé ever made much fuss about his powers, or that he tried to make money. Nor did he, on the other hand, ever set forth publicly the nature of the phenomena on which he worked. It is recorded that he had one pupil, a lady, who failed to attain any eminence in the science; perhaps for want of skill in tuition on the part of M. Feillaiffé, perhaps from her own stupidity, or perhaps, as the scoffer pretends, because there was no science at all to teach.

There is absolutely no doubt whatever about the Rodrigues fleet, though it may be explained by supposing that the colonists were in daily expectation of being attacked, and that Rodrigues was the only place where the enemy could possibly rendezvous, there being no harbor in Bourbon, which was, besides, still in French hands.

Another thing is curious, that is, it is difficult to see how Feillaiffé could have learned anything from Bottineau. Twenty-five years elapsed between Bottineau's departure and Feillaiffé's announcement of the Rodrigues fleet. The latter, too, lived to within twenty years of the present time, and must, therefore, have been a tolerably young man in 1810, certainly not old enough to have been a disciple of Bottineau. On the supposition of imposture, therefore, he must have got hold of Bottineau's pamphlet. But, on the other hand, a charlatan generally tries to make money for himself, which Feillaiffé never did.

In either case, the science of nauscopie, the beholding of invisible ships far below the horizon, seems hopelessly lost. Like Mr. Weller's prophet, — the red-faced Nixon, — M. Feillaiffé has died and left the business to nobody.

It is a curious paragraph in the history of the eighteenth century. The achievements of science of the following age were heralded by the pretensions of charlatanism in every form. Cagliostro was not alone. It is as if the anticipation of great things to come threw men's heads off their balance. Change was in the air. Poor M. Bottineau, whose solitary trumpet is so ominously drowned by the roll of the drums and the thunder of the cannon, may have been an enthusiast whose brain was turned by an idea likely enough to occur to any man who had witnessed some of the freaks of nature in a "reflective" mood, or he may have been an impostor. Very little heed would be paid to his entreaties for an audience, when Mirabeau was declaiming in the National Assembly, and Paris ringing with the daily slanders of the Queen.

As for M. Feillaiffé, all that can be added about him is, that Mauritians believe in him even more firmly than they do in Paul and Virginia, though the cenotaphs of this hapless pair still stand a testimony of their fates, and a lasting monument in brick of the fame of St. Pierre. The prophet who told of the English fleet, who can still be remembered by men not yet old, is dear to Creole hearts. And in witness that the narrative lieth not, still stands the signal mountain where the gifted man was wont to take his place, piercing, with more than eagle eye, far beyond the range of the telescope which the English soldier wields now. For him the solid earth was transparent, and the blue sky pictured with the ships that sailed beneath.

PLAYGOING ABROAD.

THEATRES have never enjoyed in England the same unanimous popularity which they have abroad. Middle-aged people can remember the time when by many well-thinking provincials theatres were looked upon as haunts of dissipation, and classed in the same category as gambling-houses and casinos. Of late years things have changed, and although there are still here and there a few rigorists who will uneasily shift the subject when they hear playgoing talked of, yet it has come to be pretty generally admitted that a lad who betrays early predilection for the drama is not of a necessity on the railroad to ruin. Nevertheless, to use a French expression, "le théâtre n'est pas entré dans nos mœurs": the theatre has struck no deep roots among us. If the average audience of a London play-house were polled, it would be found to consist almost entirely of people in easy circumstances, and of clerks, shopboys, and the better kind of mechanics. But the busy million of small trades-folk is very scantily represented, and the laborer—he who has been carrying the hod or plying the trowel all day—is almost altogether absent. The names of the best English actors are household words only among the few, and the names of the best playwrights are but little known beyond the circle of clubs and drawing-rooms. If a daily paper were started in London exclusively devoted to theatrical topics, it is doubtful whether it could muster a couple thousand readers.

Abroad it is all the contrary. There, nobody within the memory of living man has ever been heard to say a word against playgoing. Both in France, Germany, and Italy the theatre has been from time out of mind a recognized and thoroughly popular institution, forming as it were part and parcel of social life, and regarded as an almost indispensable adjunct to the enjoyment of existence. In Paris the theatre is one of the staple subjects of conversation, not only among the well-to-do, but amongst the poor and ignorant. In the workshop, artisans will discuss the rival merits of actors and dramatists with a shrewdness of judgment astonishing to an Englishman. It will not do to give a Parisian servant a ticket for the play, and expect him to go, as an English servant would, simply because the play is a treat and a novelty. Before thanking you the Parisian servant will consult the paper, to see what pieces are on the bill, and he will know at once by the sight of the author's name whether he is likely to amuse himself or not. Rachel once gave her concierge some tickets to see "Phèdre": "Mademoiselle," said the doorkeeper with a tone of slight contempt, "j'attendrai que vous en ayez pour Cinna. Racine n'est pas de mon goût; c'est trop ampoulé." The criticism had a vein of truth in it, and one would certainly never have heard such an answer from a London footman.

Every class in Paris has its theatre. The Français is for educated connoisseurs. The Gymnase and the new Vaudeville are essentially Imperial and aristocratic. The Variétés and the Palais Royal are the theatres of the Parisian pure, of the man who haunts the boulevards, chattering about everything and laughing at everybody. The Bouffes, the Fantaisies Parisiennes, and the Folies Dramatiques are for rich strangers, Russians, Americans, members of the Jockey Club, and that lively class known as petits crevés and petites crevettes. The Port St. Martin, Gaîté, Ambigu Comique, and Châtelet are the domain of the people. It is a proof of the deep taste of the French for all that concerns the drama that there are two or three daily papers in Paris which live and thrive altogether upon theatrical intelligence, and that amongst the ordinary evening papers those that pay best are the journals which, like the Figaro and Gaulois, devote a good third of their space to theatrical news. The smaller papers also, which cost a sou and have a daily circulation of two or three hundred thousand, take good care to give long and careful reports of all the new pieces that are produced, and when the piece is unusually good print the report on their front page in large type extending over four or five columns. But yet greater proof of the French taste for playgoing is shown in the excellence of the provincial theatres. In small towns where one would scarcely have expected that a strolling circus could pay its expenses, one is surprised to find well-appointed theatres giving their two performances a week and filled from stalls to gallery with attentive but by no means indulgent audiences. It would be a mistake to suppose that bad acting will pass more easily on a provincial than a Parisian stage. Very often it is quite the reverse, and if a stranger would convince himself of this, he has only to attend at the first performance of a French country town theatre on the night of the débuts at the reopening of the autumn season.

Provincial managers almost always engage an actor subject to the condition that he shall be accepted by the public at his début. The début is thus a regular examination, and usually a very stiff one. On the first three nights of the theatrical season, which generally opens in October, the country town manager presents his new troupe to the audience, and at the end of the performance comes before the curtain to call out the names of the different actors and actresses one by one. After each name there is a pause, and the audience applaud or hiss as they think fit. If they applaud it is all right, and the engagement is ratified, but if they hiss there is an end of it, and the actor is sent about his business. Sometimes they hiss so furiously that, on thinking of the unhappy comedian who is waiting his verdict trembling and wretched behind the curtain, one marvels that they can be so heartless. But then it must be remembered that the theatre is the one sole amusement of a country town, and that if the troupe be a bad one the whole year's enjoyment of the unlucky provincials is marred. Not many years ago a young man was tried as first tenor at the Bordeaux Theatre, but he failed to satisfy the audience, and at the fall of the curtain there was a terrific uproar. In the midst of it the unfortunate man came forward, very pale, and after confronting the storm of hisses said, imploringly, "Ladies and gentlemen, I see the post of first tenor is above my strength, but will you give me a few weeks' trial as second tenor? . . . I promise I will do my best." . . . Here he broke down from emotion, and the French always generous gave him three rounds of applause to signify their assent. The young man has since become one of the principal singers of the Grand Opera.

The French public are so difficult to please in the matter of plays and actors that to be a French manager almost invariably leads to becoming a bankrupt. Few managers prosper so as to be able to retire comfortably; for when in France a piece does not succeed thoroughly it falls flat, and all the money lavished upon it is as good as thrown out of the window. There is no keeping a bad piece long on a play-bill, as may often be done in London, thanks to the forbearance of the English papers, which, when once they have condemned a play, trouble themselves no further about it. French journalists are not content to abuse a play once and have done with it; they go on abusing it every day until the whole empire knows that the piece is worthless, and the manager is obliged to withdraw it. There is another great stumbling-block to French managerial enterprise in the droit des pauvres, which is a rate of ten per cent on the gross receipts. It was Napoleon I. who first caused this tax to be levied for the benefit of the hospitals, and it has continued to be exacted ever since, notwithstanding that it has done more to fill the Tribunal de Commerce with bankrupts than even bad plays and hostile critics. It should be added, however, that in the case of certain theatres the expenses of the droit des pauvres are more than compensated by the subsidies which the State awards. Thus the Grand Opera receives about £30,000 per annum; the Français, £10,000; the Opéra Comique, £8,000; and the Odéon, £6,000.

Crossing the frontier, we find the theatre every whit as popular in Germany as in France, and we notice this more in the chief towns of small principalities than in such large cities as Berlin and Vienna. Whatever advantages some of the little States may derive in the distant future from being annexed by Herr Von Bismarck, they will miss, and probably regret, the liberal patronage which was extended to their theatres by the different dukes, grand dukes, and kings. Some of the theatres in the small German capitals are gems, and we may take as instances those of Hanover, Gotha, and Brunswick. The last named, which can be cited as a model of many others, is supported chiefly by the reigning duke, who is said to spend 150,000 thalers (£22,500) a year on it. It is a beautiful little house, smart with gilding, paint, and red velvet. There are four performances a week, two nights being devoted to opera and two to comedy. The scenery, dresses, and general appointments are very rich, the acting and singing are excellent, and the orchestra is by far superior to anything we have in London, except at the two opera houses. The admission is half a crown to the stalls, the same to the dress circle, and a shilling to the pit; but these prices are only paid by the casual playgoers, the habitual frequenters usually becoming subscribers, and paying 48 thalers a year, that is, £7 4s., for the full possession of a stall or a dress circle fauteuil. For officers the subscription is only half; so that the good Brunswickers may really be said to get their theatre for next to nothing. Both at Brunswick and at Hanover we have seen ladies take their work with them to the theatre, and stitch quietly at tapestry during the course of the performance. When anything, song or tirade, pleased them particularly well, they looked up from their work with their blue eyes fixed gravely on the stage, and afterwards went on silently with their stitching as if nothing had happened. Between the acts men usually adjourn en masse to the refreshment-rooms, but ladies scarcely ever. Perhaps the nature of the refreshments supplied may have something to do with this. Germany is the only country where we have seen men beguile the intervals between the stirring scenes of "Faust" by eating sandwiches made of gruyère cheese or strongly garlicked sausages.

Turning now to Italy, we see playgoing under a new phase. In France playgoing is a recreation, in Germany it is a habit; in Italy, among the upper classes, it seems to be a social necessity. The theatres are at once the clubs and the drawing-rooms of Italy. In all the chief cities of the peninsula, but more especially at Naples and Milan, people pay their visits, transact their business, and make their appointments at the theatre. Italians, as a rule, do not receive much at their homes. It is only at Florence and Genoa that the English customs of dinner-giving and party-giving prevail to any extent. Speaking generally, the life which an Italian leads within doors is untidy and uncomfortable. He has no notion of entertaining visitors, looks upon his house as a shelter against wind and rain, dresses in it, sleeps in it, but goes for his enjoyment elsewhere. At Milan, for instance, every man who has £15 a year to spare takes a stall at the Scala and goes there with unvarying regularity every evening. The ladies have boxes which they furnish as they please, some boxes sporting blue curtains, others red, others yellow; which gives the theatre a gay but somewhat tawdry appearance. If a lady boasts many friends, her box is filled with visitors from the beginning of the performance to the end. Between the acts her liveried footman, or footmen, hand round ices, fruit, and coffee; and at the fall of the curtain she and her guests, ten or a dozen in number, will often sup in the small boudoir which is attached to the box. This is a pleasant way of enjoying the theatre, but for married men whose wives have boxes it is a very expensive one. No wonder that after paying the ice bill, the coffee bill, the supper bill, the upholsterer's bill, and the milliner's bill, which the possession of a box entails, an Italian husband has small appetite for dinner-giving.

The San Carlo at Naples, which the Neapolitans call the theatre of the world, was celebrated until recently for its "bench of critics," the terror of singers. These critics were about twenty in number. They were mostly noblemen and journalists having a thorough knowledge of and a refined taste for music. They occupied the entire first row of orchestra stalls, and exercised an influence over the performers which is best defined in the words of Malibran, who said that she was obliged to drink champagne before venturing to face them. It was after being hissed by the "bench of critics" at the San Carlo that Nourrit, the famous French tenor, committed suicide.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE Cosmopolitan says that Mr. and Mrs. Howard Paul are to receive six thousand dollars for a six weeks' engagement in Boston and New York.

SIDNEY DOBELL, the poet, was lately thrown from his horse and badly hurt.

THE English journals make liberal extracts from Professor Agassiz's address on Humboldt.

MRS. JOHN WOOD has undertaken the management of the St. James's Theatre, London.

KINGLAKE is in the Crimea, collecting materials for the continuation of his History of the War.

THE Pall Mall Gazette is authorized to state that Earl Russell in no way counselled the destruction of Lord Byron's memoir.

MR. JOHN ROBERTSON, who has interested himself greatly in the Byron controversy, declares that Earl Russell has still in his possession a copy of the famous "Byron's Memoirs."

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE for October devotes nearly thirty pages to a critical examination of Charles Reade's Novels. The writer very justly ranks him with the great masters of fiction.

ECHOES, which was formally called Echoes from the Clubs, has again changed its title, and is now known as The Period, having, as the editor remarks with great freshness, risen from its ashes like the Phoenix. The Period is one of those journals whose normal state is ashes.

THE Japanese novelist Kiong te Bakin has finished a novel which he began nearly forty years ago; but then it is in a hundred and six volumes. The romance readers in Japan will have a "nice book" for the long evenings of several long winters. This work would make an excellent "serial" for some enterprising magazine.

THE Pall Mall Gazette makes an unpleasant discovery for soda-water drinkers. It says that those individuals who delight in soda-water and sherry or soda-water and brandy, and are under the impression that the action of the soda will neutralize the mischief done by the other part of the compound, should know that they lean upon a broken reed, and that in nine cases out of ten soda-water, so called, is simply water saturated with carbonic acid gas. The British Pharmacopoeia requires soda-water to contain fifteen grains of soda to the bottle. This is soda-water. The mixture commonly sold as such does nothing of the kind. Why not call it aerated or gas-water, and we could then ask for, and perhaps obtain, what we want?

THE last number of Once a Week publishes the following sonnet "suggested by 'The True Story of Lady Byron's Life'":—

"And now the veil is lifted from the shrine
Whereon thy heart was offered; all is known;
No idle waiting o'er young hopes o'erthrown;
No craving for the world's vain tears was thine.
Thou knewest of a duty more divine,
And therefore, through the weary years alone,
Sawest with thy grief, which others could not own,
Thy life went on. Oh! noblest of thy line!—
With titles that the world could never sound,—
While the full blaze of that disastrous star
Which rose upon thy bridal shone around,
Thy one poor lamp of love burned faint and far;
But now his splendor passes into shame,
And thy sweet faith is more than all his fame."

A WRITER in The Broadway begins a paper on "Denmark and the Danes" with the following statement: "There is no such place as Denmark. After all that has passed and is passing between Denmark and the rest of Europe, to repudiate the very existence of such a land seems like a joke. Still, it is a geographical fact that there is no such place. Denmark is a diplomatic or national appellation given to a cluster of territories which are inhabited by, and supposed to belong to, the Danes;—it signifies the land of the Danes, as Dennewerk does the work of the Danes;—but none of his Danish Majesty's numerous dominions are so called, each of them having a distinct and separate name of its own; and only in reference to their common union is that of Denmark applied."

SUPER FLUMINA BABYLONIS.

By the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept,
Remembering thee,
That for ages of agony hast endured, and slept,
And wouldst not see.

By the waters of Babylon we stood up and sang,
Considering thee,
That a blast of deliverance in the darkness rang,
To set thee free.

And with trumpets and thunderings and with morning song
Came up the light;
And thy spirit uplifted thee to forget thy wrong
As day doth night.

And thy sons were dejected not any more, as then
When thou wast shamed;
When thy lovers went heavily without heart, as men
Whose life was maimed.

In the desolate distances, with a great desire,
For thy love's sake,
With our hearts going back to thee, they were filled with fire,
Were nigh to break.

It was said to us: "Verily ye are great of heart,
But ye shall bend;
Ye are bondsmen and bondswomen, to be scourged and smart,
To toil and tend."

And with harrows men harrowed us, and subdued with spears,
And crushed with shame;
And the summer and winter was, and the length of years,
And no change came.

By the rivers of Italy, by the sacred streams,
By town, by tower,
There was feasting with revelling, there was sleep with dreams,
Until thine hour.

And they slept and they rioted on their rose-hung beds,
With mouths on flame,
And with love-locks vine-chapleted, and with rose-crowned heads
And robes of shame.

And they knew not their forefathers, nor the hills and streams
And words of power,
Nor the gods that were good to them, but with songs and dreams
Filled up their hour.

By the rivers of Italy, by the dry streams' beds,
When thy time came,
There was casting of crowns from them, from their young men's heads,
The crowns of shame.

By the horn of Eridanus, by the Tiber mouth,
As thy day rose,
They arose up and girded them to the north and south,
By seas, by snows.

As a water in January the frost confines,
Thy kings bound thee;
As a water in April is, in the new-blown vines,
Thy sons made free.

And thy lovers that looked for thee, and that mourned from far,
For thy sake dead,
We rejoiced in the light of thee, in the signal star
Above thine head.

In thy grief had we followed thee, in thy passion loved,
Loved in thy loss;
In thy shame we stood fast to thee, with thy pangs were moved,
Clung to thy cross.

By the hillside of Calvary we beheld thy blood,
Thy blood-red tears
As a mother's in bitterness, an unebbing flood,
Years upon years.

And the North was Gethsemane, without leaf or bloom,
A garden sealed;
And the South was Aceldama, for a sanguine fume
Hid all the field.

By the stone of the sepulchre we returned to weep,
From far, from prison;
And the guards by it keeping it we beheld asleep,
But thou wast risen.

And an angel's similitude by the unsealed grave,
And by the stone:
And the voice was angelical, to whose words God gave Strength like his own.

"Lo, the grave-clothes of Italy that are folded up
In the grave's gloom!
And the guards as men wrought upon with a charmed cup,
By the open tomb.

"And her body most beautiful, and her shining head,
These are not here;
For your mother, for Italy, is not surely dead:
Have ye no fear.

"As of old time she spake to you and you hardly heard,
Hardly took heed,
So now also she saith to you, yet another word,
Who is risen indeed.

"By my saying she saith to you in your ears she saith,
Who hear these things,
Put no trust in men's royalties, nor in great men's breath,
Nor words of kings.

"For the life of them vanishes and is no more seen,
Nor no more known;
Nor shall any remember him if a crown hath been,
Or where a throne.

"Unto each man his handiwork, unto each his crown,
The just Fate gives;
Whoso takes the world's life on him and his own lays down,
He, dying so, lives.

"Whoso bears the whole heaviness of the wronged world's weight
And puts it by,
It is well with him suffering, though he face man's fate;
How should he die?

"Seeing death has no part in him any more, no power
Upon his head;
He has bought his eternity with a little hour,
And is not dead.

"For an hour, if ye look for him, he is no more found,
For one hour's space;
Then ye lift up your eyes to him and behold him crowned,
A deathless face.

"On the mountains of memory, by the world's well-springs,
In all men's eyes,
Where the light of the life of him is on all past things,
Death only dies.

"Not the light that was quenched for us, nor the deeds that were,
Nor the ancient days,
Nor the sorrows not sorrowful, nor the face most fair
Of perfect praise."

So the angel of Italy's resurrection said,
So yet he saith;
So the son of her suffering, that from breasts nigh dead
Drew life, not death.

That the pavement of Golgotha should be white as snow,
Not red, but white;
That the waters of Babylon should no longer flow,
And men see light.

ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.

THE FIRST AND LAST KISS.

THY lips are quiet and thine eyes are still,
Cold, colorless, and sad thy placid face,
Thy form has only now the statue's grace;
My words wake not thy voice, nor can they fill Thine eyes with light. Before fate's mighty will
Our wills must bow; yet for a little space
I sit with thee and Death in this lone place,
And hold thy hands that are so white and chill.
I always loved thee, which thou didst not know,
Though well he knew whose wedded love thou wert;
Now thou art dead I may raise up the fold
That hides thy face, and, by thee bending low,
For the first time and last before we part,
Kiss the curved lips, — calm, beautiful, and cold.

OBERMANN.

BY MATTHEW ARNOLD.

THE most recent edition of Obermann lies before me, the date on its title-page being 1863. It is, I believe, the fourth edition which has been published; the book made its first appearance in 1804; three editions, and not large editions, have sufficed for the demand of sixty years. Yet the book has lived, though with but this obscure life, and is not likely to die. Madame George Sand and Monsieur Sainte-Beuve have spoken in prose much and excellently of the book and its author. It may be in the recollection of some who read this that I have spoken of Obermann in verse, if not well, at least abundantly. It is to be wished, however, that Obermann should also speak to English readers for himself; and my present design is to take those two or three points where he is most significant and interesting, and to present some of his deliverances on those points in his own words.

It may be convenient, however, that first I should repeat here the short sketch which I have already given elsewhere of the uneventful life of the personage whom we call Obermann. His real name is Senancour. In the book which occupies us—a volume of letters of which the writer, calling himself Obermann, and writing chiefly from Switzerland, delivers his thoughts about God, nature, and the human soul—it is Senancour himself who speaks under Obermann's name. Etienne Pivert de Senancour, a Frenchman, although having in his nature much that we are accustomed to consider as by no means French, was born in 1770, was trained for the priesthood, and passed some time in the seminary of St. Sulpice, broke away from his training and country to live some years in Switzerland, where he married, came back to France in middle life, and followed thenceforward the career of a man of letters, but with hardly any fame or success. His marriage was not a happy one. He died an old man in 1846, desiring that on his grave might be placed these words only: "Eternité, deviens mon asile."

Of the letters of Obermann, the writer's profound inwardness, his austere and sad sincerity, and his delicate feeling for nature, are, as I have elsewhere remarked, the distinguishing characteristics. His constant inwardness, his unremitting occupation with that question which haunted St. Bernard, — Bernarde, ad quid venisti? — distinguish him from Goethe and Wordsworth, whose study of this question is relieved by the thousand distractions of a poetic interest in nature and in man. His severe sincerity distinguishes him from Rousseau, Chateaubriand, or Byron, who in their dealing with this question are so often attitudinizing and thinking of the effect of what they say on the public. His exquisite feeling for nature, though always dominated by his inward self-converse and by his melancholy, yet distinguishes him from the men simply absorbed in philosophical or religious concerns, and places him in the rank of men of poetry and imagination. Let me try to show these three main characteristics of Senancour from his own words.

A Frenchman, coming immediately after the eighteenth century and the French Revolution, too clear-headed and austere for any such sentimental Catholic reaction as that with which Chateaubriand cheated himself, and yet, from the very profoundness and meditateness of his nature, religious, Senancour felt to the uttermost the bare and bleak spiritual atmosphere into which he was born. Neither to a German nor to an Englishman, perhaps, would such a sense of absolute religious denudation have then been possible, or such a plainness and even crudity, therefore, in their way of speaking of it. Only to a Frenchman were these possible; but amid wars, bustle, and the glory of the grande nation few Frenchmen had meditateness and seriousness enough for them. Senancour was of a character to feel his spiritual position, to feel it without dream or illusion, and to feel, also, that in the absence of any real inward basis life was weariness and vanity, and the ordinary considerations so confidently urged to induce a man to master himself and to be busy in it quite hollow.

"People keep talking," says he, "of doing with energy that which ought to be done; but, amidst all this parade of firmness, tell me, then, what it is that ought to be done. For my part I do not know; and I venture to suspect that a good many others are in the same state of ignorance."

He was born with a passion for order and harmony, and a belief in them; his being so utterly divested of all conventional beliefs, makes this single elementary belief of his the more weighty and impressive.

"May we not say that the tendency to order forms an essential part of our propensities, our instinct, just like the tendency to self-preservation, or to the reproduction of the species? Is it nothing, to live with the calm and the security of the just?"

And therefore, he concludes, "inasmuch as man had this feeling of order planted in him, inasmuch as it was in his nature, the right course would have been to try and make every individual man sensible of it and obedient to it." But what has been done?

Since the beginning of the world, instead of having recourse to this innate feeling, the guides of mankind have uniformly sought to control human conduct by means of supernatural hopes, supernatural terrors, thus misleading man's intelligence, and debasing his soul. "Depuis trente siècles, les résultats sont dignes de la sagesse des moyens." What are called the virtues, "are laws of nature as necessary to man as the laws of his bodily senses." Instead of teaching men to feel this, instead of developing in them that sentiment of order and that consciousness of the divine which are the native possession of our race, Paganism and Christianity alike have tampered with man's mind and heart, and wrought confusion in them.

"Conquerors, slaves, poets, pagan priests, and nurses, succeeded in disfiguring the traditions of primitive wisdom by dint of mixing races, destroying memorials, explaining allegories and making nonsense of them, abandoning the profound and true meaning in order to discover in them absurd ideas which might inspire wonder and awe, and personifying abstract beings in order to have plenty of objects of worship. The principle of life—that which was intelligence, light, the eternal—became nothing more than the husband of Juno; harmony, fruitfulness, the bond of all living things, became nothing more than the mistress of Adonis; imperishable wisdom came to be distinguished only through her owl; the great ideas of immortality and retribution consisted in the fear of turning a wheel, and the hope of strolling in a green wood. The indivisible divinity was parcelled into a hierarchical multitude torn by miserable passions; the fruit of the genius of primitive mankind, the emblems of the laws of the universe, had degenerated into superstitious usages which the children in great cities turned into ridicule."

Paul at Athens might have set forth, in words not unlike these, the degradation of the Unknown God; now for the religion of which Paul was a minister:—

"A moral belief was wanted, because pure morality was gone out of men's knowledge; dogmas were wanted, which should be profound and perhaps unfathomable, but not by any means dogmas which should be absurd, because intelligence was spreading more and more. All religions being sunk into degradation, there was needed a religion of majesty, and answering to man's effort to elevate his soul by the idea of a God of all things. There were needed religious rites which should be imposing, not too common, objects of desire, mysterious yet simple; rites which seemed to belong to a higher world, and which yet a man's reason should accept as naturally as his heart. There was needed, in short, what only a great genius could institute, and what I can only catch glimpses of.

"But you have fabricated, patched, experimented, altered; renewed I know not what incoherent multitude of trivial ceremonies and dogmas, more fitted to scandalize the weak than to edify them. This dubious mixture you have joined to a morality sometimes false, often exceedingly noble, and almost always austere; the one single point in which you have shown sagacity. You pass some hundreds of years in arranging all this by inspiration; and your slowly built work, industriously repaired, but with a radical fault in plan, is so made as to last hardly longer than the time during which you have been accomplishing it."

There is a passage to be meditated by the new Ecumenical Council! Not that Senancour has a trace of the Voltairian bitterness against Christianity, or against Catholicism which to him represented Christianity:—

"So far am I from having any prejudice against Christianity, that I deplore, I may say, what the majority of its zealous adherents never themselves think of deploring. I could willingly join them in lamenting the loss of Christianity; but there is this difference between us, that they regret it in the form into which it settled, nay, in the form, even, which it wore a century ago; whereas I cannot consider such a Christianity as that was to be much worthy of regret."

He owns that religion has done much; but "si la religion a fait des grandes choses, c'est avec des moyens immenses." Disposing of such means, it ought to have done much more. Remark, he says, that for the educated class religion is one of the weakest of the motive-powers they live by; and then ask yourself whether it is not absurd that there should be only a tenth part of our race educated. That religion should be of use as some restraint to the ignorant and brutal mass of mankind, shows, he thinks, not so much the beneficence of religion as the state of utter confusion and misery into which mankind has, in spite of religion, drifted:—

"I admit that the laws of civil society prove to be not restraint enough for this multitude to which we give no training, about which we never trouble our heads, which we bring into the world and then leave to the chance of ignorant passions and of habits of low debauchery. This only proves that there is mere wretchedness and confusion under the apparent calm of vast states; that the science of politics, in the true sense of the term, is a stranger to our world, where diplomacy and financial administration produce prosperity to be sung in poems, and win victories to figure in gazettes."

This concern for the state and prospects of what are called the masses is perpetually recurring with Senancour; it came to him from his singular lucidity and plain dealing, for it was no commonplace with his time and contemporaries, as it is with ours. "There are men," he says, and he was one of them, "who cannot be happy except among men who are contented; who feel in their own persons all the enjoyment and suffering they witness, and who cannot be satisfied with themselves except they contribute to the order of the world and to man's welfare." "Arrange one's life how one will," he says in another place, "who can answer for its being any happier so long as it is and must be sans accord avec les choses et passée au milieu des peuples souffrants?" This feeling returns again and again:—

"Inequality is in the nature of things; but you have increased it out of all measure, when you ought, on the contrary, to have studied to reduce it. The prodigies of your industry must surely be a baneful work of superfluity, if you have neither time nor faculties for doing so many things which are indispensable. The mass of mankind is brutal, foolish, given over to its passions; all your ills come from this cause. Either do not bring men into existence, or, if you do, give them an existence which is human."

But as deep as his sense that the time was out of joint was the feeling of this Havelock that he had no power to set it right. Vos docteurs ont fleuri mon âme, he says:—

"Your miseries have worn out my soul; they are intolerable, because they are objectless. Your pleasures are illusory, fugitive; a day suffices for knowing them and abandoning them. I inquired of myself for happiness but with my eyes open; I saw that it was not made for the man who was isolated: I proposed it to those who stood round me; they had not leisure to concern themselves with it. I asked the multitude in its wear and tear of misery and the great of earth under their load of ennui; they answered me: We are wretched to-day, but we shall enjoy ourselves to-morrow. For my part I know that the day which is coming will only tread in the footsteps of the day which is gone before."

But a root of failure, powerlessness, and ennui, there certainly was in the constitution of Senancour's own nature; so that unfavorable as may have been his time we should err in attributing to any outward circumstances the whole of the discouragement by which he is pervaded. He himself knew this well, and he never seeks to hide it from us. "Il y a dans moi un déracinement," says he; "c'est le désordre des ennemis."

"I was born to be not happy. You know those dark days, bordering on the frosts of winter, when mists hang heavily about the very dawn, and day begins only by threatening lines of a lurid light upon the masses of cloud. That glooming veil, those stormy squalls, those uncertain gleams, that whistling of the wind through trees which bend and shiver, those prolonged throes like funeral groans,—you see in them the morning of life; at noon, cooler storms and more steadily persistent; at evening, thicker darkness still, and the day of man is brought to an end."

No representation of Senancour can, however, be complete without some of the gleams which relieved this discouragement. Besides the inwardness, besides the sincerity, besides the renouncement, there was the poetic emotion and the deep feeling for nature.

"And I, too, I have my moments of forgetfulness, of strength, of grandeur; I have desires and yearnings that know no limit. But I behold the monuments of effaced generations; I see the flint wrought by the hand of man, and which will subsist a hundred centuries after him. I renounce the care for that which passes away, and the thought of a present which is already gone. I stand still, and marvel; I listen to what subsists yet, I would fain hear what will go on subsisting; in the movement of the forest, in the murmur of the pines, I seek to catch some of the accents of the eternal tongue."

Nature, and the emotion caused by nature, inspire so many beautiful passages in Obermann's letters that one is embarrassed to make a choice among them. The following, with which we will end our extracts, is a morning and night piece from the north end of the Lake of Neuchâtel, where the river Thièle enters the lake from Biennne, between Saint Blaise and Morat:—

"My window had remained open all night, as is my habit. Towards four o'clock in the morning I was wakened by the dawn, and by the scent of the hay which they had been cutting in the cool early hours by the light of the moon. I expected an ordinary view; but I had a moment of perfect astonishment. The midsummer rains had kept up the waters which the melting snow in the Jura had previously swollen. The space between the lake and the Thièle was almost entirely flooded; the highest spots formed islands of pasture amidst the expanse of waters ruffled with the fresh breeze of morning. The waves of the lake could be made out in the distance, driven by the wind against the half-flooded bank. Some goats and cows, with their herdsman, who made a rustic music with a horn, were passing at the moment over a tongue of land left dry between the flooded plain and the Thièle. Stones set in the parts where it was worst going supported this natural causeway or filled up gaps in it; the pasture to which the docile animals were proceeding was not in sight, and so see their slow and irresolute advance, one would have said they were about to get out into the lake and be lost there. The heights of Anet and the thick woods of Julemont rose out of the waters like a desert island without an inhabitant. The hilly chain of Vuilly edged the lake on the horizon. To the south, this chain stretched away behind the slopes of Montiménil; and farther on than all these objects, sixty leagues of eternal snows stamped the whole country with the inimitable majesty of those bold lines of nature which give to places sublimity."

He dines at the toll-house by the river-bank, and after passing the afternoon there, goes out again late in the evening:—

"The moon had not yet risen; my path lay beside the green waters of the Thièle. I had taken the key of my lodging that I might come in when I liked without being tied to a particular hour. But feeling inclined to muse, and finding the night so warm that there was no hardship in being all night out of doors, I took the road to Saint Blaise. I left it at a little village called Marin, which has the lake to the south of it. I descended a steep bank, and got upon the shore of the lake where its ripple came up and expired. The air was calm; not a sail was to be seen on the lake. Every one was at rest; some in the forgetfulness of their toils, others in the forgetfulness of their sorrows. The moon rose; I remained there hours. Towards morning, the moon shed over earth and waters the ineffable melancholy of her last gleams. Nature seems unspeakably grand, when, plunged in a long revery, one hears the washing of the waves upon a solitary strand, in the calm of a night still enkindled and luminous with the setting moon.

"Sensibility which no words can express, charm and torment of our vain years! vast [consciousness of a nature everywhere greater than we are, and everywhere impenetrable! all-embracing passion, ripened wisdom, delicious self-abandonment,—everything that a mortal heart can contain of life-weariness and yearning, I felt it all, I experienced it all, in this memorable night. I have made an ominous step towards the age of decline; I have swallowed up ten years of life at once. Happy the simple, whose heart is always young!"

There, in one of the hours which were at once the inspiration and the enervation of Senancour's life, we leave him. It is possible that an age, breaking with the past, and inclined to tell it the most naked truths, may take more pleasure than its predecessors in Obermann's bleak frankness, and may even give him a kind of celebrity. Nevertheless, it may be predicted with certainty that his very celebrity, if he gets it, will have, like his life, something maimed, incomplete, and unsuccessful about it; and that his intimate friends will still be but a few, as they have hitherto been. These few will never fail him.

STUBBS'S LUCK.

L

"WHEN are you going down, Stubbs?"

"I don't know; not just yet at any rate, and perhaps not at all."

"Not go down at all! Why, my dear fellow, you could n't spend Christmas in this place; you'd drown yourself in Barnwell Pool."

"I spent last Christmas here, anyhow; and it was not so very stupid after all. I skated down to Ely, and stopped on my way back at that queer inn called Five miles from—anywhere at Upware; had some fun in the fen, shooting and so on; and when the frost broke up I got plenty of sculling without being obliged to twist my neck off looking out for muff-boats. Then the billiard-rooms were pretty well deserted, so that I was able to practise on nearly every table, and I improved my game immensely (as you know, old fellow). Besides which, I went to town once or twice, to see a pantomime or so; and, moreover, I did a good stroke of reading."

"Ah! that's the way you get the pull of us, and beat us at billiards as well as 'book-learning.' I can't say, however, that your picture has made me envious."

So talked Laurence Horton and William Stubbs, as they walked arm in arm down Trumpington Street from Unity College, Cambridge, to the railway station. Horton had left his luggage to follow by 'bus, preferring to go afoot for the pleasure of Stubbs's company, and for the circulation of the blood. They went swinging along at a very fair pace; the snow was scrunched noisily beneath their feet; the icicles glittered like barley-sugar in the rays of the wintry sun; the sky was clear and blue above their heads; and they gloried in the freshness of the eager air,—for the date of their walk was many years ago; there were frost and snow at Christmas then; and December and May had not changed months.

Of the two young men, Horton was considerably the taller. He had dark curly hair, friendly looking gray eyes, a pale face, a slight figure, and an air of easy self-possession, which neither rudeness nor haughtiness could easily ruffle. Stubbs's hair was light brown; his eyes were of a soft, deep, melting blue; his face was fresh-colored, and his figure particularly graceful; but he walked with just the slightest approach to a swagger, and his expression, had not the softness of his eyes been remarkable, would have struck a stranger as being full of defiance. The explanation was not difficult. Stubbs was one of those of whom it might have been said, "Hit him hard; he has no friends." Not that he was unpopular in his college; indeed, there was not a greater favorite. It was certainly a very small college, but there was not a man in it who did not know and like Stubbs, who was captain of their boat, their best bowler, their second-best billiard-player, and one of their best scholars. But then these are not generally the friends who can push you on in the world; they are your rivals and opponents, not your patrons and helpers. And Stubbs had become early acquainted with grief. Death had hob-and-nobbed with him when he was but a babe. At eight years of age, he became an only child. At nine Death found him out again; and even strangers were moved to tears as the little chief-mourner, with streaming eyes and a child's frank sobs, his footsteps cumbered by his long black cloak, stumbled weeping towards his father's grave. There was, after this, a respite of six years, during which Death was busy with other prey; and then the devourer returned to his favorite quarry. Mrs. Stubbs was reunited to the Rev. William Stubbs beneath the communion-table of the church he had died in serving; and William Stubbs, junior, was relationless and alone. And the little money which had come to him was just enough, in addition to the exhibition he had won at a public school, to keep him on an equality with his comrades during the usual university career.

Now Horton had heard at odd times scraps of Stubbs's personal history, and it struck a chill to his kindly heart to think that Stubbs should spend in solitary isolation the season which to Laurence was a time of multitudinous merriment and continual gayety. And theirs was no common friendship: they had been together in many a well-contested boat-race, when Stubbs's voice had cheered on the crew, and his "Now for it!" had preceded a spurt which had drawn shrieks of admiration from the red-shirted blue-shirted white-shirted and striped-shirted demons who ran and leaped and yelled upon the bank. They had ridden side by side and fence for fence when the jumps were stiff and the pace alarming, and each, as he recovered from a stunning fall, had seen the face of the other bending anxiously over him. They had spun, stroke for stroke, down the ice-bound Cam to the island famed for its abundant eels. On Barton Ponds their burnished skates had flashed and whirled and droned in unison as they challenged each other to a trial of skill on inside edge and outside edge, in "circle" and "spread-eagle," and "Dutch-roll," and "flying Mercury," and "bunch of currants." They had played famous matches at billiards; and they had read together the gems of Greek and the flowers of Latin. And so it came into Horton's mind that this man Stubbs was more his brother than his acquaintance; that his father's house had a void which Stubbs could supply; that his own double-bedded room demanded Stubbs to make it symmetrical. As, therefore, the friends were preparing to shake hands and part, says Horton abruptly, "Look here, old fellow; you say you've no engagement for Christmas: come and stay with us,—come to-morrow."

Stubbs looked blank as he answered, "I'd stay with you with pleasure, but—but—"

"Oh!" broke in Horton, "you're afraid my people might object. I can only tell you the governor will be delighted. But I know you're awfully proud, so I'll get you a formal invitation from him. There, the train's just off. Good by, old boy."

II.

As Stubbs walked home to college he began to ponder upon the subject of Christmas. How would he like the Hortons and their fashion of spending Christmas-day? The last time he could recollect spending Christmas-day in a family it had nearly been the death of him. It was a very religious family, and they observed the festal day religiously,—that is to say, they went to church morning and afternoon, and afterwards gave themselves up to such serious eating and drinking that it was clear the seniors must be ill the next day, and the juniors most likely before morning. There was a general interdiction of all amusements except "cross questions and crooked answers, if that—even when it is a game, and not a domestic habit—can be called an amusement (which Stubbs denied). And when Stubbs had inveigled one of the daughters, whilst mamma was out of the room, to play and sing with him a lively song, the other members of the family had looked undigested pudding at him; and mamma, hurrying back at the hateful sounds of joy, had asked, "Whatever is the meaning of this? Isabella playing profane music! Can that be my Isabella?"

And Isabella had answered sulkily, "You ought to know best, mamma; I have n't altered much since you left the room, I imagine."

Then mamma had asked poor Stubbs, "What would your poor mother have said, Mr. Stubbs?"

And Stubbs had replied, "I really can't say for certain; but I think she would have waited until we had quite finished, and then would have said, 'Thank you, dears'; at least that is what she usually said."

So Stubbs had registered a vow in—well, the place where he always registered his vows—that he would never spend another Christmas day with Isabella's family. From that time to the present, Christmas-day had been to him a day of solitary confinement; he had shut himself up in his own rooms and read hard; he had gone to bed early; and a sense of void had come over him as his sleep went from him at the sound of distant merriment, and the silver voice of laughing maid caused bitter thoughts to the friendless man. He had never owned to anybody how lonely and sad he had been; but now all he had suffered in his loneliness came back to him, and he was glad that Horton had thought of him. It is true that he was unaccustomed to society; that he knew scarcely half a dozen families; and that he heartily disliked "going out"; but he "believed in" Horton (as the saying is), and was convinced that all would be right with the Hortons. It was, therefore, with no small pleasure that he received from Horton the following note:—

"GROVE HOUSE, HIGH BECKHAM, December 22.

"DEAR STUBBS,— The governor, who hopes you will excuse him for not writing in person, bids me to say that he will be really grateful to you if you will condescend to share my double-bedded room during our Christmas vacation, as I am such a bore, and annoy everybody so awfully when I have no suitable companion, that I make the house intolerable. (You will understand that I am writing to dictation and under compulsion.) So I shall expect you by the train which leaves Cambridge at 2 P. M. on the 24th. You must get out at the Reddenham Station, and I will drive over in the pony-chaise to meet you. Mind you come.

"Yours always, LAURENCE HORTON."

If you refer to the guide (not yet published) to country-places which do not exist, you will observe that both Reddenham and High Beckham are in the county of Missex, not far from the river Spree, and that Reddenham Station is between Broxbourne and London. Now not every train stops at Reddenham; Stubbs, therefore, with the usual thoughtfulness which characterizes Cambridge men, intrusted his luggage to a porter, telling the place to which he wished to go, and asking whether there would be any change of carriages. The porter answered "No," and received a shilling for his trouble, or, more correctly speaking, for releasing Stubbs from possible trouble. But Stubbs would have done better to refer to a time-table, or to ask his question of the guard of the train, for at Broxbourne a voice was heard jumbling together (as only railway officials can jumble) the names of certain places, and adjuring passengers who wished to get out at the places (the names of which it was impossible to make out) to descend forthwith and wait for a coming train. Stubbs considered that after his satisfactory interview with the porter he was absolved from all further bother, and travelled on contentedly until the train stopped again.

"Tickets, please," said the collector.

"I want to get out at Reddenham," remarked Stubbs, affably.

"Reddenham! Lord bless you, sir, you've passed it ever so far. This is London, this is. You ought to have changed at Broxbourne. Did n't they holler out?"

"O yes," said Stubbs; "they holler'd out enough to split themselves, but I could n't make out a word they said; and the porter I gave my luggage to at Cambridge assured me I should n't have to change."

"Where did you take your ticket to, sir?"

"To Reddenham."

"Let me look at it, please?— O, all right,— there's one and fourpence to pay."

"Come, that's rather too bad: I'm taken to a place I don't want to go to, and I'm to pay extra for it!"

"I can't help it, sir; you'll have to pay."

"There's your one and fourpence, then; but how am I to get to High Beckham?"

The ticket-collector, having got his money, retired, as people usually do under the circumstances, and muttered something unintelligible; but an antediluvian old lady, taking an interest in Stubbs's youth and soft blue eyes, remarked, "There's a coach from the Black Bull in Aldgate every Saturday at three o'clock."

"Thank you," replied Stubbs; "but I want to be there by six o'clock this evening, and it is only Wednesday."

The old lady had no further suggestion to make; so Stubbs was obliged to take a cab all the way, and, during his drive, had leisure to reflect upon the dismay he must have caused Horton, who he felt sure would have waited for him in the biting frost, and would chaff him terribly upon his usual luck; for "Stubbs's luck" was a by-word at Unity.

III.

A drive of more than an hour and a half (for the roads were slippery, though the horse was "roughed") brought Stubbs to the door of Grove House. It was a house which stood in its own grounds, and entrance was effected through a high wall towards the road, so that Stubbs could not see what the place was like. But a vigorous ring at the bell brought out a ruddy maid, who shrieked out immediately, "O Mister Laurence, here's the missin' gentleman!" And the cry brought Laurence himself to the gate.

"Your usual luck, eh, Stubbs?" said Laurence, shaking his friend by the hand. "I saw you pass in the train, and was n't fool enough to wait; so you need n't apologize.— Come in, old boy, come in; you're just in time: old cook has been ringing the dinner-bell like mad, and the governor has just gone up to his room."

Stubbs's luggage was left in the hall, and himself ushered into the drawing-room. There was no up-stairs drawing-room in cosey Grove House; dining-room and drawing-room were both on one floor, on the same side of the ample hall; and on the opposite side of the hall was the comfortable study, which served on occasion as breakfast-room.

"Come along, old fellow; I'll just introduce you to my sister, and then you can go and wash your hands," cried Laurence, preceding his friend to the drawing-room. "Ellen, this is my friend Stubbs."

The most elegant figure Stubbs had ever seen faced about at these words, and the owner, coming forward from the fireplace, held out her hand without ceremony, and with a frank, beaming smile, saying in a voice which thrilled Stubbs with pleasure, "I'm very glad to see you. Mr. Stubbs. We were quite prepared for some misadventure, for the fame of your ill-luck preceded you."

And now entered Mr. Horton senior, who was Mr. Horton, junior, with the inevitable changes wrought by age; perhaps, also, he had a little more urbanity in his manner, and a little less self-contentedness in appearance.

"How do you do, Mr. Stubbs?" said he heartily. "I am very glad indeed to see you. Late! O dear, no, not at all; I have only just come in myself. Confound that woman; she'll pull the bell down."

"It is the third time, papa," said Miss Horton, laughing, "and you know cook gets frantic then."

"O well, just take Mr. Stubbs into your room, Laurence. There's hot water, Ellen?"

"Yes, papa. At least it was hot," added Ellen slyly, when cook first began to ring the bell; "I had it taken up at once."

"Come along, Stubbs," cried hungry Laurence; "I'm almost famished"; and in three minutes cook was appeased, the soup was served, and conversation was fitful and monosyllabic. But when the inner man had been glossed with soup, and old Mr. Horton had said, "A glass of wine with you, Mr. Stubbs; I'm very glad you've come," and Laurence and Ellen had "joined them," and Laurence had laughed boisterously at the elaborate bow with which Stubbs (in honor, of course, of Ellen's presence) had responded to Laurence's careless nod, and had been duly reproved by Stubbs (supported by Ellen) for introducing college brusqueness into the family circle, the talking assumed a continuous flow. At length Ellen rose to leave the room, and Stubbs was not a little astonished at the coolness of Laurence, who shouted to his sister, as she went down the hall, "I say, Ellen, I'm going to leave this door open, and you leave the drawing-room door open, and play lots of waltzes, and sing lots of songs: it will be cheerful for Stubbs over his wine."

Stubbs was about to protest; but Laurence said, "Pooh! she likes it; don't you, Ellen?"

And a laughing voice answered, "O, very much. You must let me know when you are stunned, Mr. Stubbs, or I may go on too long,—for sheer pleasure."

Old Mr. Horton chuckled with amusement; and it was plain that the only son reigned lord-paramount over Grove House.

Stubbs had never felt so serenely happy in his life as upon that Christmas Eve, when he sat listening to the sweet, clear notes of Ellen Horton. But compliant Ellen was not tried very long. Laurence soon bade Stubbs to a pipe up stairs (for the double-bedded room was not only a sleeping-chamber, but also a sort of study and divan), leaving old Mr. Horton to his Quarterly and consequent nap, and dispensing with his sister's services in the gracious words, "Shut up now, if you like, Ellen; Stubbs and I are going up stairs to have a pipe."

"Thy servant heareth," replied Ellen with a laugh, but continued to carol for her own entertainment; and it is my private opinion that Stubbs, had he been asked, would rather have gone into the drawing-room to Ellen than have followed Laurence into the atmosphere of tobacco. But he was not asked. He was offered a pipe, and Stubbs had never been known to refuse that offer. When the two friends had imbibed sufficient nicotine, and acquired sufficient disagreeableness of odor, they descended to the drawing-room for a cup of tea. This was followed by a game of chess, another song or two from Ellen, and a display of frightful yawns from Laurence Horton, who, saying he had been chatting all day and was drowsy, demanded

Stubbs's opinion about going to bed. It was past ten; they could have another pipe over the bedroom fire; and it would n't hurt either of them to go to bed early, as they had late hours enough at Unity. Stubbs was also tired, and ready for sleep; so, with a salutation to Ellen, and a smile at old Mr. Horton, who was napping in his chair, they took their candle and retired.

IV.

Stubbs had hardly fallen asleep that night when he awoke with a sound of bell-ringing in his ears. Half-asleep, half-awake, he fancied he could hear the opening and shutting of an outer door, then the whispering of soft voices on the stairs, and the subdued sounds of silver laughter at the entrance to the opposite chamber. But he was soon asleep again, and in the morning had nearly forgotten all about it, when, having interchanged at the breakfast-table "Merry Christmas" with his friends, he observed Laurence's eyes fixed upon a plate, egg-cup, and cup and saucer, which had all of them evidently been already used.

"O, Lucy did n't stay at Mrs. Kershaw's, then?" remarked Laurence.

"No," said Ellen; "Mr. Kershaw brought her home late last night, and she was afraid she would disturb your Highness's rest, for she was merrier than ever."

"I did n't hear anything," said Laurence. "Did you, Stubbs?"

"I've a dim recollection," answered Stubbs, "of hearing something very pleasant, like the tinkle of a silver bell; and though I wished to hear more, I grieve to say that I was too sleepy to—"

"That is fortunate," interrupted Ellen, "or you would have heard something very like the roar of two madcaps. I am sure poor papa must have heard us down stairs."

Papa, trying to look severe, admitted that he did, and that he thought it very unseemly conduct; against which charge Ellen made no further defence than to put her arm round his neck, and kiss his cheek, as she left the room on household affairs.

Laurence and Stubbs strolled out into the garden, for the sun was bright though the frost was keen, to smoke the after-breakfast pipe; and whilst the former went to speak to the gardener, whose cottage stood hard by the garden end, the latter had time to make his observations on the place, and puzzle his brains in guessing who was Lucy. He paced up and down, and round and round, gradually increasing his speed, for it was a snipping air, and he was chafing with the enigma, when, after one of the turns which set his back to the house, he heard a peculiar clatter on the path behind him. It came patter, patter, closer and closer, and it sounded like the tap of a dainty boot lightly struck on the frozen ground. He turned slowly round, and saw an apparition which startled his hat from his head, and his pipe from his mouth. The apparition was young and short, and wore a bonnet of the prevailing mode, but without a veil; so that the delicate skin, just stimulated by the frost, and the smooth black hair, hiding the tops of the ears, and the high, broad forehead, and the deep-blue eyes, and the well-formed nose, and the rich red lips, and the teeth that seemed made for nothing coarser than smiles, and the dimpled chin, and the oval face, were all revealed to the naked eye. The apparition, moreover, held in one hand a black muff, and with the other lifted a black dress, over which was a hooded gray cloak, so as to show just a few inches of red petticoat and white stockings sprouting out of tiny black kid boots. The latter hand the apparition, having dropped the dress, stretched forth to the grateful Stubbs with modest unconstraint, and just the faintest blush, saying in tones which made his very heart to laugh, "How do you do, Mr. Stubbs? I'm so glad you have come."

Stubbs was disposed to answer that he had never felt so well in his life, barring a slight tremor about the region of the heart and knees; but he resisted, and replied simply, "You are very kind. Yes; I came last evening."

"And you and Laurence were so fatigued that you had gone to bed before I came home: I heard —"

"I assure you I had no notion you were expected, or — or —"

"O, don't say anything polite, please; I was only afraid I disturbed you. But where is Laurence? I want to wish him a 'Merry Christmas.' By the way, I wish you one, Mr. Stubbs. To the gardener's, you say? Let us walk there; I'm so cold. Where is your pipe? You were smoking a pipe when I first saw you."

Stubbs had ignominiously thrust it up his sleeve, and now produced it ruefully.

"Pray, go on," said the apparition; "at least, if it is not out; and if it is, I dare say you have a match. I don't mind it in the least; Laurence has drilled me too well for that."

But who was she? She was not a bit like Laurence, or Ellen, or old Mr. Horton.

"Ah, Lu — glad to see you," said Laurence with a salute, the cold fraternal style of which seemed to solve Stubbs's problem as she sprang forward with a "Merry Christmas, Laurie, dear."

"Same to you, Lu," replied his worship coldly. "So you've made acquaintance with my friend Stubbs."

"Yes; Ellen told me I should find you both in the garden, and as you were not there to introduce me, I — I — no; I declare, I never said who I am. It never struck me you would n't know who I am, Mr. Stubbs. I beg your pardon; I'm —"

"I ought to have known," interrupted Stubbs, "that you are Laurence's sister."

"O, what fun!" said she, laughing: "and I'm not; and yet my name is Lucy Horton. I'm Laurence's first-cousin. My father and mother both died when I was quite a baby, and I have lived here ever since with my uncle, who is my father's brother; and I always call Uncle Horton papa, and he considers me his daughter."

"Well, Lu," resumed Laurence, "have you been to the school this morning?"

"Yes, of course I have; that is why we did n't meet at breakfast, — you know that."

"Look here, Stubbs," said Laurence, smiling; "Lucy goes out at unearthly hours on Sundays and Christmas-day, and all days of that sort, and teaches all the dirty little brats they can bribe to go to the Sunday school."

Lucy looked grave and sad.

"Don't talk of them like that, Laurie," she said gently. "Very few of them are dirty, and nearly all of them are so thankful for every little attention; or if they are not, poor little things, their parents are for them."

Laurence laughed; and "What do you say about it, Stubbs?" he asked.

"I should like to inquire whether it is not — on the Sabbath, at any rate — breaking the fourth commandment," replied Stubbs, smiling.

Again Lucy looked grave and sad; and "Please don't joke about it, Mr. Stubbs," she said so earnestly, that Stubbs swore inwardly he would lose his right hand first.

And now the Christmas chimes pealed forth, calling Christian men to prayer; and a cheerful party were the Hortons and their guest, as they walked briskly along to the taper-spined, ivy-covered, simple-looking little church, not far from the ice-bound river. There was a cordial greeting for many a friend, a Christmas-box for the blue-nosed sweeper; and Lucy's little pupils, in quaint red cloaks, bobbed generally to the party, and smiled affectionately at the teacher herself. Some of the smaller ones ran confidently up to her, and had a playful pinch of the cheek and a "Merry Christmas, dear," for their pains; whilst the elder ones said, "Servant, miss," not at all with a look of menial subservience, but with glances of love, as of those who frankly acknowledged obligations by no means humiliating. Stubbs experienced an unwanted sensation of peaceful content and devotional gratitude as he sat by Lucy in the ample pew, and as he listened to her voice, and joined his own with unusual fervor, and gladdened his eyes with the holly-twined pillars and the holly-formed letters above the altar, which had been carefully arranged in a segment of a circle, whereof the curve said, "Glory be to God on high," and the straight line: "Peace on earth, good-will towards men."

V.

There was a joyous luncheon soon after church, for two carriages had arrived with welcome visitors. There were Uncle Tom and Aunt Maria, and Sister Mary with her husband James, and others not so closely related, and they all held out their hands to Stubbs, as if they had known him for many a year; and Stubbs felt, more than he had thought he could, that he was a link in the society of kindly men. And after luncheon, the hats sallied forth for a long walk, and the bonnets stayed at home for exercise in the garden, or for womanly converse by the blazing hearth.

After the bracing walk came the Christmas cheer; and happy Stubbs sat next to Lucy. The talk flowed freely on with many an anecdote and many a jest; and when at last the drawing-room was reached, they sat in semicircle round the fire, and spoke of Christmas reminiscences: how one had been there who was now with the dead; how another would be thinking of them in a foreign land; how another was absent by reason of feud; and how good it is that enmities should cease at such a time. Then the strain grew more cheerful; and they conversed of love, and marriage, and children, as they wandered to the scenes of New-Year's Day and the dancing delights of gay Twelfth-night. Each could remember how at such a time symptoms had shown themselves in Jack and Gill which had betrayed their secret to observant folk, and had resulted in a trip by gray-horsed chariot to a fashionable church for change of name. Isabella's mother, Stubbs thought, should have been there to see how a Christmas evening could pass without profane music, and without "cross questions and crooked answers"; for the questions were pleasant and straightforward, and the answers of a similar character. But inexorable time brought round eleven o'clock, and with it came the clatter of hoofs and the drawing up of carriages at the door. Then the time-honored butler of the house appeared with a two-handled cup upon a silver salver; he placed it upon the table and retired, and Mr. Horton whispered something to Laurence, who laughed aloud, and approaching Stubbs, said, with as much seriousness as he could assume, "I must beg you, old fellow, to shift your quarters, and sit next to me; an ancient ceremony is about to be performed."

So Stubbs, who had been sitting between Ellen and Lucy, reluctantly left his place, and formed one extreme of the semicircle, of which old Mr. Horton formed the other. Then the senior, taking the cup in his hands, turned to Aunt Maria, who was his next neighbor, kissed her affectionately, took a sip, and passed the cup to her; and so it went round with kiss and sip until it came to Laurence, who, having received it from Lucy, and having glanced slyly at Stubbs, whispered to her something which caused her to bite her lip, and look steadfastly at the fire. He then, having handed the cup to Stubbs with the recommendation to "take a good swig, it's rare stuff," walked across and saluted his father, saying, on his return, to Stubbs, "By the way, you might have liked to kiss the governor; I dare say he would n't mind."

But old Mr. Horton relieved Stubbs by shaking his fist at Laurence, and shouting, "You're an impudent young puppy, sir. If I were you, I'd kick him, Stubbs." And so with general laughter the guests departed, each having some invitation to impress upon the family, and each taking care to say to Stubbs, "You'll come, of course, Mr. Stubbs; you'll not expect any formal asking?"

VI.

The Christmas vacation was passing joyously with Stubbs: there were skating, sleighing, billiards, dinner-parties, and dances with Ellen and Lucy for frequent partners. They were both beautiful dancers; but there was about Lucy's movements a grace which struck even the most unobservant; she moved with the ease of a gossamer on the gale. Stubbs had been the pupil of both; for he had confessed his inability to waltz. He could shuffle through a quadrille, he had said, and could shamle through a polka, but waltzes and that sort of thing were beyond him. So Ellen and Lucy had taken him in hand; and it must not be considered sheer stupidity on Stubbs's part, if, when Lucy drew her dress aside to more conveniently show him the steps, he was very slow to learn, and required a great deal of that elementary instruction (for she had the prettiest foot and ankle imaginable). Moreover, Lucy skated exquisitely; and, though Laurence was fond of long excursions to distant spots when the river was frozen, Stubbs was more pleased when his friend was lazy, and would stay at home to skate upon the garden-pond; for then Lucy (who, of course, could not go everywhere) would join them, and Stubbs had the privilege of taking off and putting on Lucy's skates. On such an occasion, Lucy had said with a laugh, "Thank you, Mr. Stubbs. Laurence says I ought to give you a copper."

"We always give the lads coppers for putting our skates on," said Laurence.

"But I have no coppers," rejoined Lucy demurely.

"They pay in different coin in Holland," remarked Stubbs tremulously.

"O, do they?" asked Lucy. "Pray, how do they pay?"

"With the lips," answered Stubbs boldly.

"They speak their thanks, I suppose you mean," said Lucy archly.

"No; I do not: they — they — you can read all about it in books on Holland," stammered Stubbs.

"Ah! but this is not Holland, you know: I must take care to have coppers another time"; and away flew Lucy on the outer edge.

And Stubbs said to his own heart, "Here by God's grace, is the one maid for me."

At length the vacation was over, and Cambridge life began again. But Stubbs went back a new man. There was now a name which he blest when he rose in the morning, and when he lay down to rest at night. He had been objectless before, but now he would work with a view to an end. He had supposed he would glide naturally into holy orders; he would now aim to be worthy of his vocation, and of her whose religion was no sham. He would also strive for high honors, that he might have a reasonable chance of clerical preferment. Was it possible that Lucy guessed his feelings? Others certainly had: for once at a dance, as he stood talking to pretty Emily Field, whilst his looks kept wandering to where Lucy was dancing, Emily had said abruptly, "I think Lucy the prettiest girl in the room."

"So do I — by far," poor Stubbs had admitted with more honesty than gallantry; but Emily had only laughed good-naturedly, and said, "It is no use fishing for compliments from you, and I should n't have believed you if you had said anything else," for Emily Field was as candid as she was pretty; and besides, there was some one, as she knew very well, who did not at all agree with Stubbs.

VII.

On flew hours, and days, and weeks, and then the Easter vacation came, and old Mr. Horton gave Stubbs to understand that he and Laurence would be expected together. So he basked once more in Lucy's smiles, which were banished only once through him. It was on Easter Sunday, and Lucy had put on a new bonnet. She had been quizzed about it by Laurence, and had acknowledged that she always made a point of putting on something new on so notable a day, and then, "Have you put on anything new, Mr. Stubbs?" she asked innocently.

"Nothing but a new spirit," answered Stubbs irreverently.

Then the sad, grave look came over Lucy's face, and Stubbs felt stabbed to the heart, for he fancied her eyes grew dim with tears; but she turned her head away hastily, so that he could not see, so hurt was she by the slightest irreverence.

On sped the weeks once more, and the May term brought plenteous leaves to the beautiful limes at the backs of the colleges, and cricket-matches and boat-races. And the Horton family went to Cambridge to see a boat-race, and the Unity boat made a splendid "bump," and Stubbs pulled stroke, and Lucy saw him. And when the Hortons departed, old Mr. Horton said, "Well, Mr. Stubbs, you're one of us now, you know; you must come to us with Laurence for the Long Vacation, if you've no other engagement."

And Stubbs replied, "Upon my word, sir, you are very good, and I wish I could. But you see I go in for my degree next time, and I am going to read with a private tutor this Long.

"Well, well," said Mr. Horton, "at any rate you can come to us for a week or ten days before you join your reading-party." And so it was arranged.

Now, before the term was over, Laurence Horton and Stubbs had stumbled upon a topic of conversation which will crop up occasionally amongst young men at the universities and elsewhere. It was eyes, — ladies' eyes; and Stubbs had maintained with considerable warmth that Lucy Horton had the most beautiful eyes in the world. Laurence had replied indifferently that it might be so, but that as he had always regarded Lucy as a younger sister, he had taken very little notice of them. They went on to noses, and it appeared that Stubbs had never seen any nose he liked so well as that which stood above the chin of Lucy Horton. Laurence whistled, and proceeded to mouths, when the mouth of Lucy Horton was pronounced by Stubbs the mouth of mouths. Hereupon, Laurence said abruptly, "Stubbs, my boy, you are spoony on Lucy."

This very common but very disagreeable language applied to "the maiden passion for a maid" is usually considered tantamount to a criminal charge, and the person to whom it is addressed is popularly regarded as being "taxed" with an offence, and it was therefore not without a slight blush that Stubbs replied defiantly, "I know I am — what then?"

"O nothing," said Laurence; "I'll give you a testimonial."

And as Laurence was lord-paramount over Grove House, Stubbs should, in Laurence's opinion, have considered the matter settled; but he did not.

"You see, old fellow," said Stubbs anxiously, "I'm doubtful about my circumstances."

"Pooh!" replied Laurence; "you'll get a fellow-ship."

"And if I do," observed Stubbs, "I shall have to give it up when I marry. The only way I can see is this: I believe I shall take a very fair degree, and so I may get a good mastership in a crack school, and take boarders. I confess I don't quite like the notion; but do you think Lucy would object?"

"Object!" echoed Laurence; "it's just what she would like, — a spotless parson and lots of children to look after."

"Ah! but think of the details. Think of little Jones, please, sir, as the housekeeper would say, with the stomach-ache, and little Thompson with the mumps, and all sorts of miserable little Christians with all sorts of horrible complaints."

"My dear boy, it's just what Lucy would be great in; she'd be like a mother to the whole lot."

And so Stubbs determined that he would take the earliest opportunity of finding out how Lucy was minded towards him. It happened, therefore, on a certain evening in early June, when he was paying his short visit at Grove House, he said to Lucy, as they sat in the drawing-room, "I wish you would sing me a favorite song."

"What is it?" asked she.

"Il segreto per esse felice —"

"And pray, what does that mean in plain English?" growled old Mr. Horton, who disliked "outlandish" words, as he called them.

"The receipt for being happy, dear papa," said Lucy. "I'll sing it with pleasure, Mr. Stubbs, on condition that you afterwards sing La Donna è mobile."

"I'll not sing that," blurted Stubbs decisively.

"And pray, why not?" growled old Horton again. "What does that mean in plain English?"

"Woman is changeable, dear papa," answered Lucy. "Why will you not sing it, Mr. Stubbs?"

"I would rather not," said Stubbs a little sulkily. "I will sing Com'è gentile, or, O, summer night (to give the first words of the English version, Mr. Horton), if that will do."

"O, certainly, Mr. Stubbs; it will do very well," answered Lucy, looking just the least bit in the world annoyed.

The songs were ended, and, the evening being close, every one strolled into the garden for air. There was summer lightning playing about, and Stubbs and Lucy sat watching it after the others had gone indoors again. Stubbs suddenly drew his chair near Lucy's, and said with some confusion, "Do you know why I asked you to sing that particular song?"

"O, was not that a beautiful flash?" asked Lucy evasively.

"I think I know 'the receipt for being happy,'" continued Stubbs moving his chair still nearer to Lucy's.

"There's another beautiful flash," was Lucy's only remark; and Stubbs asked somewhat angrily, "Can you guess why I would not sing that woman is changeable?"

"Because you are wilful, sir," answered Lucy archly.

"Indeed," said Stubbs, "that is not the reason. Have you read the German poems I gave you?"

"Some of them; and I think them charming."

"Do you recollect The Three Students?"

"O yes; it is beautiful, — so simple, and so pathetic."

"Did you see," Stubbs went on, "some pencil-marks against the words spoken by the third student? Did you notice that I had translated them to the best of my ability: Thee I loved from the first, thee I love to-day; and I'll love thee when all things have passed away? And did you know, Lucy, it was you that I meant?"

Lucy turned away her head and said nothing, but slid her fingers into Stubbs's hand.

What scene the sheet-lightning afterwards illuminated was witnessed by the stars alone; and they winked upon it after their fashion.

The consequence was that next morning Stubbs was closeted some time with old Mr. Horton, and came from the interview with a smile of triumph.

VIII.

The reading-party broke up at the beginning of October, and each member of it went whither he listed until the day arrived when he must return to college. What need to mention that Stubbs went to Grove House? There was all he prized on earth; and there he was proud to confess to himself that "Stubbs's luck" was not so bad after all.

At last the cruel day arrived when he and Laurence must return to college. And once more time flew, and Christmas was drawing near again.

But Stubbs was not destined to pass it at High Beckham. The mathematical examination was coming on in January; and mathematics and "rheumatics" were almost equally disabling to Stubbs. Fears were expressed even by his private tutor that he would not manage to "pass"; and if he failed to "pass," he could not try for classical honors. Great, therefore, was the consternation at Grove House. All his future depended upon his "passing": a "pluck" looked like utter ruin for him. Every effort, therefore, must be made; nothing must occur to disturb his mind. It was proposed, then, by old Mr. Horton, seconded by Laurence, supported by Ellen, and acquiesced in by conscientious Lucy, that correspondence between her and Stubbs should cease till the dreadful examination was over. She should indulge him with one long letter on Christmas-day, and, with that exception, he must try to forget that pens, ink, and paper were used for anything but mathematics.

So Stubbs stayed "up" another Christmas whilst Laurence went home to High Beckham: for Stubbs was Laurence's senior by a year. But Stubbs and I were in the same year; so we dined together on Christmas-day, and made moan together over our fate, and read together until the awful morning broke when the doors of the Senate-house, at 9 A. M., opened wide, and swallowed us up.

Upon leaving the Senate-house, on the last day of the examination, Stubbs rushed like a madman to college, called at his tutor's obtained his exeat, or "leave to go away," and then flew to his rooms to strip off his cap and gown. To his astonishment the outer door was open. It must be that his bed-maker was putting things to rights. He hastily opened the inner door, and by the dim firelight saw a sombre figure seated in his chair. The figure turned its head round, — it was Laurence Horton.

"Horton!" cried Stubbs in amazement.

"Stubbs, old boy!" said Laurence in a low voice; and as he rose from the chair, and stood by the fire Stubbs saw with a shudder that he was dressed in black.

"Stubbs, old boy, I've some very bad news," said Horton sadly.

The other turned pale and trembled, but said not a word.

"It's about Lucy, Stubbs. Do you think you can bear it?"

Stubbs simply nodded, sank into a chair, folded his arms upon the table, and buried his face in them.

Horton laid a hand gently on Stubbs's shoulder, bent down, and whispered.

There was a silence for the space of ten minutes whilst Horton stood with his hands before his face, and Stubbs gave no outward sign of consciousness, save a heaving motion of the back and shoulders.

At length, Stubbs looked up an older man and said softly, "When — when — when —" He could not complete the sentence.

"This morning at six," said Laurence, knowing what the question should have been.

There was another long silence, and then Stubbs said faintly, "I shall go at once; there is time to catch the train. Are you coming?"

Laurence nodded. A fly was brought, and the two friends went away together. As they travelled in the train Stubbs commanded himself sufficiently to ask for an account of what had befallen Lucy, and why they had not sent for him. She had been on the ice Laurence said, on Christmas-day, after she had written her last letter to Stubbs; the ice had given way, and before she could be got out she had been thoroughly drenched. No bad effects showed themselves immediately, but when a day had passed she became alarmingly ill. She grew better, and then worse, and that morning she had sunk rapidly. "And why we did not let you know anything about it," said Laurence, in conclusion, "you will learn best when you reach home. We had no fear at first, and at last we had good reason for silence."

Ellen would fain have accompanied Stubbs into the chamber of death, but he begged that he might enter alone; so his grief was hidden from mortal eye. Clapsed in one hand of the dead was a prayer-book which he had given her, and in the other was a paper, on which was written in pencil, "Good by, dearest Willie, till we meet again. It was at my request that you were told nothing: it could have done me no good, and it would have injured you. Forgive me if it seems unkind; I could not be unkind to you. Papa promised you should take this from my own hand."

So there was bitter mourning in Grove House, and the hearts of the red-cloaked pupils were heavy.

Stubbs "passed," but his performance in the classical examination was not equal to expectation. The examiners, of course, could not know that over all the papers they set hovered a sweet little face, and that all the words were turned to "Lucy." They put his name low down in the list; and his comrades talked of "Stubbs's luck."

But Stubbs cared little where the examiners put him. He had made up his mind for a different life from that which Lucy would have shared with him. He was only one-and-twenty, and Mr. Horton's influence was sufficient to procure him a cadetship. So he departed for active life in India. He devoted himself to the practice of the sabre, and his swordsmanship was a matter of talk. In many a dangerous affair, with the once ruddy face begrimed with powder, and the soft blue eyes darting out fierce fire, he had plied his sword to terrible purpose, as he charged with his troop of irregular horse. And when Indian hate — whether called forth by greased cartridges, or long-borne tyranny, or natural malignity — broke out in open mutiny and murder, Stubbs and his troop did good service. Their Bhakke tunics, scarlet sashes, and picturesque turbans were regarded by the rebels as the outward garb of avenging furies. And thus it happened that on a day Stubbs came upon a party of rebel horse, commanded by the notorious Rumber Singh, who was commonly called from his bravery, "The Lion."

"Remember, lads, the Lion is mine," cried Stubbs, as they galloped down upon the enemy; and in a few seconds he and the Lion were hand to hand. Then Stubbs's swordsmanship stood him in good stead, for he had no mean antagonist opposed to him.

"That was well meant," said Stubbs, coolly, as he parried a vicious cut; but the Lion only grinned with rage.

At it again they went, cutting and thrusting, and wheeling their well-trained horses. At last, the Lion left an opening, Stubbs gave point, and the Lion fell. A loud cheer rose from Stubbs's men, but at that very moment a ping was heard, and Stubbs's saddle was emptied of its rider.

Over the Hortons' pew, in High Beckham Church, is a marble slab with this inscription: "Sacred to the Memory of WILLIAM STUBBS, late Captain S — Irregular Horse, who fell gallantly fighting against the Indian Mutineers, January 7, 1858." And under a glass cover in Laurence Horton's study at Grove House lies a little prayer-book, wrapped in a piece of paper. Pencil-marks are still faintly visible upon the paper, on which, as well as on the prayer-book, are stains as of blood; for Stubbs had carried prayer-book and paper close to his heart; and the Hortons had regarded Stubbs as their relation.

THE COUNT DE BUFFON.

A MODERN English author has said of Buffon that he is the Bewick of the civilized world. The compliment is one only from the British point of view. Though it be true enough that as Bewick is the darling faunist of the British Islands, so Buffon is of the whole civilized world, yet Bewick cannot take amongst the learned physiologists of his native country the rank assigned to Buffon amongst those of the world at large. A more accurate similitude, not for analogy of genius, but certainly for coextensiveness of fame, would be that of the Defoe of France. No genius, however, needs less than that of Buffon the relief of contrast. No author ever created for himself an individuality more completely, yet more unselfishly distinct. His aim was self-proposed; he founded systems of which later science has confirmed the truth, and he fell of his own accord into a series of magnificent errors, of which any one would have immortalized a smaller man. His style was not of that kind which hides a secret from the admiring disciple. His followers took freely of his spirit in proportion to their zeal, and of some it has been said triumphantly that they have composed whole chapters in the style of Buffon. But Buffon has a far more solid claim to glory than can be founded upon any amount of mere abstract fame. His reputation is unequivocally pure. A vague notion of something good is attached to his name in even the most prejudiced and ignorant minds, just as to that of Volney clings a taint of evil even amongst those who have only read of him as the friend of Franklin, or as the fearless reprover of the Consul Bonaparte.

Georges-Louis Leclerc, afterwards Count de Buffon, was born at Montbard, in Burgundy, the 7th September, 1707. Though an aristocrat by birth, his title of count was of subsequent creation. His father, lord of the manor of Buffon-par-Montbard, and a distinguished member of the Parliament of Dijon, detected early the latent genius of the young Leclerc, and observing him to be invariably persistent in pursuits of his own selection, at length remitted him from all constraint, and lived to witness the complete justification of his keen though daring foresight.

On leaving college the first use he made of his liberty was to travel in the south of France, and afterwards in Southern Italy. From thence he turned northwards, and arrived in England in his two-and-twentieth year, with no distinct object, as he states himself, than that of observing and noting the institutions of an independent people. England was at that time in a state of social isolation from the rest of Europe. Foreigners went there to enjoy originality in poetry, in the drama, and in romance, and to study liberty, philosophy, and political economy. Frenchmen went especially to observe the growth of popular power, to brood over the progress of popular emancipation, and darkly to examine subjects which were some years later to be openly resumed at home by turbulent and menacing debaters.

Wide of any such design was the ambition of the young Leclerc. Without any more definite aim than that of acquiring the language, he set himself with zeal to study English. The first book which fell into his hands, in London — and on this Jules Jaïn remarks with admiration how hazard favors genius — was Hales's statics of vegetables. The perusal, re-perusal, and ultimately the complete and accurate translation of this work, created in his mind a tendency which was never afterwards diverted. His next study was Newton's system of fluxions, of which he also completed an elaborate translation, and to the influence of which he dates his subsequent preference for geometry and the natural sciences.

On his return to France he repaired to Angiers, with the intention of completing his studies in the received academical order, but there, falling in with Landreville, he yielded to the temptation of reading exclusively with that most skilful mathematician, and in later life he cites him as his authority for the adoption of particular theorems. But his stay at Angiers was suddenly cut short by an occurrence, which he ever afterwards regarded as a lasting motive for serious and remorseful penitence. Having accepted a challenge, resulting from a quarrel at the close of a convivial evening, he met his opponent, and severely wounded him. In vain his friends insisted on the laws of an inexorable code. "The dilemma," he said, "would have vanished with the first effort of a godlike nature. My adversary would have known me to be honorable had I kissed his cheek; but now I have cut him with my sword, and he cannot know that I am not a craven or a bully."

From Angiers he went to Paris, from whence he was summoned home to attend his mother, who died shortly after his arrival. Her loss was deeply felt by the young Leclerc. Endowed with mental gifts of the highest order, she had ever inspired him with that respectful love which outlasts the most affectionate remembrance of mere parental tenderness. He spoke of her through life in tones of the highest admiration, and usually added, with the sublime naïveté which was natural to his character, and which was the constant delight of his friends, "You know it is through the mother that qualities of mind and heart are transmitted to children."

During the year which followed his mother's death his father married again, and a suit ensued, which ended in a complete rearrangement of the family affairs. There had been some disorder. The estate of Buffon had been sold; moneys embarked in speculation were not forthcoming for division, and it appeared that when the surviving children had obtained their due, the father had overdrawn his share. Georges-Louis was now of an age to take legal possession of his private fortune, which was considerably larger than that of his only surviving brother, the Abbé de Rivet, having been augmented by a handsome legacy under the will of his godfather's widow. His course was clear to his conscience, and he adopted it without hesitation.

He repurchased the estate of Buffon, took his father and stepmother to live with him in the château, and it was there the children of the second marriage were born and educated. His own time he spent partly in Paris, and partly with his father at the chateau. In Paris he devoted himself to literature and science; in the country to experiments and practical observations. His rank and education entitled him to move in the most courted circles, and possessing ample means, and a commanding person enhanced by a natural reserve calculated possibly to pique the inquisitive, he speedily found himself caressed and solicited by the most distinguished ampbtryons of the capital. But though keenly alive to the worldly advantage of connection, and by no means averse to fashion he remained master of his will through all temptation, and resisted sternly the encroachments of dissipation, in whatever shape presented. We are informed by Flourens, the most matter-of-fact of his biographers, that he had given his writing-desk a standing appointment for five o'clock each morning, and that he punctually and religiously kept it, in spite of late evenings and undigested suppers. His first avowed publication, a geometrical treatise, presented to the Academy of Sciences in 1737, procured him the honor of membership elect in that learned institution. Two years later he published his translation of Hales's statics preceded by a brilliant preface, which being of a nature generally appreciable first brought him into public notice. In 1740 he published his translation of Newton's fluxions, preceded also by a preface, no less remarkable in style and substance and no less admired than the first. Other treatises followed, chiefly original, and all on scientific subjects. He was now in his thirty-second year, had passed in the Academy of Sciences from the class of mechanics to that of botany, and from the rank of deputy to that of associate. His reputation was established both in science and letters, but, so far, only in his native country. His leaning for the mathematics became more and more apparent, and there appeared every likelihood of his taking final rank amongst the profound and inaccessible few, when a simple circumstance revealed his true vocation, effacing the narrow professor's chair which blocked his prospect, and unrolling the vast perspective of his now inevitable mission.

In the year following that in which appeared the translation of Newton's fluxions, the Academy received unexpected tidings of the death of Dufay, the intendant of the king's garden. The intendency of the king's garden was the post of all others most suited to the tastes and genius of Leclerc. He had been even mentioned as eminently eligible to succeed to it, although from the age and inclination of the immediate occupant, the succession was regarded as remote. It was, moreover, a post much coveted, and dependent on a patronage not always employed in favor of the fittest candidate. It appeared, however, that, by a codicil to his will, Dufay had recommended Leclerc to the king as the most competent person whom his majesty could appoint to succeed him.

The king — Louis XV. — did honor to the recommendation of his departed servant, and De Buffon — as he was already styled, by courtesy, from the name of his estate — took immediate possession of his new and important stewardship. In a letter, written previously to his nomination, after expressing fear on the ground of his comparative youth and his inexperience, he modestly enumerates what he considers his qualifications for the office. What is needed, he says, is a young man capable of supporting fatigue, who understand plants, and who does not fear the sun. But once at his post, these unassuming pretensions fell instantly to the place assigned them by their subordinate importance. It was no longer a question of braving the weather, or of merely understanding plants, or tracing plans. The king's garden was a creation craving rescue, an embryo lost for need of heat. Not an outline had been produced in the system of De Buffon's predecessor, which contained an appropriate thought. Not a sketch existed that revealed a seizable design. All was poverty of conception, all confusion of material. A low-roofed tenement contained two heaps of doubtful curiosities, three worm-gnawed skeletons composed the museum of anatomy; the herbarium was without plants, the parterre left to hazard; trees choked up the scanty nursery, and fallow plots lay thirsting by neglected wells.

The king's garden was nevertheless an old foundation, and established for scientific ends. Conscientious professors had from time to time revived its torpid animation, and one illustrious name, anterior to Buffon, is gratefully remembered as its constant friend; but distractions civil and political, fanatical commotions and exhausting wars, took precedence of peaceful science, and it is perhaps remarkable that, with lukewarm patrons and mercenary friends, so unattractive an institution should have survived popular indifference.

De Buffon paused for an instant, overwhelmed with the vast proportions of a twofold project. He then formed the resolution, first of reproducing the entire visible creation in the miniature dimensions of the king's garden, and secondly, of becoming the historian of nature. His first care was to examine, sort, and cull. He then proceeded to survey and adapt his territory. New plans were traced and forthwith executed. Old sites were levelled, old boundaries removed. Fresh ground was purchased and annexed. Constructions without apparent object perplexed the curious, or provoked scornful whispers. Why build a terrace to overlook these hopeless wastes? To what end these galleries, of which a single cabinet would more than contain the whole possessions of the museum? To such inquiries De Buffon answered in the vindicating language of success. His eloquent appeal for aid had captivated the learned and convinced the rich. Each courier came laden with fresh accessions to the museum, the library, and the garden. Far from being too vast, the galleries were speedily unable to contain the rich collections that encumbered the floors and obstructed the passages. New buildings were then erected on more extensive plans, accommodation was provided for visitors and strangers, a staff was engaged for superintendence and exhibition, and the institution became, what it has ever since remained a public and venerated monument.

De Buffon now began to feel the need of organized co-operation. The first coadjutor who joined him permanently was Daubenton, a man of great learning, and profoundly scientific. To him was confided the arrangement of the museum, and the classification of the specimens. It was Daubenton who first expounded natural history to the students of all classes who came from the different seminaries to frequent the new Lyceum.

Things were now established on a solid basis. The public applauded loudly, and it was clear that the king's garden was a national success. Enough had been done to assure its future progress under vigilant and enlightened management, and De Buffon turned his thoughts to his second and more adventurous undertaking. After securing the services of additional and able substitutes, and imparting a last and long-felt impulsion to the home administration, he left Paris to return only at determined intervals, and withdrew to Montbard, to mature his grand design in silence and seclusion. Ten years elapsed, and in the eleventh he quitted his laborious solitude, and returned for a moment to his friends. Congratulated on his healthful mien, he replied, "But there is health in happiness, and there is happiness in an elevated aim." He added, later, "With patience and method, one becomes each day sensible of progress, and of the increasing force of one's intelligence."

Meanwhile, this progress, this increasing force of intelligence, had produced the three first volumes of the "Natural History." They appeared in 1749. The first contained the "Theory of the Earth," and the "System of the Formation of the Planets"; the second, the "General History of Animals," and the "History of Man considered separately"; the third was a description of the king's museum, by Daubenton, but it contained also that admirable chapter on the "Varieties of the Human Species," in which De Buffon, for the first time, laid down foundations for the natural history of man. Man had been studied previously in his individual existence only. Buffon is the first physician who ranks him as a genus, and his researches are still the adopted groundwork of the prevailing theories.

The apparition of this work, so unforeseen, and so unlike in flight to the timid hoverings of the previous speculators, divided the public between surprise and admiration, and Buffon's fame, confined hitherto to France by the barriers of language, passed rapidly through the medium of translations, and escorted mostly by approving comments, into all the capitals of Europe.

At about this period, or a little later, a celestial dream came suddenly to divert the current of his high preoccupations. In a convent at Montbard, her eyes turned thoughtfully from the outer world, a specimen of the genus angel attracted the attention of the great naturalist, in the person of a young novice. Twice he had seen her, without uncontrollable emotion, in the presence of his friend, her father, the Chevalier de St. Belin. The third time, seen alone, or only in the charge of the monastic chaperon, her remembrance was fatal to his studious concentration. In vain he quoted Ovid, and betook himself to write; from out his troop of porpoises a mermaid looked at him; and from the depths of his tertiary formations he found himself reascending to the seventh heaven. He was nevertheless a great philosopher, and forty-five years old. From one so self-possessed and so devoted to science, it was lawful to anticipate an heroic and exemplary decision. A sacrifice was even due to public expectation. His conduct, on the contrary, was that of the most simple of mortals, and though generous and disinterested, was extremely rational. He first allowed himself to become seriously in love with Mademoiselle de St. Belin, and then took his dog and walking-stick, and went over to see her father. The chevalier delicately objected that his daughter was dowress; her monastic portion of six thousand pounds, Tours currency,—equal in sterling to two hundred and forty pounds,—was only to be obtained on the hard but needful condition of renouncing her claim on the family succession. This difficulty De Buffon immediately met by volunteering to settle on Mademoiselle de St. Belin, out of his own fortune, by way of pin-money, an annuity for life of a thousand crowns French, or £120 sterling, and the marriage was then and there agreed on finally, as far as regarded the paternal consent. On being consulted by her father, the young lady expressed the most unfeigned surprise. She had had no presentiment of her suitor's preference. She had, moreover, been strangely allured of late by the peaceful prospect of a cloistered life, and had half resolved within herself to pass from the noviciate to the veil. She was, nevertheless, conscious of being greatly honored by the love of so distinguished a man, and she undertook to love him in return with all her affection.

During the year which followed his marriage, whilst absorbed with his manuscripts at Montbard, Buffon unexpectedly received news of his being unanimously elected a member of the Academy of France. The announcement was the more acceptable to him from the circumstance that certain Doctors of the Sorbonne had openly suspected him of materialism. One had gone so far as to declare his conclusions contrary to revelation, and to recommend his philosophy to, at least, the mute censure of the Index Expurgatory. The papal commissioners had, however, taken quite a contrary view. The Pope himself, in an ex-official interview with the Duke of Nivernais, then ambassador of France at Rome, had even spoken of Buffon's works in terms of high commendation.

Pending the probation Buffon writes on the subject to a friend with his own truly childlike and native guilelessness: "I do hope my works will not be consigned to the Index. I have done my utmost to write clear of the Church, and I have made all possible concessions. I dread these nasty theological disputes more than all the criticisms of geometricians and philosophers. But see how valuable the delay is. We are almost out of their reach; the third edition is going off as rapidly as the second and the first."

In the August of 1753 he pronounced before the Academy, on the occasion of his reception, his famous essay on style: "The only works," he observes, "which are destined to pass to posterity are those which are really well written. The knowledge, the learning, the truth they may contain, are readily transplantable, but the style is the author himself, and remains immutable; and if the style of a truthful treatise be sublime and irreproachable, it will be admired throughout all ages, and secure to the author his entire fame." The first address of a newly elected member of the Academy is usually a graceful and skilfully disguised acknowledgment of the honor conferred on him by the election, but in the case of the essay on style, as Flourens remarks, the compliments are exclusively for the author. In all probability it did not occur to Buffon's simple mind that he was describing to his new colleagues a talent which he certainly knew himself to possess in a more eminent degree than they.

From 1753 to 1765 appeared the twelve volumes of the "History of the Quadrupeds." They contain those brilliant and attractive descriptions which, to employ the author's own words, as above quoted, "will be admired by all ages, and secure him his entire fame." Each volume, as it appeared, produced a fresh outburst of enthusiasm. The public, amazed to find instructive entertainment in subjects hitherto brought before it only in arid and technical treatises, became gradually conscious of an unsuspected passion for the things of nature, and this passion, once effectually roused, assumed in the popular mind the incontestable pre-eminence it has ever since maintained.

Buffon was materially aided in the anatomical and descriptive details of his history by Gueneau, Daubenton, Sonnini, and, above all, by the Abbé de Bexon. The latter, a young man of remarkable talent and of the most laborious application, prepared for him the groundwork of some of his most able chapters.

De Bexon at first fell somewhat short of the high standard proposed by Buffon, which was "de ne jamais s'arrêter qu'à la plus noble expression"; but by persevering efforts he approached at last to the perfection of his great model, and it appears, from manuscripts which are still preserved in the Museum, that in the history of the aquatic birds, the much admired description of the swan is almost exclusively from the pen of De Bexon. Buffon never failed to acknowledge, in handsome terms, the services of his working colleagues, and he was far above the affectation of being independent of extraneous aid. He was at the same time incapable of anything like unfairness or cupidity, and it is therefore only fair to suppose that he made the abbé some special compensation, in lieu of a share of the splendid service of china, representing the swan in all its attitudes, presented to Buffon by Prince Henry of Prussia, to mark his admiration of the chapter on that noble bird.

When complimented by his friends on his habits of diligence, he was accustomed to reply that his love of labor was inspired, and in part artificial; and it would be certainly difficult to select a spot more calculated than the study at Montbard to stimulate the particular ambition of a writer on nature, or even to exalt the charms of toil in general. Montbard was commanded by the ruins of an old castle, in former times the stronghold of the Dukes of Burgundy. From this castle the view extended over tracts of vine and pasture lands to hills of wood that mingled with the horizons of the Brenne. Few inland sites presented a landscape so varied and imposing. This castle, with the grounds surrounding it, Buffon had purchased from the province, and, turning architect for the occasion, had converted the one and the other into a vast and appropriate observatory. In the courtyards, the ample offices became laboratories for practical experiments. Simple enclosures in the park were allotted to wild animals of peaceful natures. Three lions inhabited a costly den constructed with the materials of a demolished keep. Other lodges contained bears, hyenas, ounces, and creatures of many kinds, sent from all parts for studious and prolonged inspection by the great naturalist. Buffon's invariable rule was, wherever possible, to examine for himself before attempting to describe; and we have, on behalf of the fidelity of his descriptions, the high testimony of Cuvier, who considers him more accurate than even Linnaeus, notwithstanding his constant and disdainful rejection of technical facilities. A striking illustration of his desire to see and judge for himself in all matters which concerned his profession, occurs in the well-remembered instance of the so-called wild man of the woods. This poor outcast had lived for fifteen years on roots and insects in the abandoned solitudes of America, and was then being exhibited in Europe as an aboriginal savage. Buffon had him conveyed to Montbard, where, during two entire months, he entertained, consoled, and questioned him, and it was mainly from his observations on this semi-human specimen, that he sketched his humbling portrait of humanity in a natural and uncultured state.

But to return to the study at Montbard. From the residence at the foot of the acclivity rose a series of gardens, terraced round and peaked from the exterior, and winding to the summit by a single path. Up this path, punctually at five each morning, Buffon proceeded to a mysterious gateway, opening on a flight of steps. Locking the gate behind him, he ascended the flight of steps, and crossed into an avenue of chestnut trees, leading to an aerial building, forty feet above the terraced gardens, and inaccessible to the profane. Here, in a paved apartment, oak-panelled, and furnished with extreme simplicity, the historian of nature passed, as he informs us, the sweetest hours of his existence. Here, face to face with his subject, presented ever under its wealthiest and grandest aspect, his eye met nothing to circumscribe the unsummoned images which, one by one, he arrested and immortalized. It was here, as lord of this beauteous and limitless creation, he surely felt within him the divine being he paints to his disclaiming brethren, "whose head regards the heavens, and presents an august face, on which is imprinted the character of its dignity; . . . whose majestic port, whose assured and certain step announce his rank and his nobility."

Alone in his study he allowed nothing to interrupt him during the hours of composition. His secretary, surrounded by manuscripts, sat silently waiting his orders in an adjoining cabinet. The first sketches were copied by him on loose sheets, and then immediately revised by Buffon. The revised sheets were next recopied, and then revised again, after which they were laid aside, to be finally revised and finished after an interval sufficiently long to disconnect them from any local or momentary impressions. At the hour of dinner he quitted the study, and seldom returned to it till the following morning. At table he laid aside the philosopher, and became the soul and genius of a gladsome group. He led the talk, enjoyed his own jokes, and assented, without always listening, to the views of every one. His appetite was immense, and his digestion equal to it. He partook of each dish with enviable enjoyment, and described himself to his friends as a vast and conscientious consumer of organic molecules.

His employment after dinner was usually of an active kind, and consisted chiefly of scientific or agricultural experiments. As a rule his afternoons, and sometimes his evenings, were spent at Buffon, where he had established a forge, for the sole purpose of testing the system which he afterwards propounded under the title of the period of fusion, or the first of the seven epochs of the terrestrial globe. It was here he completed those long and costly essays on the cooling of incandescent masses, which served as the base to his bold and startling conclusions. He caused iron, zinc, pewter, antimony, sandstone, and marble to be melted, and from the time consumed in the refrigeration of these substances, he deduced his data for computing the consolidation of the primeval lava. In these practical operations there was often difficulty in assigning an average to the duration of particular heats, from the discouraging and apparently unaccountable variations in identical experiments, and Buffon relates with delight that, on one occasion, when, watch in hand and disappointment in his face, he stood noting the retarded cooling of a slab of steel a boy from the forge informed him, with all the confidence of professional experience, that the ball of stuff would get cold ever so much quicker if he would only dip it into a bucket of water.
